8339. Will you tell me this; have you given to other people copies of your letter to Lord Lothian?—I showed this copy to one of my friends.

8340. Have you not merely shown, but given copies to other people of your letter to Lord Lothian?—No.

8341. Have you let persons take copies?—I do not know whether they might take a copy or not, but I gave no copy to anybody; I showed this copy to one or two individuals, and got it back again.

8342. Have not copies, or what have purported to be copies, of your letter to Lord Lothian, been circulated and given to different people in the county?—I do not know whether they might have taken copies from my letter, but I gave no copies.

8343. How would they get the copies?—I gave this to one or two friends to see.

8344. Will you look at this copy (handing another paper to the Witness); does that purport to be a copy of that letter?—It says so, but it is not my writing.

8345. I want to know whether you have let persons take copies of that letter?—They may have taken copies.

8346. Have you seen them take copies?—No, I have not; I have seen no one take a copy.

8347. This letter that you read out to the Committee is a copy, you say, which must have been taken from the rough draft?—Yes.

8348. Where did you keep that rough draft?—I had it at the time, and it was taken away that day, or the next, that I sent the letter to Lord Lothian.

8349. I want to know where you kept the draft of the letter?—I had it in my own house.

8350. Could anyone have got at it without your permission?—I do not think so.

8351. Have not garbled copies of that letter, with more omissions than I have noticed there, been circulated in your neighbourhood?—If they have been circulated, they have not been circulated to my knowledge.

8352. Could they have been circulated without your knowledge?—They may have been circulated without my knowledge; I showed this copy to one or two of my friends, and they may have taken copies, which I could not be responsible for.

8353. I want to know whether copies have not been circulated in your neighbourhood, with the omission of these words that are omitted in the copy to-day, and these words, "and I would even go further; that I would get a voter who intended to support Sir William Scott to remain at home on the polling day, so that in reality my vote might not count"; and the next sentence, "This I did, and even advised some parties who were hesitating between the two candidates to vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr"; were not those words omitted in the copies which have been circulated in the neighbourhood, and "this I adhere to" substituted instead?—I do not think so; this is the envelope (producing the same) in which I put this copy, and it has lain there all the time since I wrote it. I put it into the envelope, and this envelope has lain in my desk all the time, till I took it out, perhaps, to show two or three friends.

8354. When was this written on this envelope, "Copy letter to Lord Lothian"?—Either the day that it was sent away or the next.

8355. Did not you know that copies were circulated in your neighbourhood, purporting to be true copies of the letter which you wrote to Lord Lothian, with the omission of those words which I have read, and with the further omission of this passage "This I did, and even advised, some parties who were hesitating between the two candidates to vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr"?—I thought that it was an exact copy which I had shown to everybody. That is not my writing, whosever it is.

8356. In the Minutes of Evidence there is a copy of the original letter, and you admit that the passage beginning "I would even go further" to the words "might not count" is omitted in this copy which you have read to the Committee to-day?—Yes, I thought that this passage had been in it.

8357. But you admit that it is not there?—Yes, it is not there.

8358. Have not copies of what purported to be a copy of the letter been circulated in your neighbourhood, with the further omission of this passage, "This I did, and even advised some parties who were hesitating between the two candidates to vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr"?—They may have been.

8359. In the original letter there appears this further passage, "Three of my brothers were on the the committee and voted for Lord Schomberg Kerr"; in the copy circulated in your neighbourhood, were not the words "were on the committee and" omitted too; did it not run "Three of my brothers voted for Lord Schomberg Kerr"? —They would know perfectly well in the neighbourhood, and I do not think that that is an omission of the slightest consequence.

8360. I want to know whether those omissions were not made in the copies which purported to be copies of the correspondence circulated in your neighbourhood?—I do not know.

8361. Chairman.] Do you know anything of the copies of your letter which have been circulated in your neighbourhood?—I showed the letter to one or two friends, and if they have been copied and circulated in the neighbourhood they have copied them without my knowledge at all.

8362. Do you know anything of copies of your letters being circulated in your neighbourhood? —No; I do not.

8363. Have you seen any?—I have never seen any.

8364. Have you heard of any?—I understood that Mr. Hilson had showed it to one or two parties who were his friends, and that he had sent copies to a number of parties.

8365. Mr. Hunt.] Who is Mr. Hilson?—He is a writer in Jedburgh.

8366. Have you heard that he had shown them?—He told me that he had shown them.

8367. How did he get it to show?—I gave it to him.

8368. Did you give him an exact copy of the original letter, or did you give him the copy which you have read to-day, or what did you give him?—It must have been the copy which I read to-day.

8369. Will you undertake to say that it was an exact copy of what you read to-day?—I think so.

8370. Will you undertake to say that the passages which I have called your attention to were not cut out of it by your direction or wish? —I will say that they were not cut out either by my direction or my wish; they were not done in that way at all.

8371. Sir George Grey.] Had you ever seen before to-day that paper which the Right Honourable Member put into your hands just now?— Never, to my knowledge.

8372. Do you know by whom it is written?— I do not.

8373. You never saw it before?—No; and I do not know the handwriting.

8374. Mr. Hunt.] Have you seen a letter purporting to be a copy of your letter to Lord Lothian, with the same omissions that there are in this paper?—I really could not say; of course I never thought of reading the copy over.

8375. Did you not consult with some one about cutting out some parts of the letter?—No, I did not.

8376. Nor furnished any one with a copy with certain parts omitted?—Not to my knowledge.

8377. Will you undertake to say that you have not done so?—I will; they were not omitted to my knowledge, and if they were omitted it was a thorough mistake; I will undertake to say that it was not, to my knowledge.

8378. Sir George Grey.] Had you any reason for concealing the fact that you endeavoured to induce a voter to stay away?—None whatever.

8379. Had you any reason for concealing the fact that your brothers were on Lord Schomberg Kerr's committee, and voted for him?—No; in fact they were published on the committee, and there could be no occasion for concealing it, because it was quite well known over the whole county that they were on the committee and took an active part.

8380. Before you came here to-day had you read a copy of the evidence given by Mr. Otto the other day, before this Committee?—I had read the evidence.

8381. Had you read a copy of the letter which he put in, as far as it was a copy of your letter? —I read the whole of the evidence, and I could not understand the difference between them; I have read the copy which I saw in the evidence of the Committee, and I read the copy printed in the papers, and I could not well reconcile them.

8382. Were you fully aware to-day when you came to give evidence before the Committee that that passage which is omitted from your copy of the letter was already in the possession of the Committee, having been put in, in the copy of the letter, by Mr. Otto, the other day?—I thought that the two letters had been confounded together in the printing of the paper; I did not think that it had been in that letter; I thought that it was in the letter that I wrote to Mr. Otto.

8383. Had you any desire or intention to conceal from the Committee to-day the fact that you had stated to Lord Lothian that you had induced a voter to stay away from voting for the Liberal candidate, and that your brothers had been on the committee of Lord Schomberg Kerr, and had voted for him?—None whatever; because it explains the reason why I had detained the voter.

8384. Mr. Brand.] Have you still in your possession the rough draft of that letter to which you have referred?—I do not think so; at least I am very doubtful whether I have it. Perhaps the Committee will allow me to make one or two statements: the letter which I got from Mr. Otto in answer to one of mine asking him to look over the farm, I can produce, which shows that it was more than merely to give in a report; I think it indicates something more, if the Committee will receive it.

8385. Chairman.] When was that letter written by Mr. Otto?—On the 21st of October, when he intimated to me that he was coming to look over the farm; I think it indicates more than merely to give a report to Lord Lothian; "Jedburgh, 21st October 1868. Dear Sir, I have yours of yesterday, but have never yet been able to get Lord Lothian to fix what portion of Bonjedward Moor he wishes to reserve for planting; if, however, you are disengaged, I will meet you at Ancum Bridgend to-morrow (Thursday), at two o'clock, and take a look over the farm." I think the fact of his mentioning that he was not able to get Lord Lothian to fix about the plantation of the moor shows that it had no connection with the mere report upon the farm, and that it indicated that there was something more than coming to look over the farm, or for the purpose of merely giving a report to Lord Lothian.

8386. Does Mr. Otto manage all Lord Lothian's estates for him, or is there any other factor?— There is no other factor.

8387. Do you know whether his Lordship consults any other person about the letting of those farms?—I am not aware that he consults any other person; I have been with the offerers for farms two or three times on Lord Lothian's estate in Roxburghshire, and Mr. Otto in one case told us that the gentleman that I was along with would get the farm, because he, Mr. Otto, had had nothing to do but to recommend it to Lord Lothian and it would be done.

Mr. Christopher Harkness, called in; and Examined.

Mr. C. Harkness.

8388. Mr. Brand.] I believe you are the Provost of Dumfries?—Yes.

8389. You are a political agent there, are you not?—Yes, I was a political agent for Lord Drumlanrig in 1853, when, as a Liberal, he was elected for the county of Dumfries; and he was Member, I think, for four or five years, or perhaps more. I also acted as the Liberal agent for the late Mr. Ewart in 1857 and 1859, and I acted as his principal agent in 1863, and until he resigned in 1868; and I acted for Mr. Jardine, the present Member for Dumfries, at the last election.

8390. I believe that your object in attending here to-day is to tender evidence with respect to Mr. McGowan's evidence, given before this Committee some time ago?—Quite so.

8391. In answer to question, No. 5,992, Mr. McGowan states, "My instructions on that occasion were to hold ward meetings nightly in one or other of the small public-houses in the ward, and I believe the other ward agents had the same instructions;" have you any observations to make upon that point?—That refers to the election in 1865. The instructions were not to hold ward meetings in each of the wards every night. Taking Maxwelltown in account, there are five wards in Dumfries, and there were never more than one or two meetings each night at which most of the agents attended, and I was there generally myself.

8392. Mr. McGowan, in answer to Question 5993, states that the practice of treating prevailed extensively and openly on both sides previous to 1865; how was that?—I was one of the agents in 1857 and in 1859 for Mr. Ewart, and on those occasions I was the principal agent under Mr. McGowan's brother, and I saw no treating at that time.

8393. He further stated, in answer to Question 5,996, that to some extent the committees of the other candidate, that is Mr. Jardine's, held meetings at public-houses, was that the case?—No, it was not the case; there were no meetings in public-houses in Dumfries, or in Annan, or in Kirkcudbright, or in Lochmaben; there might be in Sanquhar, as I believe there they have no other place to meet in but a public-house, but I am led to understand that there was no drinking at those meetings.

8394. He further stated that there was the usual slight amount of intimidation in the burghs by customers among tradespeople?—I am not aware of that; I never heard of it. I may state, however, with reference to public-houses that that subject was taken up before. It was stated by one of our opponents, in the month of September 1868, publicly, that there was treating going on in Dumfries and in Lochmaben, and in Annan, and in other burghs, and Mr. Jardine took up the question. The gentleman who made that statement was Dr. James Murray McCulloch of Dumfries, and he apologised in the following terms: "To Messrs. S. Adamson and J. Simons, Writers, Dumfries. Dumfries, 12th September 1868. Gentlemen—At a meeting of the electors of Dumfries, held in the Mechanics Hall on Tuesday evening last, I was led to state that drink had, during the present election, been given in enormous quantities at Lochmaben, Annan, and Dumfries, and after questioning Mr. Noel and his agents if they had been parties to giving drink, and receiving their denial and expressing myself satisfied, I proceeded to say, 'I for my part cannot see how any honest man can vote for a candidate that has, either through himself or his agents, broken his plighted faith.' I regret that these expressions have been understood to apply to Mr. Jardine of Castlemilk, who was the only other candidate in the election, and who had at a public meeting, in answer to a question put by me, declared that he would not pay any public-houses bills incurred in his candidature. Being fully satisfied that there is no ground for applying these or any such expressions to Mr. Jardine, I retract the same. I never had the slightest idea of calling in question his honour and veracity. I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, James M. McCulloch."

8395. Again it is stated in answer to Question No. 6008, that flagrant exhibitions were made in the burghs, of magistrates bringing their power to bear in relation to the licensing; as Provost of Dumfries do you wish to say anything upon that point?—Yes; allusion has been made to the licensing courts held in April and October; at the licensing court in April there were 17 cases of applications refused; two people who had not got licenses appealed to the quarter sessions and at the quarter sessions they were granted; that reduced the number to 15; in October, 11 of those 15 applied for new licenses, not 12 as stated by Mr. McGowan, two of the 11 were refused; the gross number of applications was 14, and five of those had no votes, which reduced the number to nine; and of course that could not have any influence upon the election; then four applications were granted by the whole bench of magistrates; there was no complaint as to those; that reduced the number to five, and one at the quarter sessions was granted; the appeal being refused and the judgment of the magistrates being upheld; that reduced the number to four; then with regard to those four, two of them now hold licenses without any complaint; I think the number has been reduced to two, and I am quite willing to go into those two, and give the particulars of them, if it is wished.

8396. You wish to deny the statement that one of your brother magistrates had alleged that the magisterial office had been prostituted for political purposes?—I have spoken to two of my brother magistrates, who concurred with me in considering those cases since that statement was made, and none of us can remember that such a statement was made, but it is quite possible that it it might have been made, because we were all sitting in a row, and the gentleman who must have stated it was nearest the reporters. I did not hear it myself, but supposing I had heard it, it was a statement, I think, which was groundless, and was one that I think a dignified silence was the best way of answering; and that to have answered such a question as that would have been a very awkward affair upon the Bench.

8397. Is there any other point which you wish to advert to in Mr. McGowan's evidence?—It has been alleged that undue influence was used at Lochmaben. It is stated that Mr. Jardine and his friends are the only proprietors in the neighbourhood; that is a mistake, for the Marquis of Queensbury and Captain Yorstoun, who was examined here the other day, and Mr. Byrne of Elshieshiels, have large properties in the neighbourhood. Mr. Jardine, of course, has property lying in the neighbourhood; he is very highly esteemed there, and it is quite natural that the people of Lochmaben should support him. But it has also been alleged that it was the majority in Lochmaben which gained the election; that is a mistake, because the majority in the borough of Dumfries was 156 in favour of Mr. Jardine, and some 79, I think, in Lochmaben. With reference to nominations, I may state that at the nomination in 1865, when Mr. Ewart was returned, there was a great quantity of soot bags thrown; I got a stroke from one of them myself, and although Mr. Ewart was the popular candidate, we had very great difficulty in getting him down to his committee-rooms; and on a recent occasion there was a very great deal of annoyance in Mr. Jardine getting back to his committee-rooms from the hustings, and we blamed Mr. McGowan himself a good deal for manœuvring the mob, who rushed to prevent us getting down towards the committee-room. I was mobbed that afternoon; and on the polling-day which was the following day, there was considerable disturbance in Dumfries; Mr. Noel addressed the public after the state of the poll was known at five o'clock, and about an hour afterwards, all the windows of Mr. Jardine's hotel were broke.

8398. Sir George Grey.] Would that have been prevented if there had been no public nomination?—There was a great deal of excitement at the nomination, but this was after the nomination.

8399. Supposing the nomination had not existed there would have been excitement on the polling-day, and those windows would have been broken?—There were windows to the extent of 120 l. broken that evening.

8400. That was on the polling-day and not the nomination-day; it had nothing to do with the nomination?—No; but we would like to couple the whole together.

8401. Do you want to abolish both the nomination-day and the polling-day?—No, not the polling-day; but I would be very glad to see the nomination-day and the declaration of the poll abolished.

8402. Was this disturbance after the declaration of the poll, or was it on the polling-day?—It was the evening of the polling-day that the windows were broken.

8403. Between the nomination and the declaration of the poll?—Yes.

8404. You do not suppose that there is any scheme by which polling could be got rid of?—No.

8405. Mr. James.] What was the day in October which was licensing day?—I think it is the third Tuesday in October generally.

8406. When did you commence your canvass for Mr. Jardine?—I think his address was public on the 6th of July.

8407. Had you canvassed before the licensing?—Yes.

8408. And you personally assisted in the canvass of Mr. Jardine?—Yes, I was his principal agent.

8409. Do you know the views of the electors, pretty well, personally?—Yes.

8410. With regard to those 11 persons to whom the bench of magistrates granted a license in October, although they had refused them in April, were the circumstances altered between April and October which caused you to grant them in October?—Yes; licenses were granted to four of them, with the concurrence of the whole Bench, and two of the 11 were refused.

8411. You and your brother magistrates concurred in April in refusing the licenses, but you agreed to grant them in October; what had occurred to cause you to alter your opinion?—We found that we had made a mistake in some cases.

8412. That is to say, you made a mistake in April in refusing?—Yes.

8413. And you put that right by granting them in October?—Yes.

8414. You had refused the whole 11 in April, and you granted them in October; how many of those voted for Mr. Jardine?—Eight voted for Mr. Jardine.

8415. Did the others vote?—One voted for Mr. Noel, whose license was granted.

8416. Did you receive promises for Mr. Jardine from all those people before you granted the license?—No.

8417. You were his agent, were you not?—Yes, but I took very good care not to canvass them in any shape.

8418. You had charge of the canvass books, I presume?—Yes.

8419. How do you account for them all voting for Mr. Jardine?—I suppose it was their own free will; they were not canvassed by me.

8420. It is but due to you to ask you this question; at the time that you granted the licenses, did you know that they had promised Mr. Jardine?—I was not aware of any of them.

8421. You knew that some of them had given him their promises?—But that was not the cause of granting the licenses.

8422. But it is the fact that it was so?—It is the fact that eight of them voted for Mr. Jardine.

8423. I am only anxious to do you justice; did you know that at the time you granted those licenses to those people whom you had refused before?—I was not aware at the time that those licenses were granted which way they would vote.

8424. Had you returned them in your canvass book as promises for Mr. Jardine?—No.

8425. Sir George Grey.] Who was the returning officer for the borough?—Sheriff Napier.

8426. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You said that the licenses were refused by mistake; what do you mean by mistake?—A mistake with reference to the circumstances of the people.

8427. Will you just explain what you mean; the cases were heard in April, were they not?—They were heard in April.

Mr. C. Harkness. 11 June 1869.

8428. And they were unanimously refused?—The first case was that of Walter Armstrong. He had been once convicted merely, and there was no desire to close up his house permanently, as it had been long licensed, and the magistrates thought that he had sufficiently attoned for his offence by having his house closed for half-a-year.

8429. Was it for this that you refused him in April?—It was on account of the conviction against him in April, and by taking the license from him for half a year, we thought that he had sufficiently atoned; and upon that ground he was licensed.

8430. Do you apply the word "mistake" to any other case?—There was the case of Joseph Craik. His shop is a large one, and had been licensed for 50 years, but owing to the unfortunate selection of a tenant the license had been taken from it, and he again applied for it for himself; he had been previously licensed, and had never been convicted. The justices thought, as a matter of caution to the man Craik himself, not to license him in April; but they licensed him in October.

8431. Sir George Grey.] In those two cases they reversed their former decision, according to your present statement; but the magistrates thought that both parties had been sufficiently punished by withholding the license for six months?—Quite so.

8432. Where was the mistake which, you say, occasioned the license being refused in April; did the magistrates think that they had acted with too great severity?—Those two cases were matters of caution.

8433. Then there was no mistake there?—No.

8434. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You stated that there were 11 cases in which there had been a mistake; what were the cases to which you apply that word "mistake"?—If the Committee would allow me, I could go over each case separately.

8435. Will you confine yourself to those cases in which you say there had been a mistake, because I presume you know the effect on your own words?—The magistrates took a different view of the case.

8436. In what way did they take a different view?—The first cases were those of Craik and the man Armstrong, which I have explained. Another case was that of a person named Adam Hope, who lives in New Bridge-street, in Dumfries. This person had purchased a property with the view that there was to be a license granted to him; he had purchased it before Whit Sunday 1868, and the magistrates thought it was a great hardship in taking the license from that house. It is only used upon Wednesdays; and upon reconsidering the case, they thought it the proper course to grant the license in October.

8437. They refused it in April, and they granted it upon the same state of circumstances in October?—Yes.

8438. What was the other case?—John Hope, of 9, Queensbury-street. This was a case where the house was also frequented on Wednesdays, and where there was large stabling, and the justices thought that it would be quite sufficient to caution that man. It was supposed that his habits were not very good, and they thought that by taking the license from him for half-a-year, it would make him be careful in conducting his business, and upon that ground they altered their judgment.

8439. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did you tell those in April that they were having the licenses taken away temporarily, and not permanently?—No.

8440. Sir George Grey.] Was it intended when the licenses were withheld that they should be withheld only temporarily, and should be granted again at the end of six months?—No; there was no statement of that kind made at the time.

8441. Did the magistrates intend to make it a permanent withdrawal of the license, or not?—I think not.

8442. You considered it a question merely of refusing the license on account of the misconduct of the parties?—Yes. The next case was that of John Mars. That was an old licensed house, but he was a new tenant, and the magistrates upon that occasion took away the license for half-a-year from him. He appealed, however, to the court of quarter sessions, and the court of quarter sessions granted it in October.

8443. Is it the usual practice where the persons applying for licenses have been guilty of any misconduct, to withhold the license for six months only?—Yes; that course is sometimes followed.

8444. Which is the most common practice, to withhold the license for six months or to withhold it permanently?—If the case is a very aggravated one they would take away the license altogether.

8445. In all those cases, as I understand, the licenses had been withheld in April, and granted again at the end of six months?—Yes.

8446. Is it usual where licenses are withheld in April, that they are all granted again at the end of six months, or in the majority of cases are they generally refused again?—Each case must be viewed upon its own merits.

8447. Was not it a singular thing that they should all be granted upon this occasion at the end of six months?—I do not think so; two of the 11 were refused.

8448. It was not an uncommon case?—I do not think that there was anything uncommon about it.

8449. Mr. Whitbread.] Did you ever remember so many being refused in April, and granted in October?—I have not been long on the bench; I have only been 18 months as provost.

8450. Sir George Grey.] But you were one of the magistrates, in fact, the presiding magistrate, who refused it in the one case and granted it in the other?—Yes.

8451. And it was pretty well known, I presume, that you were the agent of one of the candidates?—Perfectly well known.

8452. Mr. Leatham.] You stated that in four cases the magistrates were unanimous?—Yes.

8453. Were the whole of the magistrates present during the whole time?—Yes.

8454. And the gentleman was present who made the remark with regard to the prostitution of the office?—Yes, he was.

Mr. WILLIAM JONES, called in; and Examined.

8455. Mr. Hunt.] YOU live at Plasnewydd, near Ruabon?—I do.

8456. You have been employed as land agent for different landlords in Wales for some years, have you not?—I have been engaged on the two principal estates in North Wales for a period together of 30 years.

8457. What estates are those?—The one was the Mostyn estate, and the other Sir Watkin Williams Wynn's estate.

8458. In 1859 you were agent for the Mostyn estate, were you not?—Yes, I was.

8459. Did you take part on behalf of the Liberal candidate at the election that took place then?—In Merioneth, I did.

8460. Since 1864 you have been agent to Sir Watkin Wynn, have you not?—Earlier than that, in 1863 I commenced.

8461. In the elections of 1865 and 1868, did you take an active part on behalf of the Conservative candidates?—In the Merioneth, I did.

8462. We have had some evidence from the Rev. Michael Daniel Jones, of Bala, in which he refers to two estates in Merionethshire as the two principal estates; is it perfectly well known what estates he refers to?—The two principal estates in Merionethshire are the Rhewlas estate, Mr. Price's and the other is Sir Watkin Williams Wynn's.

8463. When he speaks of the proprietor of the lesser of the two large estates that is known, is it not, to be Sir Watkin Williams Wynn's estate?—That I should take to be Sir Watkin Williams Wynn's estate.

8464. Sir Watkin has nearly 250 tenants on that estate, has he not?—He has.

8465. Did you canvass his tenants, or not, at the last election in 1868?—I do not suppose I canvassed more than half-a-dozen. I was engaged in another part of the county.

8466. In 1865 did you canvass them?—A few of them only that happened to come in my way, say, half-a-dozen. I do not suppose that I canvassed more than half-a-dozen on each occasion.

8467. Did you write to them?—No.

8468. Did you put any pressure upon them?—None whatever.

8469. Since either of those elections has Sir Watkin Wynn ever put any question to you as to how any tenant voted?—Never, either there (Merioneth), or in Denbighshire.

8470. Mr. Jones, of Bala, stated that, after the election of 1865, nine persons who had been neutral at the previous election voted on the Tory side, and that some of them had their rents lowered after that. Are you in a position to tell the Committee what rents have been lowered since then?—There are but two or three rents that have been reduced since I became agent in 1863. In 1864 there was an increase of rental of 48 l.; in 1865, an increase of 22 l.; in 1866, an increase of 57 l.; in 1867, a decrease of 18 l.; and in 1868, an increase of 135 l.

8471. Had you ever any instructions from Sir Watkin Wynn to lower any of the rents in consequence of the tenants who had previously not voted on his political side afterwards voting on that side?—Never.

8472. Have you ever had instructions from him to evict anybody on account of their vote?—Never. I may state that he has never given me any instructions whatever politically.

8473. On any estate, of which you have been agent, during the time of your agency, either as Liberal or Conservative, has there ever been an eviction on account of voting?—I have never known one in my experience.

8474. Mr. Jones, of Bala, referred to the case of a chapel in Montgomeryshire, where the congregation was displaced in consequence of some leading members of it having voted a particular way; do you know the case that he referred to?—I do.

8475. In that case the congregation received notice to quit, did they not?—Yes.

8476. What were the circumstances under which they received notice to quit?—In 1858 there was a portion of Sir Watkin's property to be offered for sale, and was offered for sale; and with a view of preparation for that sale, notice to quit was given to every tenant, and the trustees of the chapel accepted the notice, and moved out of the chapel without ever applying for a re-take. The chapel remained for some time unoccupied, and eventually was sold to them.

8477. Was it the case that notice was given to the tenants of the chapel just the same as it was given to all the other tenants on that part of the property?—Precisely.

8478. Under general instruction to serve all with notice, in order to prepare for a sale?—Those were the circumstances.

8479. That you have understood, have you not, from the previous agent?—Yes, from the previous agent; and it has been very much spoken and written of.

8480. What is your belief as to the inclination of tenants in Wales, to vote with their landlords, or the contrary?—Where the landlord stands well with his tenants, very few will go against his views.

8481. Without any pressure?—Yes, without any pressure I have found on both the large estates that I have been engaged upon scarcely any necessity for pressure upon the tenants; both the landlords stood highly in the opinion of their tenants, and as a rule the tenants were always desirous of studying the landlord's wishes and views.

8482. Do you think that if the system of secret voting were adopted there would be any change in that respect?—It might tell, to a certain extent. In Wales it would throw, I believe, greater power into the hands of the ministers and the clergy. I believe it would tend in that way.

8485. But if the landlord was popular with h tenants they would vote for him even though under the system of secret voting?—Yes.

8486. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that, whether popular or unpopular, the tenants always vote with the landlord now, as a rule?—I do not say that. I have known many cases where they have gone against the landlord, but as a rule they go with the landlord.

8487. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to the influence used by ministers over their congregations, is it the case that they use very great influence?—They use much influence; they are very active in elections, and on those occasions they educate their people to their way of thinking politically; that is about it.

8488. Is it, in fact, a question of landlord influence as against minister influence at an election?—Just so.

8489. There was another chapel referred to, do you know that case?—I do; I have got better evidence as to that.

8490. Mr. Jones was asked at Question No. 6595, "Do you know any instances of Dissenting congregations being turned out of their chapels in consequence of the way in which the leading members had voted?" To which he replied, "I know an instance in which a congregation, or rather two leading men in a congregation had notice to quit, and I know another case in which the chapel was sold;" which case is there spoken of?—It is the case of a chapel in Merionethshire. I think it refers to the election in the year 1859. I spoke before of the chapel in Montgomeryshire. I can speak about the case in Merionethshire better than the other, for I have a letter here which I have found amongst the papers of the late agent, showing that the chapel was sold before the election of 1859.

8491. Will you just give us the particulars?—On the 7th September 1858, there was a petition from the congregation, applying to Sir Watkin with reference to this chapel; and this petition was sent to the acting agent at the time; and, in explanation, he states, that the chapel had been allotted with another farm for sale; but having been applied to by Robert Edwards, who was a Dissenter, to treat for the purchase of the chapel by private treaty, the chapel had been sold to Robert Edwards for 25 l. This took place in September 1858, long before the election of 1859; the sale, therefore, could not be on political grounds.

8492. Mr. Leatham.] Were you agent to Sir Watkin Wynn in 1859?—I was not.

8493. Did the evictions take place after that election?—That I cannot speak to; the then agent is dead.

8494. That was a fact that was stated in the evidence which we had the other day, and which I understood you were called to rebut?—I cannot state that; my predecessor would have been the only one to answer this question, and he is dead.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. JOHN MCDERMOT, called in; and Examined.

Rev. J. McDermot.
15 June 1869.

8495. The O'Conor Don.] YOU are a Catholic priest, having a parish in the county of Sligo?—I am.

8496. Were you for several years professor in the College of Allhallows, and in the Irish College at Paris?—Yes.

8497. Were you in the county of Sligo during the last contested election, and did you take a great interest in that election?—Yes.

8498. Had you canvassed with the Liberal candidate on many occasions during the course of that contest?—Yes.

8499. I suppose you are well acquainted, as a Catholic priest, with the feelings of the people, and the different influences that were brought to bear upon them?—I should think so.

8500. Are you aware of any instances of intimidation on the part of proprietors in that county?—Yes, a good many.

8502. Was the tenant obliged to do anything then?—On this answer the agent left, and some few days afterwards he returned with four other gentlemen, influential gentlemen I should say in the neighbourhood, and then this tenant was again asked, and so were all the others; but on this occasion they were asked separately, whereas on the former occasion they were all asked collectively; the tenant before referred to was asked, and he again remonstrated, and then the agent said to him, "Well, then, pay your rent (he then owed half a year's rent), and you may go to America."

8504. Were there other instances besides that?—There were several others. On another estate a deputation of tenant farmers waited upon a gentleman to ask permission to give one vote according to their own principles. I must say that they asked my advice with reference to this, and I told them they should not go, because they should act according to their own principles, honestly, and openly, and independently, and should not cower thus before any man. Nevertheless, they went, and the landlord replied, "If you do give even one vote to the Liberal candidate, I shall go abroad and double the rent." To another tenant on the same property, he said, "I shall evict you if you vote in the interest of the Liberal candidate." The tenant did vote in the interest of the Liberal candidate, and he received a notice to quit. I do not say it was for this reason, as another reason was assigned, which, however, existed as well for others as for him; yet he alone was subjected to this inconvenience. I should add that, with reference to those two properties, when canvassing, the tenants bewailed to me, and sometimes with tears, the intimidation practised by the landlord, so that in several instances I advised them to keep back their votes until they saw whether they would be absolutely necessary for the success of the Liberal candidate, because if not they might be kept back, and the voter thus saved from landlord wrath.

8505. Are you aware of any other instances?—There was another instance, and a very peculiar one. There was a public meeting held at a certain place in the county of Sligo, at which I happened happened to be; a sub-agent came up to the platform; and while he was coming towards the platform I asked him, because I represented Mr. O'Conor on the occasion, if he wished to give his vote to the Liberal candidate; he pointed towards the poorhouse that was some distance, three miles off, and said, "Do you want me to cast myself and my family into that house?" Now, he was, as I said, a sub-agent, and it was notorious he had the ear of the agent, and knew the system of intimidation that was conducted; consequently this reply of his had a great effect upon the people around.

8506. Did this man vote afterwards?—He did not vote at all, and I must add that he lost the sub-agency, whether for that reason or not of course I am not prepared to say. He lost it immediately about that time; I have a great many other instances, if the Committee think it necessary that I should give them.

8507. Did you see any letters that were written by landlords?—Yes, I have brought an extract from one; it is written by a landlord, and addressed to a tenant, "I shall watch carefully how every man votes, it will greatly influence me in all future transactions with you. He (that is the candidate, Mr. O'Conor) will have something to do to excuse you to me for refusing my request." This is an extract from the original letter.

8508. Has the tenant the original letter?—Yes; the tenant has the original letter, and this was copied from the original at the moment.

8509. Was the letter shown to the Liberal candidate?—Yes; it was shown to the Liberal candidate himself, and he copied this extract from the original.

8510. Chairman.] Have you seen the original letter?—No; I have not seen it myself, but I could get the letter if it be necessary: there is another instance to which I must refer, before I pass away from landlord intimidation; there is a pretty extensive property in the neighbourhood, the landlord of which is an absentee. He wrote letters, and very threatening letters, to the tenants: I did not see these letters, but the tenants told me they were such. These tenants seemed to be in very great fear, and the more so, because during a former canvass the landlord wrote such other letters; that was in the case of Mr. Swift. He afterwards evicted two men because they gave one vote to Mr. Swift. This made the tenants, on this occasion, very much afraid, and I must say, they were advised by Mr. O'Conor and by me, among others, to hold over their votes until somewhere about three o'clock; then if victory declared for Mr. O'Conor it was arranged they would vote for the Conservatives, that thus they might save themselves from the tyrannous conduct of their landlord. They did hold over their votes, and then when it was found that Mr. O'Conor's return was certain, they gave their votes in the interest of the other side; they told me, however, and they told others, that if their votes were necessary they should certainly have given them to Mr. O'Conor, though I did not ask them to do so.

8511. The O'Conor Don.] Are you not aware that on several occasions Mr. O'Conor had advised voters in such circumstances to vote against him?—I am; and I must say that I advised several to do the same, but I did so privately, because I was afraid to do it publicly, lest the public feeling would rise up against me.

8512. This intimidation that you have been speaking of was intimidation on the part of Conservative proprietors; are you not aware that there was also considerable intimidation on the part of the people brought to bear upon the voters?—There was of a certain description.

8513. Did they not visit the houses of voters at night and threaten them with personal violence?—Yes, they did; but before I pass away from that, I may say that the intimidation was of a different kind. The object of the landlord intimidation was to coerce the tenant to vote against his principles; I speak now of the Liberal and Catholic tenants. The object of the popular voice and the popular intimidation was, to make the tenant not yield to the landlord coercion. I never knew an instance during the entire election in which any man was asked to vote against his principles by the popular party, at least within the whole locality that I visited. They were only asked to vote in accordance with their principles, and not to yield to the landlord coercion, and I would make that great distinction between the two.

8514. Has it not come to your knowledge that in some parts of the country voters were threatened whose convictions went the other side?—Yes; there were one or two instances, I think, of that.

8515. You stated, I think, that the voters were visited by night, and threatened with personal violence; do you think in many instances that was done with the knowledge of the voters, and to form an excuse to their landlords?—I know that it was.

8517. Are you not aware that the Liberal candidate was, on several occasions, requested by voters to send people at night to threaten them?—I know that he and others were; and I might refer to a deputation that waited upon myself, something between the hours of 12 and 2 at night; I was called up, and this was a deputation from a certain number of tenants, who begged that I would send some people to carry them away, and this as a covert against the threats of the landlord.

8518. Do you remember the particular instance of a man, who not only asked that a party should be sent to threaten him, but also gave the particular way in which he should be threatened?—Yes; I remember one instance in particular of that description, in which a man requested that a certain description of violence should be offered him. He said that he was to be carried out and shaken well, but that care should be taken not to hurt him.

8519. In many instances they broke windows and did other damage, did they not, to show that they were really threatened?—They did.

8520. In many instances were not those people who went by night to the voters composed of the sons and relatives of the voters themselves?—Yes.

8521. This was done, was it not, in order that the voter might have an excuse with the landlord for voting against him?—Yes, certainly. There were some instances in which it was real, but very few.

8522. Besides this direct intimidation, were not the military and the police used very much in taking in the voters before the election day in the the county of Sligo?—They were; and I think that it had a very bad effect.

8523. Have you got the Parliamentary Return upon that subject?—Yes.

8524. Will you look at page 15 of that Return, and do you see there a letter from a magistrate in that county?—Yes.

8525. Will you read it?—It is dated Holly Brook, 18th November 1868. "Sir, I have to request that you will give me an escort to protect voters proceeding from Ballinafad to Sligo, on the morning of Monday, November 23rd. I consider that 20 men will be sufficient, and that it will not be necessary for them to go further than Collooney, unless any unexpected opposition should be offered. I have also applied for an escort of the Royal Irish Constabulary."

8526. What paper is that?—It is a paper which was ordered by the House of Commons to be prepared the 3rd of May 1869.

8527. Is the letter which you have read signed by a magistrate of the county?—Yes.

8528. It is dated the 18th of November 1868, and the election for the county of Sligo was on the 30th, was it not?—Yes.

8529. So that more than 10 days before the election the landlords in that county commenced to take proceedings for getting in the voters?—Yes.

8530. I believe you were yourself a witness to the proceedings of some of those military escorts?—Yes, I was.

8531. Upon the 24th, that is to say six days before the polling day, did you meet the escort about which this correspondence is chiefly concerned coming out of the town of Ballymote?—Yes.

8532. You met it accidentally, did you not?—Yes.

8533. Will you look at page 13 of the Return; does not it appear from that page that that escort was sent out simply upon the letter of the Conservative candidate, Mr. Cooper?—Yes.

8534. Will you read that letter?—"Markree Castle, 22nd November 1868. Sir,—Major Ormsby Gore's under agent, Mr. Charles Lang, will call on you to-morrow to devise means for getting in the voters from the more distant part of the estate; they will require protection, and I trust you will be good enough to grant him an escort.—Edward Henry Cooper."

8536. Was there a magistrate along with it?—No.

8537. Was there no one with the police except the under agent?—No one, except the under agent, Mr. Charles Lang, and he sat on the same car with the sub-inspector.

8538. When you met this escort accidentally, did you return along with them to see what they were going to do?—Yes.

8539. What was it that they did?—They drove to the house of the first voter which met them on the way; the sub-agent first got off the car, and went towards the house; I entered with him, and he asked was the voter in; the voter's wife said, "No"; he then said that he came to take him to the Conservative houses, that is to say, the houses that he had prepared for the voters in Ballymote. However, he was refused.

8540. Then they went to the houses of all the voters on that property, did they not, and asked any of them that were willing to come along with them?—They did all, with the exception of two, I think.

8541. Did they get any voters to go with them?—Not one, they all refused.

8542. How far did those voters live from the town of Ballymote?—About six miles, at least a portion of them.

8543. And six days before the polling day this escort went out to those people who lived so short a distance from Ballymote?—Yes.

8544. Are you aware whether those voters who were thus visited had any idea whatsoever that the escort was coming out, or that they were to be taken to Ballymote?—I know that they had not, for they told me so distinctly.

8545. It appears that they all refused to go with the escort?—Yes; I should say that I did not ask all, but I asked most of them, did they ask for protection, and they all told me distinctly that they did not; and they told me also that they did not know that the escort was coming.

8546. Did any of them go with the escort?—Not one; it is mentioned in this table that one voter went under their protection, but that voter did not belong to Mr. Gore's property; he was a Protestant and a Conservative, living on another property; and I should add that I met that man some two or three days afterwards with two friends canvassing the Catholic and Liberal voters over another estate, clearly showing that he did not go with the troops from any fear, else he would not have returned and have gone out canvassing.

8547. Did not you meet another escort on the 27th of November?—I did.

8548. And this escort marched a number of voters into Ballymote, did it not?—Yes.

8549. Did it go the direct road to Ballymote?—No, it went by a circuitous route, double as long as the direct road.

8550. And they marched the voters round that long distance several days before the polling?—Yes.

8551. What was the general opinion as to the object of that marching them such a long distance around?—That it was done for display, and the people were convinced that it was to indicate that Government intimidation was combining with landlord intimidation, and that the one was made use of to supplement the other, and hence a great deal of evil accrued. The people believed that the Government were so far supplementing the landlord intimidation, and they came to the conclusion then that their experience was correct in imagining that the Government was, as a matter of course, against them, and labouring in the interest of the landlords and the gentry.

8552. Is not that the feeling which leads very much in Ireland to revolutionary proceedings?—I believe so.

8553. The people there generally regard the Government as their enemy, do they not?—Yes, if we except the Government now holding office.

8554. Does not the employment of the military and civil force of the country in this way tend very much to strengthen this opinion?—Certainly, and it did do so.

8555. You have got an abstract of this return; how many escorts were sent out during that election?—Twenty-four were sent out.

8557. Were five sent out without being on sworn information?—Yes.

Rev. J. McDermot.

15 June 1869.

8558. Was one called for by telegraphic message?—Yes; but it was refused.

8559. How many were proved to have gone out on sworn information?—I think there were 14.

8560. And is it the case that 14 cannot be shown to have escorted any voter at all?—Yes.

8561. And three were stated to have escorted none?—Yes.

8562. One was sent out to escort 80 or 100; with what result?—Yes; one escort which was sent out to carry in or to protect 80 or 100 voters, carried in fact only three; there were 20 constabulary, 20 infantry, and 30 cavalry, sent out for that number, and they only carried in three in all.

8563. Will you look at page 9 of that Return; do you see there the information sworn by a man called William Magee?—Yes.

8564. Are you acquainted with any circumstances connected with the escort which was sent out upon that information of William Magee?—I am; that escort went out on the 27th; it is here given as having gone out on the 29th; it was sworn on the 27th, and I know it went out on the 27th, on Friday; it went out after dark, about two hours at least after dark; there was no magistrate with the escort; there was no result; all the voters refused to be protected by them, or to be carried in by them. The place where the escort went was only three miles or so from the polling town, Sligo.

8565. The police were sent out by night to bring in voters that were living within three miles of the town of Sligo on the 27th, the election being on the 30th?—Yes; and without any magistrate.

8566. Most of those escorts that were sent out on sworn informations were sent out on informations not coming from the voters themselves but from others?—That is so; there were only two cases in which the application was made from the voter himself.

8567. By what class of persons were the informations made?—Generally by sub-agents and agents.

8568. It appears in page 8 of this Return, that there is an information from a person named Lockhart of Killery; he was steward to Mr. Griffith, a gentleman of that county?—Yes, he swears.

8569. He states in this information that, by the direction of Mr. Griffith, he went to the electors to solicit their support in favour of the two Conservative candidates; the electors promised to vote as he asked them, and he swears that they were afraid to come in, and called for an escort?—Yes.

8570. Are you not aware that Mr. Griffith, although politically opposed to Mr. O'Conor, is a personal friend of his?—I am aware of that.

8571. Have you seen a letter which Mr. Griffith wrote to Mr. O'Conor, in which he states that he never asked his tenants for more than one vote?—I have; he distinctly states that he only asked for one vote.

8572. And this information by his steward to the contrary was sworn, was it not, before the conducting agent of the Conservative candidate?—Yes.

8573. Was not it the general belief that all those informations were considered as a mere matter of form, and were drawn up at the agent's office?—Yes; all of them, so it was believed.

8574. You have stated before, that the effect of sending out the military and the police was very bad upon the country; did not the voters believe, in most instances, that if they were, what they generally called, "taken by the police," they would be obliged to go with them?—Yes; because they said that they thought that they could not resist the combined influence of the Government and the landlord intimidation.

8576. I suppose that the priests, yourself among the number, addressed the people frequently in their chapels, upon the subject of the election?—Yes.

8577. Do you approve of this as a general rule?—As a general rule I do not; but under the circumstances of the last election, I think it was quite permissible, because I believe that the issue of the election was not the disendowment or the disestablishment of the Church, nor yet tenant right, but was peace or rebellion.

8578. You believe that the only means of diverting the people from Fenianism and revolutionary ideas was to call their attention to constitutional action?—Yes, I do.

8579. Do you think that if the priests refused to take an interest in political subjects, the result would be a great spread of Fenian projects and ideas?—I do, decidedly.

8580. When you addressed the people in your chapels, was not the purport of your address, that the people should vote in accordance with their convictions, and yield to no pressure of any sort?—Certainly, I always told them to vote according to their convictions, and that if their principles led them to prefer the Conservatives they should vote for them.

8581. You never, either directly or indirectly, nor did you hear that any clergyman either directly or indirectly, attempted to make a Conservative, for instance, vote for a Liberal?—Never; and I must say, that some of the Conservatives complimented me on never having done so in any single instance; and I have not heard of any priest in the county of Sligo having done otherwise.

8582. Did not the priests in your district offer, in the first instance, not to interfere in any way in the election if the landlords would state that their tenants might vote according to their convictions?—I wrote in my own name, and the name of the priests of the locality, to most of the influential landlords of that district, saying that, according to the British law, the franchise should be free, and also that we should remember the principle to do to others as we should wish to be done by, and I asked them, upon these grounds, to leave the tenants free, and I would give them any guarantee they wished, that I and my brother priests would not interfere, directly or indirectly, with reference to the then coming election; but one replied, and the burden of his reply was an attack upon me for having canvassed, as he said, with the Liberal candidate over even his property.

8583. Do you think that, as a general rule, the Catholic priests would be very glad if no reason existed for their appearing at all at the elections?—I am sure of it.

8584. In many instances at present, are they not forced into it by the feeling of the people?—Certainly, and at the last election there were various instances of that.

8585. Do you think that the priest's influence is merely spiritual, or is it due to his representing the opinions of the mass of the people in his parish?—Chiefly in the latter sense; his spiritual influence is nothing, or scarcely anything, with reference to election matters.

8586. If a priest went counter to the general prevailing ideas of his parishioners, do you think that he would have any very great influence?—None whatsoever of an effective character.

8587. Have there not been in Ireland on many occasions instances of that?—Yes; I can give several instances.

8588. Have there been instances in which the priest went counter to the popular feeling, and had no influence at all?—Yes, I have known cases in which they have had no influence. There was one instance at the last general election where a priest went against the people, and the people were so indignant with him that they punished him severely for it.

8589. When you say "punished," will you explain what you mean?—They refused to give him his ordinary dues.

8590. And in many instances are you perfectly aware that the priests were actually forced on by popular pressure to take part in elections?—Certainly, in various instances.

8591. For the reasons that you have stated, do you believe really that at present such a thing as freedom of election exists in Ireland?—I do not believe it does; I believe that there is no such thing, really speaking, as free voting.

8593. Do you think that, if the ballot were established, the power of the priests, as priests, would thereby be increased?—No, on the contrary. The power of the priest as a counsellor might remain, but the great power by which landlord intimidation is neutralised, namely, the influence of public, would cease; and that is really the influence by which landlord intimidation is neutralised. It is the fear of the people, not of the priest. I remember an instance in which I advised a man myself, privately, not to vote for the Liberal candidate, because under the circumstances I did not think he was bound to do so; still he did both, simply from the fear of the public. Again and again men refused to vote for the Liberal candidate in my own presence, and afterwards they voted for him because the public influence was brought to bear upon them.

8594. And it is more the fear of the non-electors, that is the counteracting influence to the landlord's power, than the actual advice of the priests?—Not a doubt of it.

8595. It has been stated in this Committee by some witnesses that, if the ballot were established, the priest could discover how a man voted, although all other persons could not; do you agree with that opinion?—Decidedly not.

8596. Do you think that if a man voted contrary to the views which the priest took, he would afterwards tell the priest how he voted?—He would not; I know one instance where a man promised Mr. O'Conor to vote for him in my presence and in the presence of another, and afterwards, when he thought well to change his mind, he denied it. When I drew his attention to his promise, he denied having made the promise at all. In several instances, also, persons volunteered to vote for Mr. O'Conor in private, but refused in public to do so, as they intended, I believe, to break their promise.

8598. Would it not be contrary to the principles of the Church for the priest to put questions of this description in the confessional?—Yes.

8599. If the priest were to put such a question would not the penitent have a perfect right to refuse to answer it?—Yes; and if I were the penitent I would refuse to answer it.

8600. Supposing, however, that a person in the confessional did voluntarily tell the priest how he voted, could this knowledge be afterwards made any use of by the clergyman?—No; it would be considered one of the greatest crimes that any Catholic priest could commit.

8601. Would it be the most grievous crime that a priest could commit in the eyes of the Church to divulge or make any use of what was told him in the confessional?—It would be a most grievous crime.

8602. Therefore you distinctly state, that if the ballot were established, the confessional could not in any way be used as a means of discovering how a man voted under the ballot?—Certainly it would not.

8603. If the ballot were established, this dread that the voters have of the non-electors would, of course, be done away with, would it not?—Clearly so.

8604. A system has been proposed to this Committee of having voting by voting papers, instead of the present system; to what do you think that would lead?—It would lead to the increase of the landlord's power; it would leave the tenant quite the victim of the landlord; there is no doubt about it.

8605. And the people then would begin to give up all idea of taking part at all in elections?—Yes, and they would turn at once to revolutionary projects, I am convinced.

8606. The voting paper system exists at present with respect to the election of Poor Law guardians; are you aware whether or not it is very often abused at those elections?—Very often; I never knew an instance in which there was a contest in which it was not abused, the papers being falsified and tampered with invariably.

8607. Is the influence of the landlord and the priest also brought to bear in signing those papers?—Yes.

8608. So that you do not believe, that by establishing voting papers, those influences would be done away with?—I think not; if they were signed in open court, that would only be multiplying difficulties; if they were signed before a magistrate, then the agent and the landlord being generally magistrates, could have taken them signed before themselves, and if they were signed before the stipendiary magistrates it would be often still worse, because the stipendiary magistrate is frequently very Conservative, and indicates his Conservative principles just as much as any other man. The contrary is true if he were a Liberal, of course.

8609. Do you think that the only effectual means of promoting that which does not exist at present, namely, freedom of election, would be by the establishment of the ballot?—Yes, if due secrecy were observed.

8610. How do you mean if due secrecy were observed?—If it were so conducted as that no tenant could make known to the priest or to the landlord how he voted, except by his word only, that is to say, if he could not give any other proof except that of his word how he voted.

8611. Sir Frederick Heygate.] I think you said that you took great interest in the elections; how far did you carry that interest; did you attend personally on the hustings or at the polling booth?—Yes.

8612. In what capacity did you attend in the polling booth?—Merely as a friend; I was in and out of the booth.

8613. Is it the case that anyone is allowed to be in the polling booth except in an official capacity?—Yes, certainly; I asked that question distinctly of the sub-sheriff, and he said that I had a perfect right to be there as well as every other man; it is open to the public he told me.

8614. Then did you stand in the polling booth during the whole time the polling was going on, or the greater part of the time?—No, not in the polling booth, I was alternately in the street and in the booth.

8615. But you saw the electors coming up to the poll and giving their votes?—Yes.

8616. You stated just now, I think, that the Liberal and the Catholic principles were always the same; is that your opinion?—No, I did not say that, I think, I said Liberal and Catholic were generally so; but I did not mean to say that they were always the same, because some Catholics are Conservative.

8619. I understood you to say that unless the disendowment and disestablishment of the Church and the tenant right were carried, it would be a question between peace and war?—No, I did not say that; I said that the issue was not the disendowment, nor was the issue the tenant right, but the issue of the general election was, in my opinion, peace or rebellion.

8620. Peace or rebellion would depend upon whether those questions were carried, would it it not?—Yes; I said that the real issue in my mind was this.

8621. Would you be kind enough to explain what you mean by tenant right?—It is so important a question that I should not like to give an opinion without deep consideration.

8622. Is it your belief yourself, that the Government intended to intimidate the voters by those escorts, and by the employment of the constabulary and the soldiers?—I believe that the Conservative candidates and the Conservatives of the county did so intend. Whether the Government or the executive really so intended or not I cannot judge, but I believe that such was the intention of those who sent out the force.

8623. Do you attribute to the Government the intention to intimidate the voters by the employment of the military at the last election?—I attribute that to the officials of the Government in Sligo, certainly, without any doubt whatever; I attribute it to the stipendiary magistrate and to the high sheriff, as far as I can judge.

8624. Were there several stipendiary magistrates employed in the election for the county?—Yes; but one made himself more remarkable so than the others.

8625. Then you attribute to one stipendiary magistrate in particular, or perhaps more than all, an intention to strain the powers of the law with a view to the intimidation of the voters?—Yes; as far as I can judge. I have no means of judging, except merely from the instances that were put before me. I do think it scarcely fair for me to give an opinion, inasmuch as I was not behind the curtain and could not know what influenced them. All I speak about is the effect; and the effect would certainly lead anyone to suppose that the escort was sent out in an hostile spirit.

8626. Are you speaking now of one particular stipendiary magistrate?—Yes, I think that one stipendiary magistrate was much more hostile to the Liberal candidates in Sligo. I do not speak now merely of the county, but of both the county and the borough elections. I think there was one more hostile to us than the rest; at least, such is the general impression.

8627. Did he exceed the powers of his office in any way, to your knowledge?—That is a matter of opinion, and I do not like to express an opinion; I do not like to be invidious, and to mention names unless it be necessary.

8628. Have you had a long experience of the county of Sligo?—I have had a long experience of it, though I have been only for the last four years a priest in Sligo. Before that I had been away; some 11 years since I was for one year a priest in the county, then I left, and returned four years since.

8629. Did you take any part in any previous contested election?—No, because I was not a priest at any former election.

8630. There had been no contested election in the county of Sligo before, I believe?—No, not for a long time. I was but a boy when there was a contested election before.

8631. You stated that escorts were sent out without being accompanied by a magistrate; do you believe that those escorts were sent out without a previous application to the Government having been made by a magistrate?—They were sent out without sworn information. I do not think that any were sent out without a previous vious application of some sort or other, verbal or written, sworn or otherwise.

8632. But is it not the case, that in every instance, where troops are ordered to be employed, there is always a previous requisition sent by a magistrate to the Government?—To the high sheriff; all I know is, that in various instances, I see from this report, they were not sent out upon sworn information; some sort of application, of course, was made.

8633. Chairman.] When did you accompany the first escort that you spoke of?—The first escort that I met was on the 24th.

8634. I understood you to say that the sub-agent visited each house on the estate in question?—Yes.

8635. Was he on those visits accompanied by the troops?—The troops came into the second house, and some one or two of the police entered with us, and there was an improper observation, at least we considered it so, made by one of those police. The gentleman who accompanied me complained of it to the officer, in the presence of the policeman; the officer then prohibited the men entering in future.

8636. Do you know who was the person who ordered this escort to go out?—Major Percy, a resident magistrate.

8637. On the application of the candidate's friends?—Of the candidate himself, Colonel Cooper.

8638. He had no power, had he, of sending out this escort, without direct application to the Irish Government?—Yes, he had.

8639. You stated, I think, that they brought in no voters at all?—Except one, and he was not of that locality.

8640. In your opinion, what was the object of this escort?—In my opinion, it was to carry away the people, and that was the universal opinion that they were sent out for the purpose of supplementing landlord intimidation; they found that landlord intimidation could not cope with the popular feeling, and then to supplement landlord power they sent out the troops; at least, that was the universal opinion.

8641. You think, then, that it was desired to give the voters the impression that the escort were coming to take them to the poll?—Decidedly, for some of them told me so; they said they would not go if they could help it.

8642. This system failed, did it not?—Entirely.

8643. To what do you attribute its failure?—Because the voters were determined not to go with them. We persuaded them that they were not bound to go, and that no one could force them; that the habeas corpus was not suspended for them. The result was that they refused to go, because in the first place they found that they were not bound to go, and in the second place their feelings went with the Liberal candidate; and again, I am sure that the popular voice had an influence upon them. I think these are the chief reasons.

8644. Did those voters stay away altogether, or did they vote after all?—They all voted for the Liberal candidate; they gave him one vote.

8645. Do you think that it was your presence that helped to cause this movement to fail?—I am sure it was not.

8646. The voters would equally have resisted the pressure if you had been absent?—Certainly, if they knew that they had the power to remain at home.

8647. Did you tell them that they had the power?—Yes, always; and that was my chief reason for going.

8648. Then that may have had some effect in keeping them at home?—Yes; I thought that your Lordship, in the former question, referred to my influence as effecting this.

8649. Was it the fact that your being present, and telling a man that he was not obliged to go, and that the troops could not take him, may have had some effect?—I think that my telling him so had an effect, no doubt; but I do not think that my presence had any other effect upon him.

8650. You stated that there were some cases of mob intimidation, but you think that in all cases it was exercised upon voters who wished to vote for the Liberals, but who were under the fear of landlord coercion?—I did not say in all cases, but generally I think so.

8652. Do you not think that, supposing a Roman Catholic voter was conscientiously a Tory, still he would be exposed to mob intimidation?—I do not think he would, because again and again I have told any such to vote with the Conservatives, and I never heard that any one questioned my right to announce this, or disputed the propriety of this act of mine.

8653. At any rate, there would be a very small chance in this county of a Roman Catholic voter who stated that he was a Tory being believed, would there?—If he stated it on that occasion, and did not indicate by past acts that he was such, he would scarcely be believed.

8654. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I think you said that there had been several cases where the populace had visited the houses of different voters?—Yes.

8655. Had many of those visits occurred before there was the application for an escort of troops?—Yes.

8656. Do not you think it is reasonable to suppose that that escort was applied for in order to show the voters that they would have the protection of the soldiers if they chose to vote for the Conservatives?—I do not think so.

8657. You talked about this escort being asked for 10 days before the election; what could have been the object of getting this escort 10 days before the election?—To take them into the houses which the Conservatives had prepared for them.

8658. Do you mean to say that those voters were to be kept there 10 days before the election?—Yes, certainly they were.

8659. Had there been many stormy meetings of the Liberal candidates?—There had been a good many public meetings.

8660. And had threats been used to voters who intended to vote for the Conservatives?—No, none to my knowledge.

8661. Did you yourself visit any of those meetings?—A good many, the greater portion of them.

8662. Did you take any part in them?—Yes; I think I spoke at almost every one of them.

8663. I need hardly ask you were you strongly in favour of the Liberal candidate?—Certainly; but I never said anything unconstitutional, nor did I hear any one make use of such.

Rev. J. McDermot.

8664. Did you tell them what you told us to-day, that peace or rebellion was the issue of that election?—I did not; but I told them again and again, that I believed that the spirit of England had changed very much, because that Fenianism had demonstrated to the English people that we had really grievances, and that the English people were sufficiently honest, when once they knew of them, to wish to give us remedies and to redress our grievances.

8665. Had there been any case of Fenianism in the county of Sligo?—There were a good many sympathisers with Fenianism.

8666. Were there any trials? Yes; some men were taken up.

8667. Were they tried at the Sligo assizes?—I do not know; some of them were brought off to Dublin; a good many were taken up for Fenianism; I remember being at the trials myself, of people who were accused of Fenianism, and the cases were remanded, and the prisoners sent off to gaol, a good many of them.

8668. Have you a congregation?—I have two churches in my parish.

8669. Are they in country districts or in town?—I was then in a country district.

8670. Have you changed your district since the election?—Yes.

8671. How is that done in the Roman Catholic Church?—By the Bishop.

8672. Did he assign any reason for changing you?—No; he changed me, I presume, because he was interested in me, and he thought I would be better off.

8673. Was the change made an advantage to you?—Yes.

8674. Were you consulted as to the way in which the different members of your flock should give their votes?—Yes, very often.

8675. Mr. Raikes.] I think you told us just now, that in Ireland Liberalism is considered to be identical with Roman Catholicism very much?—I said that Roman Catholicism was identified with true Liberalism.

8676. Are you acquainted with the case of an Irish county at the last election, where there was a Liberal candidate who had been a great admirer and friend of General Garibaldi's?—I remember an instance of that, but I am not acquainted with that county.

8677. He did not succeed, I believe?—He did not.

8678. He was not supported by the priests, was he?—No, he was not, I believe; I only know that from the papers.

8679. Consequently he was obliged to withdraw?—Yes; if I remember right, a Conservative was not selected, but another Liberal was selected.

8680. But this gentleman was obnoxious to the priests, because he was a friend of Garibaldi's?—He was not obnoxious merely to the priests, but he was obnoxious to the whole body of the people.

8681. In some parts of Ireland Roman Catholicism is not quite considered identical with Liberalism, I believe?—It is always identical with true Liberalism, but of course, if a person makes himself personally objectionable, that person would not be selected; a Catholic, therefore, will not always support the Liberal candidate, but he will generally support true Liberalism.

8682. This gentleman was no worse a Liberal because he happened to be a friend of Garibaldi's?—So, you may think, but still there were personal objections to him; but you can understand very well that there is a difference between Liberalism and a Liberal person; Liberalism is an abstract term; the other is concrete, and that makes all the difference; there might be other reasons for not wishing to have him besides his being a Liberal; it might be in spite of his Liberalism that he was rejected.

8683. The Liberalism of Ireland, therefore, is of a special character, and has more reference to special matters?—No, I do not think it is so; they would object to a Liberal perhaps, because they had some personal objections to him.

8684. The gentleman to whom I refer was a gentleman who had been a Liberal candidate?—Yes, I know him; you refer to Mr. Jones.

8685. Mr. James.] You stated just now, that under no circumstances would a priest divulge the way a man had voted if he learnt it by means of the confessional; does that proceed from any rule laid down for your guidance, or would it be a matter for the discretion of the priest?—It is a rule laid down for our guidance; it is taught us in all our theology, that it would be a sin against the natural, Divine, and ecclesiastical law, to divulge a secret known from the confessional.

8686. But with reference to obtaining a knowledge of the secret, does that result from your own discretion, or from any rule that is laid down for your guidance?—It would be considered wrong to ask a person how he voted, simply because his voting for this man, or that man, may not at all be a crime, and you are only justified in the confessional in speaking about sins.

8687. That is to say, his voting may not be a crime, but you have just told us that the priests were sometimes consulted as to the way a man should vote; supposing a man promised to vote for one candidate, and you had reason to believe he had broken his promise and voted for another, and that he had told a falsehood about his voting, would it not be your duty to inquire whether he had told that falsehood?—It would be my duty perhaps to inquire whether he had told a lie, but no more, and I must say that the direct duty is the penitent's, not the priest's; it is the penitent's duty to tell what crimes he has been guilty of, and it is not the direct duty at all of the priest to inquire.

8688. Is it not your duty, if you suspect that a man tells a falsehood, to inquire from him whether he has done so?—I should say it would be my duty, strictly speaking, to ask him, did he tell a lie, but it certainly would not be my duty to ask him what was the lie about.

8689. But you and your penitent would know to what you were referring?—Certainly not; it would not necessarily follow at all that the confessor would know, if he knew that the penetent had told a lie, that would suffice for the confessions.

8690. Am I to take it as the result of your evidence, that if there were such secret voting, the Roman Catholic priesthood would not obtain a knowledge of how a person had voted?—As a rule I am sure they would not; I am sure that if any priest were to teach openly or publicly that he considered it necessary to put such questions, questions, the Bishop would condemn him; and I asked the Bishop whether such was the case, and he said he would do so. I then put this question to him, "If you knew a priest publicly declare that it was necessary to put those questions would you censure him"? and he said, he would.

8691. Of your own knowledge, have you known priests address their flocks from the altar on Sunday previous to an election, in relation to the coming election?—Yes.

8692. In your experience, are they words always of counsel only or words somewhat stronger, words of denunciation if they do not vote in a particular way?—Words of counsel and not of denunciation.

8693. And no epithets applied or strong words used?—I wish you would tell me what description of epithets you mean; if you mean to ask, it would be said to them that they were traitors to their country by voting against their honest principles; that expression might be made use of, but no spiritual threats, certainly.

8694. Would there be no advice from the priest that if they voted in one way they would be in spiritual danger?—No.

8695. Nothing of that kind?—No; not to my knowledge during the election, or during the canvass, or since Mr. O'Conor declared his intention to stand for the county.

8696. Not only that, but in your general experience has that been so?—Yes.

8697. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Meetings are frequently held after church in the churchyards, are they not, by the candidates?—On a very few occasions there were; but in the cases in which they were not, it was not because it was supposed that there would be anything wrong in holding them in the churchyard.

8698. But it is the fact that meetings are held in the churchyard after mass, and the candidates themselves attend, and probably the priests take part in the meeting?—Yes.

8699. It is usual also for this meeting to take place between the day of nomination and the polling day, is it not?—No, generally before; I never knew an instance in which it was between the two; as a rule it is before the nomination day.

8700. There is always a Sunday between the nomination day and the polling day, is there not, if possible?—Yes; there is very often.

8701. And that is held to be advantageous to the candidates?—As a general rule, I think they would not hold a meeting on such a day as that.

8702. The meetings are held before?—Yes.

8703. Still the fact is, that there is usually a Sunday intervening between the day of the nomination and the polling day?—Yes; there is, generally speaking.

8704. And on that Sunday, probably, the advice which you speak of is given to the people?—Yes.

8705. Is that the case more immediately before the day of the polling?—Yes; that advice would be given on that day, as well as every other day.

8706. Is it always given on that day?—I would not say that it is always given, but as a matter of fact, I think it is; at least, it was during the last election.

8707. And that advice is not only advice referring to a man's duty to his country, but to a man's duty to his church as well, probably?—On the last occasion, I think, very often such was introduced. They generally said, "Your country and your church."

8708. So that a man who was a good Catholic, would feel it to be his duty to follow the advice which was given to him?—He might consider himself a very good Catholic without.

8709. Mr. Graves.] Did you yourself address the congregation in church on Sunday on political subjects?—Yes.

8710. More than once?—Yes, frequently; but I should say that if time permitted it, I would prefer to do it outside, but time did not permit it.

8711. Mr. Whitbread.] You have told us of many cases in which you knew that landlords had used threats in order to intimidate the tenants to vote in a certain direction; do you know many cases in which those threats have been carried into execution by the eviction of tenants, or the doubling of the rent, or anything of that sort?—There are some few instances, but as a general rule they do not pass beyond threats.

8712. That was intimidation on the side of the landlords only?—Yes, merely.

8714. I refer not to the remedy, but to the fact whether you do not think it is quite possible and probable that some man may go to the one side and say, "Intimidate me or else I shall be obliged to vote on the other side"?—I do not think generally at all that it was the fact, it is possible, but I judge from the feeling of the people that it could not have been so at the last election.

8715. The O'Conor Don.] Do not you think that very often the tenants, when the agent or landlord comes to their houses, do tell him that they are afraid to vote in accordance with his will on account of the people?—I am sure of it.

8716. And this may have had an effect upon the minds of the proprietors in desiring to get escorts for them?—Yes, that might be the reason, but I spoke about the effect it had upon the people; I did not speak about what might have been the true cause. That might have been the true cause or might not, but the effect which it had upon the people was the contrary. If the landlords, however, thought otherwise, they would, I think, have consented to my proposition that we, priests and landlords, should both observe neutrality.

8717. The people believe that the troops were sent out to coerce them?—Yes, that the troops were sent out to support landlord intimidation.

8718. But it is quite possible that the landlords might have sent them out believing these statements, which were very generally made by the tenants, that they were afraid to vote according to the landlord's wish?—Yes, I believe the tenants told the landlord that they were afraid to vote according to his wishes, and that they told the people the same, in fact they were serfs in the case.

Rev. J. McDermot.

8719. You stated that those threats of eviction and other threats used by landlords were not very generally carried into effect after the election; as a rule, do not you believe that the landlords in Sligo are popular and good landlords?—Yes, as landlords as a general rule they are good, with the exception of a few. Of course, there are some exceptions, but as a general rule they are good landlords.

8720. And you believe that those threats which they used before the election, they do not generally carry out after the election is over?—They did not on the last occasion, at least.

8721. You do not come here, therefore, to make any charge against the landlords of Sligo as to acts which they committed after the election?—No, I wish to attack a system, and certainly not individuals.

8722. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Was any complaint ever sent to the authorities at Dublin Castle against that resident magistrate that you spoke of?—I do not know, but I know that the people were very much incensed against him for some acts, and I know that he was censured publicly at a meeting by one of the speakers.

8723. Is it well known who you refer to in the whole county of Sligo?—I do not know; I hope not, however.

Lieutenant Colonel ROBERT RICHARD TORRENS, a Member of the House; Examined.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

8724. Chairman.] You are a Member for Cambridge, are you not?—Yes.

8725. Have you had any experience of political affairs in Australia?—Yes, I was a nominee member of the Legislative Assembly in South Australia, prior to the introduction of the constitution in that country, and I held the office of treasurer there, in virtue of which I had a seat in the Legislature, and in the Executive Council.

8726. Have you seen much of the elections there?—Yes. On the introduction of the new constitution in January 1856, I lost my office, as a matter of course; a responsible Government being introduced, and I then became a candidate for the representation of the city of Adelaide. I was elected on that occasion, and the ballot was then in operation. I had myself, as a nominee member of the Legislature, used all the powers that I possessed to oppose the introduction of the ballot. I entirely disapproved of it mainly upon the grounds upon which it is opposed by Mr. John Stuart Mill, and was opposed also by the late Lord Palmerston.

8727. But had any election then taken place in South Australia under the open system of voting?—Yes.

8728. What kind of elections?—They were, I think, exactly corresponding with the general elections at present in this country. We had there bribery, and a great deal of rioting, and broken heads, and broken panes of glass, and of smashing windows; exactly the same thing that goes on in this country, though, perhaps, more aggravated frequently than it is in England. There is a great deal of the Irish element in the rowing at elections there.

8729. But prior to the introduction of the new constitution, what was the body which was elected?—It was a mixed council, consisting of nominees of the crown, and elected members. The country was divided into electoral districts, and the nominee members and the elected members sat in the same council. After the introduction of the new constitution, nominees ceased altogether, both for the Upper Chamber and for the Lower Chamber, and the elective system was adopted in its integrity under the ballot in both cases.

8730. Under the old system elections were conducted there very much as they are here, were they not, with a good deal of riot and confusion?—Yes, I recollect a great deal of rioting in the city of Adelaide, broken heads, and men knocked down, and an immense amount of violence, houses half-wrecked, and a good deal of bribery also.

8731. What was the franchise before the new constitution?—I cannot exactly call to mind now what the franchise was, it is universal suffrage under the new constitution.

8732. Sir George Grey.] Was it a high qualification before?—No, it was not high.

8734. Was it notorious that a certain portion of the electors were open to bribery?—Yes.

8735. Was it notorious also that a great deal of money was spent in treating?—Yes.

8736. What has been the effect of the introduction of the ballot?—In the first instance the rioting has entirely disappeared, the election is conducted with such order and quietness that a stranger passing through the towns while an election is going on would scarcely now be aware that there was anything unusual taking place, everything is so orderly and quiet. Then as regards bribery, I think that has almost disappeared. There was a case of bribery brought forward a short time ago, but it was at once detected; a Mr. Dunn, I think his name was, paid the travelling expenses of some voters, which was contrary to the law and was treated as bribery, and he lost his seat in consequence, but I think that is the only case in which I can call to mind that there was even a suspicion or a rumour of anything of the kind taking place.

8737. How many elections have you seen conducted under the ballot?—I think four or five; I only stood one myself, for I left a political career shortly after I was returned.

8738. Has the ballot diminished the expenses of of candidates?—Very much indeed; I polled over 3,000 votes on the occasion on which I stood, and I think my expenses were under 200*l.*

8739. Was it a severe contest?—Yes, I headed the poll; at that time the city of Adelaide was all in one electoral division, it has since been divided, I think, into three; so that it was a large constituency. Every person was ambitious of being returned for the capital of the country, so that there was a severe struggle, and that was the amount of my costs, and I do not believe that anyone expended money on my account.

8740. Can you describe to the Committee the process of an election in South Australia, from the nomination to the declaration of the poll?—Yes, I will do so; the electoral roll is made up much as it is in this country, a considerable time before the election, annually, and copies of the roll are posted in public places, such as court-houses, market-houses, and places of that sort, for general inspection. Any person may object to any voter's name that is upon that list, and any person not finding his name upon that list, and believing himself entitled to vote, can make application to get his name put upon it. The list is then finally settled; objections are considered and appeals to be put on are considered. I think it is by the magistrates, I forget now exactly, but I think it is the stipendiary magistrates who carry on that.

8741. The magistrates are all stipendiary magistrates?—Yes, they are all stipendiary magistrates.

8742. Sir George Grey.] How long an interval elapses between the issue of the writ and the nomination?—I cannot exactly call to mind. Mr. Dutton has got the Act with him, and he will supply those minute details. I cannot recollect the exact time that is required to elapse between the issuing of the writ and the nomination, but the Act will be put in in evidence. The candidates are not allowed to address the constituents for a space of, I think, two days before the nomination, so as to prevent any rioting or disturbance. It was three days originally, and the period has been shortened. Then the nomination takes place in this way; an elector presents to the returning officer in a public place, the hustings, for instance, the written nomination of the candidate whom he proposes, and another elector seconds it; and a letter is given in from the proposed candidate expressing his willingness to stand at the election, and if there be only as many candidates as there are seats, of course the thing is then and there at an end, and no poll is called for.

8743. When is this nomination?—On the day fixed for the election. There is no addressing the populace by the candidates from the hustings as in this country, and therefore no rioting or disturbance; none of that scene that takes place here is witnessed there. Then, if there be more candidates than there are seats, a poll takes place, and the principal poll-clerk who is in charge of the ballot-box takes his seat in a public booth. There are scrutineers appointed by the several candidates to watch the proceedings on their part. The voter enters this room; it is a public room, and anyone can be present; he gives his name; he then is handed a voting card; the scrutineers then see that he is the man whom he represents himself to be in order to prevent personation, and the candidates generally take care to employ scrutineers or watchers on their behalf; men who know the people well and know by sight most of the voters, and there is a check against personation in that way. The voter having received a voting card goes into a compartment like a sentry-box.

8744. Is this voting card given to him in blank?—It is given to him with the names printed upon it of the several candidates. There has also lately been introduced a little square opposite each name, and the voter has to put a cross in this square opposite the names of the parties for whom he intends to vote. He does that in a sentry-box sort of place, where nobody can see whose names he marks favourably and whose names he omits to mark. He is not allowed to put on the paper anything whatever, except this mark. In some places, I think, in the other colonies, they simply strike a pencil through the names of the candidates whom they do not desire to vote for, but it comes to precisely the same thing in the end. He then folds this card, and comes out and drops it into the ballot-box which is locked. There may be several polling places, and at the termination of the election all the ballot-boxes will be brought together, and those scrutineers then take out the papers and go through them, and tick off the number of votes for each candidate, and the result is publicly declared, and the candidates are elected. That is simply the process. Generally the scrutineers sit up nearly all night to get this thing done quickly, but sometimes in very widely-scattered districts the ballot-boxes do not come in for a day or two, so that there is a little delay about it.

8745. Chairman.] By whom are the numbers for each candidate counted, is it by the returning officer or by the scrutineers?—By the returning officer and the scrutineers, who sit up with him and see fair play on the part of the candidates.

8747. Do they see the cards?—They see the cards, but there is nothing on the card to identify who had put it in; it is impossible to discover; all the cards are alike; there is no means of checking it afterwards, or of discovering in any way who put in any particular card.

8748. What is done in the case of a voter who cannot read?—If he cannot read he cannot vote; if he cannot read the man's name he must lose his vote. I do not see how he can vote.

8749. Would it be contrary to law for him to fill up his card publicly if he wished?—Yes, I think it would.

8750. He would not be allowed to ask the scrutineers to fill it up for him?—I will not speak positively upon that matter, but I think he could not; I think, practically, a man who cannot read print is prevented from voting.

8751. Has any difficulty been found in working this system?—No, I have never heard of any in South Australia. I heard of a case in Tasmania of some attempt to set aside the ballot by an ingenious device, which was as follows: A voter had a card given him which somewhat resembled the voting card which he got from the returning officer, and he dropped this substituted card, which was blank, into the ballot-box, and he took out the card which he had himself received, and gave it to the agent of one of the parties outside, who got the next voter whom he could suborn or bribe to take this card. Of course, the agent put a cross opposite the names which he wished to be voted for. Then that voter brought out his card, having used the card which was given to the voter, who put in the substituted card; he brought out the one that was given to him, and so this agent outside could keep on a succession of cards which he himself could mark in that way. But it will be evident that that only gave a sort of half security to the party who was supposed to bribe or influence, because it would of course be in the power of the voter to put crosses opposite other names as well upon the same card, and thus all the security that is gained by that to the person bribing, or using improper influence is, that the voter must either vote as he is paid to vote, or influenced to vote, or not vote at all; it would always be in the power of the voter to nullify his own vote by scoring off all the names, and of course his vote would be of no use. That, however, was immediately detected; and, I believe, there has been no other instance of the kind; more vigilance is observed.

8752. Was the person who attempted to work this trick detected?—Yes, he was detected; and, I believe, punished.

8753. You are not aware of any cases in which the system has broken down, and the election has been declared void?—No, not of any; certainly not in South Australia. It worked with the greatest smoothness, and ease, and economy, insomuch that I would express the conviction, which was forced upon me, directly contradicting the argument of Mr. John Stuart Mill, in which he says that no person advocates the ballot, or ever has done so for itself, but simply as the lesser of two evils. Now, from practical observation of its working and its effects, I would advocate it for itself, for there is no bribery or intimidation, or coercion of any kind in South Australia. I would advocate it as the best and the most rapid and facile mode of carrying on elections.

8754. Is secrecy practically secured, or do a great number of the voters state openly which way they vote?—Since the ballot has been in operation for some time it is generally known how most persons vote. The fact is, that when that system is in operation for any length of time in a community, it appears that the idea of coercing, or bribing, or influencing, passes out of people's minds altogether. Such a thing has dropped out of mind as a thing impossible, and not to be thought of, and, practically, the people avow their political opinions, and they are always supposed to vote in accordance with them. No person there conceals his political opinions at all; everyone assumes that, and nobody scarcely is ever asked the question, how did you vote, or how did you not vote? Canvassing goes on to some extent, and people express their desire, and even promise to support such and such a candidate, but there is no means whatever of proving whether they ever fulfilled those promises or not.

8755. At first, when there were certain evils to be corrected, was the voting secret?—I think in all cases where secrecy was desirable for the security of the voter.

8756. What are the legitimate expenses which still fall upon the candidates?—They are very trifling; there is a little printing of addresses; an agent or two; but the sum never exceeds 100 l., I should say, except in a very large constituency, such as I stood for at that time. I believe that was one of the most expensive elections that ever occurred there.

8757. Do the candidates pay the expenses of the polling-beaths?—No, the public; they are very trifling, however; there is no erecting of hustings for the candidates to address mobs from, or anything of that kind.

8758. In your opinion, would the same system answer if adopted in the United Kingdom?—My experience in England, of course, has been derived principally from elections at Cambridge: I stood three contested elections at Cambridge, and my firm opinion is, that if the ballot was applied to that place, the effect would be that a much greater number of voters would vote than vote at present. There is an impression there, which I think is founded rather in imagination than in reality, that the greater portion of the halls and colleges, and the University, would exercise injurious dispositions towards voters who voted on the Liberal side. That idea, whether well founded or not, has, in that particular place, a very great effect; I should say there are quite a hundred voters that I meet with who would speak to me in this way: "Sir, I am a Liberal, and would desire to support you, but if I did so, I should endanger my position in connection with the college in some shape or other." Some are licensed to let lodgings to the college men, and others fear to lose their trade and business with their Conservative customers; and others, being college servants in different capacities, or even whose wives are washerwomen in the colleges, have got the impression, which I believe, as I said before, to be quite an exaggerated one, that injurious influences would be exercised against them. However, the practical result is that a very large number of the Liberal voters of that particular borough do not vote now at all, through the fear of being injured in their affairs in consequence of it. I believe that, under the ballot, those people would all vote. No doubt, there have been cases there, as elsewhere, probably of bribery and coercion, which, doubtless, would be put an end to also by the ballot.

8759. Do you think it would be possible in small constituencies, such as still exist in the United Kingdom, to maintain secrecy under this system?—Yes, I think it would; I think that the fact of such a law being in force would give an impulse to public opinion in a very forcible degree to prevent people even making inquiries of voters, with an invidious or improper object, as to how they voted. One can only judge of those matters by practical results, and that has been the result everywhere where the ballot has been fully and honestly brought into operation.

8760. I believe that there was a petition against your return, was there not?—Yes.

8761. Do you wish to make any statement as to the working of the Corrupt Practices Act, derived from your own experience?—Yes; I would venture to submit to the Committee that whereas the great benefit to be derived under that Act is, that it attaches some degree of infamy beyond what ever attached to it before, to corrupt and improper practices at elections; that is brought about by transferring to the judges of the ordinary courts the trial of election petitions, so that the accusation of having been guilty of those practices is a slur upon a man, and a disgrace to a degree that it was not before, and there appears to me to be a want of due consideration for the position of

Members

Members who are accused wrongfully without any grounds whatever. In all cases of a similar description, where the law is more or less of a penal character, there is some protection against frivolous charges being made against men to their great annoyance, and putting them to very heavy expenses, but there is none in this case. For instance, in a criminal charge, and in a great many civil cases also, the complainant has to verify the allegations on oath or by declaration in some sort that he really has reason to believe generally in the truth of the things that he alleges; but, with regard to an election petition, the man who is generally selected is a man of straw, to be a sort of buffer to the real prosecutor, who stands in the background. This man comes forward and signs his name to a stereotyped form, charging the sitting member with all sorts of malpractices, violence, and bribery, and all sorts of things, and he is not bound to swear to that. After an election, when people's feelings are excited in a moment of irritation, men come up to the defeated candidate, and say, "Oh, we will find out something against those fellows; you only hand a hundred pound or two to go through the ceremony of lodging the petition, and we will find out something against them." In that way men are led to lodge petitions and put innocent parties, who of course oppose those kind of practices, to very great expense and a vast amount of annoyance.

8762. Sir George Grey.] They do that at the peril of costs, do they not?—Yes, they do it at their own costs. There are certain very small costs to themselves in the first instance, because they will wait until they find that there are some grounds or other to proceed upon before they will engage eminent counsel. But a man put upon his defence upon a charge of that kind, may incur considerable expense in engaging the services of eminent legal men to defend his case, and thus they will throw upon the defendant very heavy expense in many cases.

8763. If the petition is withdrawn, has not the petitioner to pay the whole of the expenses out of the pocket of the defendant?—I have not found it so; there are always expenses as between attorney and client.

8764. I am speaking of a petition which is withdrawn, where the charges are not attempted to be substantiated?—The petition was withdrawn in my case, but the costs as between attorney and client are not included in what the defeated party has to pay, the costs allowed in the court did not cover the entire sum. I am of opinion that if the analogy of the law in civil cases were followed out, and the person accusing a member of those matters, were bound to make oath or affirmation to his belief generally in the truth of those charges, it would not deter petitions being filed where there was any real grounds, but it would be a reasonable protection to the sitting member; and again, in the case of revenue officers and others, there is always a clause for their protection, entitling them to double costs if the judge shall not certify that there was probable cause for the accusation. That would be a very reasonable protection to give to sitting members. Upon the same matter I would observe that where there are more candidates than one, the lodging of 1,000 l. is a very inadequate security for the costs; one-half of that, or possibly one-third, or one-fourth of it, would not be anything like sufficient to cover the costs, even if they were awarded by the court; and as in many cases the petitioner is a man of straw, it would be no use trying to recover any costs from that man. It appears to me, speaking with deference, that the judgment which was arrived at upon that matter, that the security should be only 1,000 l., where there are several candidates included in the same petition, is a very hard and erroneous one. The Irish judges, I find, took the opposite view, but they gave way in deference to the opinion of the English judges; I think that it would be well to have that point settled.

8765. Chairman.] Would not that rather tend to throw additional obstacles in the way of a petition?—I do not think that it would in the case of a real bonâ fide petition.

8767. Sir George Grey.] In South Australia, before the new constitution, what was the nature of the influence that was brought to bear upon voters, and which was lessened or altogether removed by the adoption of the ballot?—Treating was very largely used; drink was supplied with great freedom. There was also a general belief that there was direct bribery in money, and exactly the same kinds of influences as are in effect in operation in this country.

8768. Was intimidation one of those influences?—Yes.

8770. I think you mentioned that since the adoption of the ballot one member had been unseated for bribery; the bribery consisted in paying the expenses of the voter; in what way was that petition presented and prosecuted; how was it ascertained that the voter whose expenses he had paid voted for him?—I am sorry to say that I am unable to answer that question. I read an account of it in one of the newspapers, but I do not recollect the particulars.

8771. Do you know at all, when a petition is presented, in what way that petition is prosecuted; how is it ascertained that a member has obtained votes unduly, unless it is known for whom the votes are given?—No case of the kind occurred during all the years that I resided in Australia, and, therefore, I have no knowledge upon the matter, nor can I bear in mind the precise law, although I was engaged in carrying it out.

8772. Of how many members does the Lower House in Australia consist?—Thirty-six, and the Upper 12.

8773. Are there many contests?—Yes, very many; the seats are for the most part contested.

8774, In anticipation of a contest are committee-rooms engaged and are committees formed?—In some cases, but not generally. The usage is, to engage public rooms and sometimes rooms in public-houses in the different districts, and the candidates appoint nights at which they will meet the voters in those public rooms and explain their views, and answer all questions put to them; that is generally the case. There is scarcely any canvassing going on, but public meetings between the candidates and their constituents.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

8775. And are resolutions passed at those meetings, either approving or disapproving of the candidates?—Yes.

8776. So that there is a public expression of opinion on the part of the persons present at those meetings for or against the candidates?—Yes, almost identical with what takes place in this country under similar circumstances.

8777. Therefore, it is perfectly well known that the persons who adopt a resolution in favour of a particular candidate will vote for that candidate, unless they are dishonest?—It is assumed that they will.

8778. I understand you to say that secrecy does not practically prevail in South Australia, because it is perfectly well known that the constituents there do not generally conceal their opinions, and that they vote in accordance with those opinons?—Generally, men openly avow their opinions; but there are men who conceal them, who will never as a matter of principle, as violating the spirit of law, say how they voted; they will say, "I will never tell any man how I vote."

8779. Is it not the case that the ballot is a protection to a few only; but that with regard to the great majority it is perfectly well known how they vote?—It is a protection to those who need it; of course the majority of people who take an interest in politics are constantly advocating the different questions of the day, and they express their opinions upon them openly; there is no concealment of political opinion in the country.

8780. I understand you to say that the candidates were not allowed to address the electors for a certain number of days, immediately previous to the nomination?—That is the case.

8781. Therefore, no candidate could be nominated at the last moment; at least, he would have had no opportunity of making his opinions known?—No, he would not; a friend may speak for him, but he must not himself come forward; that is to say, upon the hustings.

8782. Why should not a candidate address a meeting the day before the nomination, as well as three days before; is there any reason for that, connected with the freedom of election?—It was supposed that it would tend to the quietness of the election, and that rioting and excitement, if they existed at all, would be discouraged and put an end to by that system.

8783. I understood you to say that the nomination takes place at a public hustings, as it does here, only that the candidates are not present and do not address the constituents; is that the case?—That is the case; it is a very quiet affair; very few attend; there is no excitement about it.

8784. After the polling is over, is there a public declaration of the state of the poll?—Yes; the mayor or the chief officer, whoever he is, that is appointed to be the returning officer declares that so-and-so is returned.

8785. Would the members be present on that occasion?—No, I have not known them to be present then.

8786. Are there no speeches made then?—No speeches are made then: they have made their speeches before; there are no hustings' addresses after the election, as in this country.

8787. Did I rightly understand you to say that the different electoral divisions were divided into polling districts, and that the poll is taken separately in each district?—The whole colony is thrown into one constituency for electing members for the Upper House. As to the Lower House the country is divided into electoral districts, and where those electoral districts are very wide, it being a thinly peopled country, there are two or three or four polling places established, as the necessity of the case requires, and some miles apart for the convenience of the voters.

8788. Is the result of the poll at each of those districts known, or only the aggregate result of the poll?—I think that the result at each of the polling districts is ultimately known, but the ballot-boxes are all brought together and examined by one scrutineer and one sworn officer, and they are sealed up and conveyed in charge of sworn and trustworthy persons.

8790. Is it the case that each candidate has in each of those polling districts an agent of his own to see that fair play is given him?—He may appoint them, but very frequently they do not. They have perfect reliance upon the good faith of the sworn officers of the Government; some will appoint a good many watchers on their behalf, if they are anxious or uneasy about the election. If they have reason to suppose that any people were going to attempt personation, for instance, they would get a number of faithful men, who would know every man's countenance in the district, to watch that no personation did take place.

8791. That would be the duty, would it not, of the sworn officer of the Government?—It would be his duty, but he would be aided in it.

8792. It might not be to the interest of the candidate to detect personation, if a man voted for him?—But it would be for the interest of the other candidate to detect attempted personation.

8793. How are the agents of those candidates to know to whom they are to object in the interest of their employer, if they do not know for whom the man was going to vote?—They would not, if they did not know how he was going to vote; but if they suspected it, they might put men on in that way.

8794. In point of fact, they do suspect, because they generally pretty well know for whom the man is going to vote in the majority of cases, do they not?—Yes; I think that in the majority of cases it is known how a man is going to vote, but not in all cases; but they might have a suspicion that some candidate was a man who was capable of using improper means to secure his seat, and having a vague suspicion of that kind, the opposing candidate would say, "Now, I will put men to watch that fellow and catch him out in his trick."

8795. Are petitions frequent against the return of members?—No, very unfrequent. I do not recollect hearing of any in South Australia except this of Mr. Dunn.

8796. As I understand, there are but 30 Members

Members in your Lower House?—I think it is either 30 or 36.

8797. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know that the agents of candidates have ever objected to persons personating voters?—I cannot call to mind any instance of that kind.

8798. You do not know whether it is the fact that objections have been made?—No; the law allows any person coming in to vote to be questioned as to his identity.

8799. But you know that candidates do appoint agents to prevent personation?—Yes; I have known one or two cases of that kind, but it is not essential.

8800. The fact that they appoint persons to prevent personation pre-supposes a knowledge of how a person is going to vote, does it not?—No; not a knowledge of how that person is going to vote; it pre-supposes a suspicion that the opposing candidate is capable of using improper means to secure his election, and they then put persons to watch to prevent those improper means, but they have no clue whatever to know how any individual is going to vote.

8801. Do you know about the number of the largest-sized constituency in South Australia?—The city of Adelaide when I was returned for it had about, I think, 30,000 inhabitants, and I think there were about 5,000 voters. I polled 3,000 and odd. I forget the exact number.

8802. You have told the Committee what your election cost you; but can you tell me whether at any election at Adelaide, or elsewhere in South Wales, other candidates have spent larger sums than you did on their elections?—As far as I have been able to ascertain, I think I spent more than any person has ever spent upon an election since the introduction of the new constitution; but prior to that time there were larger sums expended, 2,000 l. and upwards in the same constituency.

8804. What do the elections generally turn on in South Australia, are they partly questions such as we understand them here, or not?—Not now as we understand them here; originally it was so. There was a field for sort of Whigs and Tories, Liberals and Conservatives originally; but the Conservative party to which I belonged (being an opponent of universal suffrage, and an opponent of the ballot, I was considered a very high Conservative for those two simple measures, although I held myself a Liberal upon every other subject) were entirely defeated by the new constitution. They had no power at all under the universal suffrage, so that, in fact, that position of affairs has greatly disappeared. Then there are another class of questions which come up that will never probably obtain here, questions affecting land and free-trade, and questions of that kind.

8805. Do I understand that now the elections are not divided into two parties as they used to be?—Not exactly. I would rather divide parties in Australia under the universal suffrage into ins and outs, for generally the people in office try to hold it; and all who are not in office, try to put them out, and the result is a change of Ministers, probably every seven months. I think that was the average I took some time ago. There have been some longer administrations since then.

8807. Did it arise simultaneously with the adoption of the ballot?—Yes; it did at the same time, but not from it. The new constitution, introduced the system of responsible Government. Before that we had a permanent executive. I was treasurer for some years, for instance, and I sat as collector of customs before that, as one of the executive officers. Then, by the new constitution, the Parliamentary system of government came in, and I was treasurer in the first administration, although we only had some seven or eight months of it; then I came into office as chief secretary in the next administration but one, and my tenure of office, I think, was only five weeks, but my predecessor's tenure of office was only ten days, and so on. According to the calculation that I made some time ago, under this system of responsible government, coupled with universal suffrage, and triennial parliaments, in those new countries, the average duration of a ministry is seven months.

8808. Is the object of the election to get the one party in and the other out, or do they go upon general political principles?—Popular men are supported with the view to their getting into the ministry, and men will support measures such as reducing the price of crown lands in the colony, and measures of that description, which are popular. Those are the kind of questions that occupy public attention. But of course when once universal suffrage, triennial parliaments, and the ballot are granted, there is nothing more for Liberalism to seek. They have the free church, the ballot, and universal suffrage, and therefore the distinctions of Whig and Tory do not exist.

8809. Could parties range themselves under distinct colours as they do here, denoting any particular shade of opinion?—Yes, but they are constantly changing banners. The man who has been turned out of office on a particular measure will immediately take up that measure when he comes in and carry it.

8810. When that is the case, is he likely to lose the support of his former supporters or not?—I have not observed that it is so; I have seen several cases of the kind that I have just described, but I have not observed that a man has been particularly deserted on that account, more than otherwise. The fact is, that every man is seeking to get office, not so much for the emoluments as for the entrée into the Government House, and the position in society that is given him by being a member of the administration.

8811. Since the ballot has been adopted, have you had a different class of persons elected as representatives to what you had before?—No, I think they are very much the same.

8812. Was the ballot adopted at the same time as universal suffrage?—Yes.

8813. And very much the same class of persons have been elected?—Very much, I think.

8814. Have their political opinions, when elected, been much the same, or have they altered in accordance with the opinions of their constituents?

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

constituents?—I must say that I think political opinion has been altered; a man cannot be consistent under such a system as that which I have described. A man who will take up, or does really feel strongly, political convictions upon any topic, if in the constant fluctuating tide of opinion his class of opinions are counter to the prevailing ideas of the masses at the hour, he loses all power, he is immediately turned out of office, and he would not be able to procure a seat in the Legislature, and he is left the choice either to recant his political opinions and support the views which he thinks are not the best for the public interest, or to retire from public life.

8815. Could you tell us at all what proportion of the constituency voted under the system of the ballot?—I cannot recollect now, but some time ago there was a very small proportion voted. I do not think it was in consequence of the ballot, but the people were so comfortably off and had no grievances, and they really had very little in the shape of political excitement, and therefore they were careless.

8816. Under the old constitution did the greater part of the constituency vote?—No, I think not a greater proportion than under the new constitution.

8817-18. How many miles on the average have voters to go to vote in South Australia; is there any rule about distance?—No, it would be impossible to make a rule. In the squatting districts a man might have to ride 150 miles to vote, or 200, perhaps.

8819. Did you find that any did ride so far to vote?—I fancy that very few would come so great a distance.

8820. Was the voting confined to those who lived tolerably near the polling places?—Yes; to a great extent that must be the case with a squatting pastoral population. Where there would be a village or a market town, and, of course, the nucleus of the population, they would carry the day if the voters would not take the trouble to come in.

8821. Do you know, with regard to those who lived immediately round the polling places, whether a greater proportion voted than now?—I think probably not more than one-half voted. As I said before, they are so contented with the state of affairs, that they do not take any very earnest interest in politics, except on occasions when some question of interest would come before the public; then there would be excitement, and people would take the trouble to vote. But I know very many cases where a man would say, "I will not lose my half day walking into the town to vote; I will not trouble about it." I have frequently asked men to vote for friends of mine, but they have said, "I cannot, unless you will drive me in; I will not take the trouble of leaving my plough to go in and vote; why should I, I do not care about it."

8822. Did you find one class of persons more zealous to vote than others?—No, there was no difference.

8823. Generally there was an indifference, was there?—Generally there was an indifference, except when there was some exciting topic, such, for instance, as the transportation question, and the resistance to the sending out of convicts, and matters of that kind of general public interest. Then there would be a good deal of eagerness, and nearly everyone would vote; but upon ordinary occasions when there is no particular topic of excitement, they are very careless and indifferent about it.

8824. What is the system of patronage in that colony?—The whole of the patronage is vested in the Ministry of the day. The governor has to confirm their appointment; but he is constitutionally obliged, in fact, to appoint whoever the Ministry dictate to him.

8825. Had you any patronage connected with the office that you held?—Yes, I had a great deal of patronage.

8826. Had you patronage when you were elected a Member of the House of Representatives?—Yes, I was treasurer, and afterwards chief secretary. The patronage is divided amongst the members of the Ministry just as here; each man has the patronage of his own branch of the public service.

8827. At the time you held that office, had you applications from persons alleging that they had voted for you, and claiming that you should apply your patronage on their behalf or for their advantage?—I recollect one or two, who were strong supporters of mine in public, asking me for situations for relatives.

8828. On the ground that they had supported you?—I think it was understood there was no arrangement of that kind between them and me; but they came forward having a kind of claim, as constituents always will have upon a Member, a leading man whom they have supported either here or anywhere else; people make a claim for a fair consideration.

8829. That system of making claims upon persons who have patronage at their disposal exists there under the system of the ballot?—Yes, I think it exists quite as much as without the ballot; the ballot has no effect in that direction.

8830. Do you suppose that a Member who is elected has the means of ascertaining whether the persons who make such claims really did support him or not?—No, he has no means, except that people attend public meetings; a person who can make a claim upon such grounds as that would be a man who had been taking a leading part and attending public meetings held in his favour and moved resolutions that so-and-so was a proper man to be elected, and pledging themselves to return him, and that kind of service, going about and talking to people, praising up the candidate, and running down the opposing candidate, just as is done in this country.

8831. Then, in fact a system of canvassing goes on?—Yes, to that extent just the same as here.

8832. When persons canvass, do they ask those whom they canvass to pledge themselves to vote for a particular candidate?—No, I have not known that, except that the vote is taken at those public assemblies, and people hold up their hands for one candidate or another, and that of course is taken to mean that they intend to support him and vote for him.

8833. You stated that for the most part it is known how persons vote, but that some persons decline on principle to say how they voted?—Yes; it is generally known what a man's political leanings are when there is any particular question at issue; but a great number keep secret how they vote.

8834. Will you tell us what class of persons it is who endeavour to keep secret how they vote?—I think they are people of every class and every rank. They do it from a sort of conscientious tious motive. They say, "We approve of the ballot; the principle of the ballot is, that no man should know what his neighbour does, and we will not tell anyone; we disapprove of canvassing; we disapprove of its being known at all; we declare what our views are, but we will not go further."

8835. It is not confined to that class which might be supposed to be under undue influence?—It is difficult to say that any number of persons that would be worth calling a class in those new countries are under undue influence. They are a very small number who are so, for there are not many tenants as in that country.

8836. I presume land is very easily got there?—Yes; land is got there at 1 l. an acre.

8837. Therefore a landlord has very little control over tenants there?—None at all; no landlord, under the ballot, would ever dream of it; but before the ballot landlords would act very much as landlords do in this country, but now such a thing is not thought of.

8838. Have customers much influence over tradesmen there?—Not much; not so much as in this country; there is more personal independence.

8839. In fact, the motive of the man's keeping secret how he has voted is not to prevent anyone who has influence over him finding it out, but no principle?—It prevents anyone having influence over him finding it out; he cannot find it out, it is impossible. But the effect has been that the notion of coercing people and bribing people has died out of the country absolutely; I am speaking of the ultimate effects of the ballot, after it has been in operation some years, when I say that the notion of such a thing as coercing or using improper influence has absolutely died out of the community altogether; and therefore the bulk of the people never think of concealing how they vote; but some do conceal it.

8840. Do the persons who maintain secrecy as to how they vote attend the public meetings where the candidates make addresses?—Yes.

8841. And do they vote at those meetings?—Yes, frequently.

8842. They then vote by ballot, and maintain secrecy as to how they vote?—Yes, they will not say how they voted, but they will get up and make a speech commending the politics and views of the candidate, and putting it that he is the proper man to represent them, and then they will not tell afterwards whether they did vote in accordance with their publicly avowed principles or not.

8843. I suppose that is pretty well known?—It is quite understood that the man has voted according to his avowed convictions.

8844. Therefore in that case their maintaining secrecy is really of no use even to themselves?—Not much; those are prominent politicians that would act in that way.

8845. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I think you stated that you were an opponent of the ballot when it was first instituted?—Yes, I opposed the ballot by every means in my power.

8846. Has there been much change of opinion in the public mind in Australia upon the subject of the ballot?—I think it is universal; I think I have only met with one person who previously opposed the ballot who has not become as complete a convert to it from conviction as I am myself.

8847. You stated, did you not, that notwithstanding you were opposed to the ballot you were returned at the head of the poll?—

8848. So that there could not have been much feeling on the part of the constituency which you courted upon that occasion on the subject of the ballot?—I do not attribute it to that; there were other services that I had rendered and was about to render at the time; there was a particular measure that I had devised connected with the transfer of land, which the people were very anxious to get carried; and I believe that I was returned more in view of that particular measure than otherwise; but I must say that I think that a great number voted for me on that occasion under the ballot who would not have voted for me, but would have voted against me, if there was open voting, because they would have been ashamed, or to some extent afraid, of their fellow voters if they had supported a Conservative, as I was considered to be.

8849. Will you state to the Committee what it was that you believed promoted that growth of opinion in favour of the ballot in South Australia?—Seeing the practical effects of it.

8850. They could not know the effects of it before they had tried it; I presume that there were many more like you who opposed the ballot?—Yes; certainly there were.

8851. How long has the ballot been a part of the constitution?—Since 1856.

8852. Then it was a part of the new constitution?—It was in a separate Act which passed at the same time.

8853. Was it introduced upon the motion of one member, or was it a Government measure?—It was an open question; I was a member of the Government, and I opposed it, as did also the collector of customs, who was also a member of the Government; but the Attorney General and the Chief Secretary supported it. We were divided, and therefore it was allowed by the Government to be an open question, or else I would have retired from the Government.

8854. Will you state what were the grounds upon which its adoption was urged by its promoters?—Just the grounds that are urged in this country for the protection of the voters from coercion, for the prevention of bribery, and for the suppression of violence, and rioting at elections.

8855. You had a great many scenes of tumult, had you not, in the elections previously?—Yes; one specially which I bear in mind at Adelaide, I think it was immediately before I was elected myself; but at my election there was the utmost quietness, although I was an opponent of the popular idea at the time.

8856. You stated, did you not, that there was a prohibition of any canvassing some three or four days before the election?—Of public speaking on the part of the candidates.

8857. Then private canvassing goes on just the same, does it?—Practically, there is scarcely any; the friends of the candidate go round with him from house to house in some cases, but in other cases there is no canvassing.

8858. Is there generally a personal canvass?—There is a personal canvass, but the principal canvass is at the public meetings.

8859. Have you known any cases where the contest has been very close, where the ballot-boxes have been laid hold of by the mob and broken into?—Never.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

15 June 1869.

8860. Has there been no such case?—I have never known a mob at an election, or the smallest riot or disturbance of any kind whatever.

8861. That would depend, of course, upon how far the ballot-boxes would have to be taken?—In some cases the ballot-boxes would have to be brought by sea from some outlying settlements, and sometimes by land.

8862. Is there a great desire on the part of the population to know the result of the elections?—Yes, when there is any popular question at issue, but sometimes there is great apathy.

8863. I think you have stated that sometimes you had not the means of ascertaining how any particular district had voted before ascertaining it with regard to other districts?—Sometimes, I think, it is known; the ballot-boxes in central districts are examined before the others have arrived.

8864. Then it would be made known?—Yes; it is known how the candidate stands in the central districts, but then the election is all over, practically. There is no disclosure until the entire of the votes have been tendered; the opening of the ballot-box is a subsequent thing.

8865. Have you ever known of a case of a ballot-box being interrupted in its progress to head-quarters?—No, I never have.

8866. We have lately heard of a ballot-box being escorted by troops; is that the case in Australia?—I have never known it, certainly not in South Australia; but there are no troops that could escort them in Australia; there are no cavalry.

8867. There is some civic force, is there not?—Yes, there is a police force and a volunteer cavalry force; but I have never heard of such a thing.

8868. You have never known any instance in which their services have been called for in that respect?—No, certainly not.

8869. Have you been in America?—No.

8870. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] I understood you to say that the candidates make no speeches at the nominations; does anyone make a speech upon that occasion?—No, I think not; I think it is simply tendering a letter; it is a mere formal business-like proceeding.

8871. Under the old system of elections in South Australia, was the state of the poll known during the time that it was being conducted?—Yes, just the same as here; everything went on precisely as it does in this country; the same row, and screaming, and shouting, and stone-throwing, and rotten eggs, and all that sort of thing.

8872. Prior to adopting the ballot, was any suggestion made to provide that the state of the poll should be kept secret while it was being conducted?—Prior to the ballot I heard of no proposal of that kind.

8873. Are both the Upper and the Lower Houses elected by universal suffrage?—No; there is a property qualification for the Upper House, but it is a very low one.

8874. In both Houses are the elections conducted by the ballot?—Yes.

8875. The Lower House is elected by universal suffrage; is there any restriction as to age or residence?—Yes, a man must reside 12 months in the district, and be registered as a voter for six months before he is allowed to exercise his vote; speaking from memory, those are the periods.

8876. And as to his age, what is the limit?—He must be 21 years of age.

8877. Did I understand you to state that the registration is conducted before the stipendiary magistrates?—No, by the returning officer, who takes the names of the voters in a district; reference is only made to the court when there is a dispute upon the electoral roll; any person may dispute the right of a name that is upon that roll to be there, and move that it be struck off, and in other cases a man whose name is not there may claim before the court to have his name put there, and prove that he was qualified for six months, and that there has been a mistake in not putting his name there, and that it has been some omission of the clerk of the roll.

8878. Are those magistrates who decide in such a case as that appointed by the Crown, or are they elected?—They are appointed by the Crown.

8879. I presume that the suffrage includes a great portion of the male population, does it not?—Yes, a very great portion.

8880. Is there any large proportion of that number who are unable to read?—Not a very large proportion who are not able to read print; several are not able to write or read writing, but there are very few who cannot read print.

8881. Can you give us any idea of the proportion who would be unable to read the names of the candidates?—I am sorry to say I cannot, but it would be very few indeed.

8882. I think the evils which you stated as being checked by adopting the ballot were mainly bribery, treating, and violence; has any inducement been substituted in their place to voters to vote in favour of a particular candidate under the present system?—No, not any; nothing but the profession of popular views.

8883. Do the candidates never say that they will support a larger expenditure of the public money on the needs of the constituency?—Yes, anything that will give popularity; persons who are unscrupulous, and with great ambition to obtain a seat, will pledge themselves, just as in this country, to extravagant measures.

8884. Is it not more the case in Australia than in this country, that the popular candidate is apt to endeavour to secure his return by promising that he will vote for a larger expenditure of money in that way?—Rather more than in this country, I think.

8885. Has that inducement been more held out since the adoption of the ballot than it was before?—No, not in consequence of that, certainly; prior to the introduction of the new constitution, I must observe that the land revenue, as apart from the revenue raised by taxes and customs duties, was very much more in the hands of this Government and Her Majesty's Ministers here, than of the colonists; therefore, since the introduction of the new constitution, which was simultaneous with the ballot, there have been more funds to be dealt with by the power of the people, exercised through their members and their Ministers, than there were before, inasmuch as the land fund is a very large revenue.

8886. You referred to the case of some voters at Cambridge who did not vote at all because they thought they were subject to undue influence from the college authorities; would the adoption of the ballot put a check to that, do you you think?—I think it would entirely put an end to it; I believe that those men would then vote. It would add, practically, I think, a couple of hundred voting men to the constituency.

8887. The result of the idea of undue influence, then, now is, that they do not vote at all, and not that they vote against the Liberal candidate?—Some vote against the Liberal candidate, and some do not vote at all.

8888. With regard to those who have not voted at all hitherto, if they voted under the ballot they might be suspected by the College authorities of voting against them, might they not?—Anybody might be suspected, of course, but they would feel that they had the protection of the ballot, and that it could not be proved against them.

8889. Do you think that they would be, at all events as far as they are concerned, relieved from the fear of undue influence?—Yes, certainly, and they all advocate it themselves on that ground. When canvassed they say, "I wish you would get us the ballot, then we would vote for you, but we dare not at present; we are afraid of giving offence to those in whose power we are"; that is to say, their customers. The shopkeepers would say, "Most of our customers are on the other side, and we are afraid of giving offence to them, therefore we will not vote."

8890. Did it not occur to them that in case of the adoption of the ballot the persons of whose influence they are afraid might desire to choose persons to employ on whom they could rely to vote?—They did not seem to think that a probable circumstance.

8891. Is there any other influence at Cambridge except that which you have spoken of?—I do not think that at the last election there was any bribery at all on either side; I have reason to believe that on former occasions there was.

8892. There have been frequent petitions there, have there not?—Yes; some years ago there were two petitions, in which very gross bribery was proved at Cambridge.

8893. Did anyone at Cambridge ever say to you that, in their opinion, the adoption of the ballot would check that bribery?—Yes, that is the universal opinion there of the Liberal party, that the adoption of the ballot would stop bribery for the future.

8894. Mr. Cross.] Is there a frequent change of Members by the constituency in South Australia?—I think every third year there is a general election for the Lower House; the Upper House go out one-third every fifth year by rotation; the Lower House go out altogether every third year. The Governor has power by the advice of his responsible ministry to dissolve.

8895. With those frequent elections do the constituencies often change their Members, or does a man often keep his seat for a long time together?—Generally for a long time together; the changes are not more frequent than in this country.

8896. Sir George Grey.] Are the Members paid?—No.

8897. Mr. Cross.] Not even the expenses of those who have to come from great distances?—No; there is nothing of that sort paid in South Australia. The question has been mooted in Victoria, and I think negatived only by a very small majority of one or two.

8898. You stated that the Members hold their meetings some time before the election, in the same way that we do, and go down and speak; are those open meetings or party meetings?—All open meetings.

8899. Not as we have it here, generally speaking, all being of one party in the room?—Generally, a meeting would be understood to be held in the interest of some particular candidate, but it would always be free to the opponents to come in if they pleased, and they generally do. Frequently a meeting is held to hear all the candidates in the same meeting, and at that meeting they hear them and decide upon their member; that is more frequently the case than any other mode.

8900. So that in those meetings, although held in the interests of a particular candidate, if an opponent came in and asked questions, he would be treated fairly, and allowed to speak?—Yes.

8901. But two days before the nomination the candidate himself may not speak?—No.

8902. He may go about and canvass privately, if he likes, may he not?—I think that is prohibited also, but I will not be positive; it is some years since I was returned; January 1856.

8903. At the nomination, do the persons who nominate the candidate simply name them, and then sit down, or how is it done?—They may say a few words in recommendation of their politics, or something of that kind, but the nomination virtually is in writing; it is a written nomination.

8904. When must the nomination paper be sent in?—There is a day appointed for the nomination, and the proposer and the seconder attend upon that day in a public place, where the mayor, or the chief officer of the corporation, who is usually the returning officer, is in attendance, and he receives those written papers nominating and seconding, and he then declares who is elected, if there be no opposition.

8905. If there is opposition is there any show of hands, or anything of that kind?—No, there is no show of hands; a poll is called and a show of hands would evidently be inconsistent with the idea of the ballot.

8907. Did I rightly understand you to say that since the ballot has been introduced there has been no great political question before the people in which the people took a very great interest?—There have been occasionally very great political questions, and then there has been great excitement displayed, but only exhibited by almost every person exercising the suffrage; there has been no rioting, and no disturbance. I would instance one question in which I took a deep interest myself; it was to some extent to counteract universal suffrage by giving an extra vote to persons who were in possession of property to a certain amount, and to members of the learned professions, in fact what are called here fancy franchises. I supported that view and took a deep interest in it, and there was a good deal of excitement and feeling upon that question upon the part of the proprietors of land, and the more educated classes who were in favour of it.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

8908. That is since the ballot?—Yes.

8909. At that time did people hesitate to express their opinion as to which side they were?—Not at all.

8910. It was generally known in that case when the matter was one of great excitement, and nobody hesitated to declare his opinion?—No; no man was afraid of his neighbour, because the ballot had been a long time in operation, and it never entered into anyone's mind that he would be coerced, or could be coerced by any other person.

8911. So that they do not object to express their opinion?—No; there is no hesitation about it.

8912. Is there any such thing known in South Australia as corruption of the members of the legislature by the ministry, in any way?—I have never heard in South Australia of anything of the kind; in Victoria I have.

8913. Mr. Dalglish.] When you talk of universal suffrage, I presume that you mean manhood suffrage?—Yes.

8914. Women have no vote in South Australia, have they?—No.

8915. You stated that since the introduction of manhood suffrage and vote by ballot, rioting at elections have altogether ceased?—Yes.

8916. But it existed before to a considerable extent, did it not?—Yes, quite as much as in this country, if not more.

8917. Mr. James.] You say that no difficulty has arisen from persons not being able to vote through neglected education; is the standard of education in Australia higher or lower than it is England?—It is higher a good deal.

8918. To what do you attribute the fact that there is more education, and that more persons can read and write, than is usually the case in this country?—In South Australia, the cause of it is the very careful selection of emigrants by the agents in this country; in fact it is the very cream of the English working classes who are sent out to that country, and the cases where men cannot read print are very rare.

8919. There has never been any reason to require that the voting papers should be of a different colour, or anything of that kind?—No; that has not been found necessary.

8920. Nor has the necessity ever been suggested of allowing the presiding officers, if requested, to mark the cards?—Not that I am aware of; I would explain that all the names are upon the same card, so that there is no dropping of one card for one member and one for another.

8921. I mean a different set of cards of different colours, nothing of that kind has been necessary to be resorted to?—I think not; it would then be necessary to explain to a man that James is red and Johnson is blue, so that it would come to the same thing; it would call in another person who would be cognizant, of course, of what the voter was about.

8922. What effect has the ballot had upon individual canvassing, such as from door to door canvassing?—It has almost put an end to it.

8923. Both in the towns and in the outlying districts?—I think it is almost entirely put an end to in the outlying districts, and there is very little of it in the towns.

8924. There is less of it than there was before the ballot, at any rate?—Very much less; it was general before the ballot.

8925. Both by the candidates and the constituencies, is not that regarded as one of the advantages of the ballot?—A very great advantage.

8926. Are those elections regulated by one colonial statute?—There are two statutes; the Constitution Act settles the question of the suffrage, and there is the Procedure Act, which establishes the ballot as the mode of taking elections; it is a separate Act.

8927. Have you ever heard it suggested that any bribery ever takes place in the way of a candidate promising to give money if he were returned, and dependent upon his return?—No, I have never heard of a case of the kind.

8928. No middleman arranging that he would secure votes, and so be paid if he only were returned?—No, I never heard of any instance of the kind in any of the colonies, and I am very intimately acquainted with them.

8929. Did bribery exist to any extent before the ballot?—Yes, direct bribery; and treating to a very much larger extent than bribery.

8930. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Are you aware what proportion of lost votes there is in the ballot boxes, or whether there is a large proportion?—There is a considerable proportion, but I doubt if it is much more than there is in this country from errors and mistakes.

8931. In this country a man is asked for whom he votes, and he declares for whom he votes; in South Australia he has a ticket given into his hand, and unless he does something with that ticket, signifying for whom he votes, the vote is lost, is it not?—Yes.

8933. You say that people are much more intelligent in Australia than they are in England as a rule?—Yes, there are less of the very lowest class of people; what Mr. Bright calls "the residuum"; there are fewer of those in South Australia than in this country.

8934. Might not one fairly infer that a system which works well in Australia might work with greater difficulty here?—Yes, it might be so if the system were more complicated than that which is in operation there; but I deny that it is more complicated or so complicated as the system in England; in fact, nothing can be more simple.

8935. You say that there is now no excitement at elections, and that the result of the alteration in the constitution was to destroy political party completely; do you attribute the absence of excitement at elections to the use of the ballot, or to the fact that there is no enemy to fight?—To the fact that there is no enemy to fight. The annihilation of the Conservative party was accomplished under the manhood suffrage, but the ballot has nothing to do with it. In fact, I would wish to state that the ballot is decidedly decidedly a Conservative measure in Australia, because if there be any coercion at all it would be the coercion of popular opinion amongst fellow craftsmen, and a man, under the ballot, will vote directly contrary to the dictation of a trade's union. For instance, the executive of a trade's union might order, say, a bricklayer to vote for a certain ticket; but the bricklayer, as an individual, if he is protected by the ballot, will go against the orders of his executive in the trade's union; that certainly is the fact.

8936. So that if the suffrage had not been universal, and if the opposing political party had not been destroyed, there might still have been excitement, and there might still have been disturbance, under the system of voting by ballot?—There is a distinction between excitement and disturbance; I was speaking of a kind of apathy at elections in the one case, and in the other of actual violence. I do not think that there would be any violence; but of course if there were strong opposition upon Conservative principles, the popular feeling would be roused, and there would be antagonism of views, and that kind of excitement which leads men to vote according to their opinions, whereas in ordinary times, when there is no particular motive, a man, as I said before, will not leave his plough to walk a mile or two into a town simply to record his vote, or even to turn round the corner of a street, when the country is so quietly governed that every one is content.

8937. The great question of the day in Australia is the question of free trade, is it not?—In Victoria it is; and in South Australia it is also raised occasionally.

8938. There is a tendency, is there not, to return to protection on the part of the electors of the constituencies?—In Victoria that is the case; not in South Australia.

8939. Mr. Whitbread.] I understand from you that a candidate may be nominated as he is in this country, up to the last moment, to the very day of the election?—Yes; he may be proposed and supported by his friends in any way up to the very hour of the election.

8940. So that there is no opportunity for the corrupt withdrawal of one candidate, because another could be proposed from the hustings at the very last moment?—Yes, up to the very last moment; a new candidate can be brought forward at the last hour.

8941. Is the nomination generally made in a room, or in the open air?—I think it is generally in a town such as Adelaide, in the Court House, as being the most public place they can get, and sometimes it is held in the open air.

8942. Do a large number of people usually attend it?—No, very few.

8943. With regard to the declaration of the poll, is the declaration made from the same place?—Yes; and it is published in the official "Gazette."

8944. And do a large number of persons attend that declaration?—No; very few indeed.

8945. After the election is over, and the declaration is made, if the popular candidate should be found to have been defeated, do the popular party ever take it into their heads to wreak their vengeance upon their supposed opponent?—Not at all; there is not the slightest disturbance of any kind.

8946. During the process of voting, what happens, supposing that a scrutineer on the part of one candidate objects to a vote, and is overruled by the presiding officer, has he any remedy?—The law prescribes certain questions, which alone may be asked of a voter; I think they are exclusively relating to the man's identity, because the question can soon be settled as to his right to vote if his name is upon the register at that time. If his name is there it cannot be questioned; the only question that can arise upon that last final matter of giving the vote, is, "Are you Thomas Jones?" Any question can be put upon that, and very severe penalties are inflicted for false answers.

8947. Supposing it turns out that several men have personated voters; does that void the election?—I fancy it would; I speak from memory of long date; no such case, however, has ever been brought forward.

8948. I presume that there is no possibility after an election in South Australia of holding a scrutiny, as we understand it in this country, because it is impossible to ascertain how any voter has voted?—There can be no scrutiny; you cannot prove how a man voted, but you can prove that he voted under a false name, that he came forward, and declared himself to be somebody else, and you can punish him for it, but you cannot prove whether he voted for A, B, or C.

8949. Do you think that the very fact of the absolute secrecy, and the impossibility of its being revealed how a man voted, is considered desirable and necessary in South Australia?—I think so; it was not my opinion originally, but that is almost the universal opinion at present; I think I may say quite universal.

8950. Would they be as satisfied if there was a record kept of the votes, so that under certain circumstances a scrutiny might afterwards take place?—I do not think they would; they are so well satisfied with the present system, for it works so perfectly, and so admirably in fact, that I think in the whole country you could not get a voice against it, or anyone who would consent to alter it, for fear of damaging it.

8951. You think it would destroy their belief in the efficiency of the system if a record, however secret, were kept?—I think they would rather leave the thing as it is than moot it at all; they consider it perfection.

8952. Has it ever been mooted from the popular side that a return should be made to open voting?—No, never; any candidate who proposed such an idea would find it impossible almost to get anyone even to nominate him at an election; so universal is the feeling, that I am certain he would not score ten votes in any constituency in the country.

8953. Mr. Graves.] Have you got municipal institutions in South Australia?—Yes, they are very largely spread throughout the country; in fact, I may say that they are universal in South Australia all over the country; it is all divided into what we call district councils there.

8954. Is the voting for the municipalities also by ballot?—Yes; the questions that they have to decide, are the levying of rates, and the making of roads and bridges, and drainage, and irrigation, and all those kinds of local matters; they have no political matters before them: a man votes in right of his paying rates for a given area of land; and when I first recollect it, there was a plurality of votes given, in some cases, in proportion to the value of your property up to a certain extent, extent, but I think that has been altered since, and that now a man in the possession of freehold or leasehold property to a given value votes in the municipality.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

8955. What is the qualification for voting in the municipalities?—That I cannot recollect.

8956. What number of votes have the voters, generally speaking, for Parliamentary representatives?—One for each seat that belongs to their electoral district.

8957. Take Adelaide for instance, how many would there be?—When I was elected, there were four seats for the city of Adelaide; it was all in one district, and then each elector had four votes, but he could not cumulate them.

8958. Have you thought at all whether the system of voting by ballot is applicable to what we call three-cornered constituencies, such as we have created in England for large towns?—Yes; I think it is quite as applicable, and can be managed.

8959. I presume there is no publication of the state of the poll throughout the day of the election?—No.

8960. When is the result known, generally, of the Adelaide election?—Generally, the next morning.

8961. Is it pretty well known on the evening of the day of the election who has been the successful candidates?—In some cases where a man is known to be a very popular man, and to have signalized himself by doing public service, and carrying useful measures, it is well understood that his seat will be safe.

8962. Have you more than one polling-place in Adelaide?—Adelaide is now divided into three districts, but there were several polling-places when it was in one; the city is scattered.

8963. You have stated that the voting is never divulged until after the result is known; do you mean by that that there is any publication of the result as to how the voters voted?—No, only the result; there is a publication in the "Gazette" of the result of who is returned.

8964. Has the idea of having lists published, say 48 hours after the day of election, ever been brought before the Houses of Assembly in South Australia in any way?—Never; that would, of course, destroy the ballot.

8965. Are you aware whether it has been discussed in any other of the Colonies, or is in existence in any other of the Colonies?—I do not think it is; I cannot conceive that it could be consistently with the ballot; it would entirely destroy the whole of the objects of the ballot.

8966. Do you not think that while it would give the facilities which you speak of in the machinery of the ballot, it would also have the effect of checking the possibility of corruption?—No; I think that the publication of such lists would have a contrary effect, that it would do away with the operation of the ballot, which now prevents corruption, for it would expose a person who voted to hostile action on the part of those who were opposed to him, and it would also give the briber the means of ascertaining whether he had had a quid pro quo, whether the vote had been given as it was paid for; so that, of course, the ballot would be rendered nugatory.

8967. If bribery is committed now, it is done without any knowledge that it will be successful?—Suppose a man under the ballot were to bribe, and then say, "Here is 10*l.*; I will depend upon your honour to vote for me," of course the man might do such a thing, there is no possibility of preventing that; but practically, when he never can ascertain that he has had a quid pro quo, he will not part with his money; that is how the ballot works in that indirect manner, that no person will pay money unless he has some reasonable means of ascertaining that he has got that for which he has paid, or is going to get it. When there is no possibility of his ascertaining that, he will not pay the money; that is really the way in which it operates.

8968. Do you consider that the absence of bribery in South Australia is owing to the machinery of the ballot, or is it owing to the political indifference, to which you have alluded?—I think it is entirely owing to the machinery of the ballot, for political indifference would certainly facilitate bribery; for a man may be more easily bought who has no political feelings at all than a man who has got some, if they are opposed to the person; it would be always an indifferent man who had no politics; people would not go to bribe a man who is known to take an interest in politics.

8969. You spoke of the reduction of expenditure as consequent upon the ballot; I believe the ballot came in at the time of the change of the constitution?—Yes.

8970. Could you explain whether the candidates were relieved from any portion of the expenditure that they were previously liable to through the change of the constitution?—I think they were relieved from the expense of the hustings and matters of that kind, which have been thrown upon the municipalities, or they are paid for out of the general revenues, and the result has been an immense saving of expense to the candidates.

8971. Sir Frederick Heygate.] What class do the principal public men in the colony come from?—Every class; in both Houses there are men who were originally labourers; there was one who was a servant to a cousin of mine, and whom I sent out, and who was a member of the Upper House when I left; and there was a member of the Lower House, and a member of Her Majesty's Government, who was a carpenter in the ship that I went out in; then there are also men of family, and University men, and men of all classes, both in the Legislature and in the Administration; shopkeepers, and tradesmen, and common labourers.

8972. As a rule, do the best class in the community take part in politics?—Not very much; the old Tory party do not; they are out of the game in fact.

8974. You spoke of trade's unions, do they exist to any extent in that country?—Yes; not to so great an extent as here, but they do exist, and and combinations amongst miners and workmen generally very extensively exist.

8977. Did you not state that one advantage of the ballot was that the members of trades' unions gave an independent vote?—Yes; but I do not think that that really has seriously affected the political balance of power in the country; I am satisfied that a great number of votes will be given by the members of trades' unions directly in opposition to the orders of their executives, and independent action will take place under the ballot, and not in the other case; I know that it did in my own case.

8978. But still those who direct the trades unions are satisfied with the ballot?—Yes; they have no help for it.

8979. Mr. Leatham.] You stated, did you not, that the feeling of the colony was unanimous in favour of the ballot?—Quite so.

8980. Before the promulgation of the new constitution, there were political parties, were there not, in South Australia, nearly analogous to those which exist in this country?—Yes; I headed the Conservative party, and the Attorney General the Radical party.

8981. Was the party which is analogous to the Conservative party here, as a party, opposed to the ballot?—Yes, very much indeed.

8982. Have you never met with intimidation in South Australia of the same kind which is chiefly complained of here, the intimidation exercised by individuals over individuals?—To some extent it was complained of, but it never obtained so widely as in this country.

8983. Is there nothing of that kind now?—Nothing whatever of that kind now.

8984. Therefore, immediately after the excitement is over, there is very little motive on the part of the voter to keep his vote secret?—No motive at all. I would mention that the state of things now, when the ballot has been in existence some years, is different from what it was immediately after it was introduced. Now, as I said before, the thing has absolutely died out of people's minds to bribe or coerce in any way.

8985. But immediately after it was introduced it was the general practice not to reveal the vote?—Yes, not to reveal the vote.

8986. You are one of those who declined to change your opinion with the popular current, and in consequence you retired from public life?—Yes, I have always opposed universal suffrage.

8987. And was it in consequence of that you retired from public life?—No, I retired at the request of a great number of persons, to take upon myself the duty of carrying into practical operation an Act relating to the transfer of real property, of which I am the author; and I believe that, notwithstanding my political opinions, I could have held a place there from being prized by the people for having carried out a measure which was very advantageous to the country.

8988. Although political parties in Australia are not now analogous to those which exist here, there are political parties in Australia; and there is party organisation, and party cries, and what the Americans call a party platform, is there not?—Yes; not of the same permanent character as here; but there are party organisations.

8989. You spoke of the annihilation of the Conservative party in Australia, the proposal of the dual vote was considered a Conservative measure, was it not?—Yes.

8990. And that was proposed after the new constitution was established?—Yes.

8991. It must have been proposed by a Conservative, I imagine?—It was proposed by some member of the Administration there; it was an idea that I have always been advocating, but there was an agitation got up there very like that at the head of which Mr. Beales is in this country; in fact the mob were getting up a mob Parliament there, and that alarmed the yeomanry of the country. The country is all divided into small farms, and every man cultivates the ground that he is proprietor of there; those men were alarmed, and there was a chance then of getting this Conservative measure while they were in this state of alarm.

8992. The Conservative party did not become extinct immediately after the introduction of the ballot?—Yes, the party, as a party, broke to pieces altogether, but the Conservative instinct was there for some time to try and restrain the mob when they were going into extremes by throwing the power into the hands of the propertied class.

8993. When persons hold up their hands at public meetings in favour of particular candidates, they do not consider that they have pledged themselves to vote for those particular candidates, but merely as indicating what is their present intention?—That is all.

8994. So that it may very well happen that a man may hold up his hand at a public meeting in favour of a particular candidate, and may change his mind without any violation of principle?—Yes, certainly; or a new candidate may come forward whom he might prefer.

8995. Mr. Brand.] Did the constitution of South Australia in 1856 provide equal electoral districts?—No, we had not "equal electoral districts"; the whole colony was thrown into one electoral district for the Upper House only. I think it was a separate Act which defined the electoral districts.

8996. Have you anything in South Australia like our small boroughs in this country?—Not so very small; the principle of equal electoral districts is, to some slight extent, carried out, but some of the squatting districts are very small constituencies.

8997. How many members does Adelaide return?—I think it returns three at present.

8998. Is the city divided into several departments, or wards?—Yes, into three divisions; there is a member for North Adelaide, for East Adelaide, and for West Adelaide.

8999. Have you any constituency in South Australia returning more than one member?—Yes; several.

9000. Is the suffrages identical in all the electoral districts?—Yes,

9001. You were asked just now with regard to lost votes; can you state what proportion of lost votes occur?—Not exactly; but it is insignificant.

Lieut.-Col. R. R. Torrens, M.P.

9002. Take, for instance, your own return in 1856: you polled, I understood you to say, over 3,000 votes, can you say how many lost votes there were upon that occasion?—I cannot bear in mind, but I do not think there would be more than in this country. A petition, I recollect, was lodged recently against one election, I cannot recollect the name of the place now, in which several of the votes were lost by parties tendering their votes not to the clerk.

9003. Do you think that the proportion would reach one per cent.?—Yes, perhaps that would be the outside limit of it.

9004. And if a vote is lost, is it not generally owing to the ignorance of the voter?—Yes, to his ignorance or carelessness.

9005. Sir George Grey.] What becomes of the voting cards after the declaration of the poll; are they preserved or destroyed?—They are destroyed.

9006. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are you an advocate for the ballot in this country, looking at the different circumstances of this country compared with the colonies?—Yes, I think it is infinitely more needed in this country than it ever was in the colony.

9007. Mr. Hunt.] Are those voting cards destroyed immediately after the declaration of the poll, or are they kept for a certain time?—I think they are destroyed almost immediately after.

9008. Supposing it was alleged that an election was secured by bribery, if the cards had been destroyed, how would it be ascertained how each voter had voted?—It would be impossible to ascertain how a man voted; a single act of bribing would render the election void, and the candidate would be unseated.

9009. What are we to understand by an act of bribing; would it be an act of bribing to promise a voter any advantage if he voted in favour of a particular candidate?—Yes; I should say that it would.

9010. That might be so as against the person who offered the bribe, but it would not be an act of bribery on the part of the voter, if he did not vote according to promise?—That would be a question for the judges to decide what amounts to an act of bribery.

9011. Unless you proved that the person bribed voted for the candidate for whom the briber asked him to vote, how could you establish bribery?—It could only be proved by the man's own acknowledgment that he had been bribed, and had voted.

9012. Would a man be likely to acknowledge that he had been bribed, or would you have any means of proving it if he denied it?—They do so in this country in very numerous instances; I suppose if a voter were upon his oath, upon suspicion, he would be compelled to disclose the truth.

9013. Is not that the case where there is other evidence that he has been bribed?—No case of the kind, except this one of Mr. Dunn's, has ever occurred in the country, and in that case the bribery was proved by the oath of the men who received their passage money; they had spoken of it, I suppose, in their cups; they stated that they had received the price of their travelling expenses, and that upset the election immediately.

9014. Then they had made admissions in an unguarded moment, which were given in evidence against them?—Yes; it would be just the same there as in this country.

9015. But in this country you would also prove how those men voted, would you not, upon the petition?—Yes.

Friday, 18*th June* 1869.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.	Sir Frederick Heygate.
Mr. Brand.	Mr. Staveley Hill.
Mr. Bright.	Mr. Hunt.
Mr. Cross.	Mr. James.
Mr. Dalglish.	Mr. Leatham.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Locke.
Mr. Fawcett.	The O'Conor Don.
Sir George Grey.	Mr. Raikes.
Mr. Gathorne Hardy.	Mr. Villiers.
The Marquis of Hartington.	Mr. Whitbread.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. FRANCIS S. DUTTON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. S. Dutton.
18 June 1869.

9016. Mr. Leatham.] You have been a Member of the South Australian Legislature, have you not, for several years?—I have been a Member of the Legislature in South Australia from the year 1851 until September 1865, when I came to England.

9017. Have you also been a Member of the Government?—I was a Member of three Administrations, two of which I formed myself.

9018. Did you retain your office of Minister of Public Works till September 1865?—Yes, from March to September 1865.

9019. Do you hold any office at the present moment?—I am the agent general for the Government of South Australia in England.

9020. Has the whole working of the electoral system in South Australia fallen continuously under your observation?—Yes; being a member of the Legislature, the various electoral Acts were passed with my assistance, and the whole electoral system has been continuously under my notice.

9021. Have you stood contested elections, both under the system of open voting and under the ballot?—I have.

9022. Have you observed that, since the introduction of the ballot, there has been any decrease of bribery, intimidation, and treating in South Australia?—I am very positive that the alteration has all been in favour of purity of election, and quiet and orderly conduct in elections.

9023. Was there much opposition to the introduction of the ballot in South Australia?—There was a good deal on the part of many people who were opposed to the ballot, and a good deal of opposition was made in the Legislature when the project of the ballot was first introduced.

9024. Are you prepared to state the present feeling of the colony with reference to it?—At present I am quite certain that the feeling is unanimously in favour of the ballot, even by those who were formerly opposed to it.

9025. Will you give to the Committee a brief outline of the scheme of ballot in South Australia?—If the Committee would prefer it I can give them the words according to the Electoral Act. The registration of electors is very much on the same plan as in England, and we assume that that is all completed, and that the returning officer has the electoral list before him.

9026. Sir George Grey.] Who appoints the returning officer?—The Government appoints him.

9027. And the deputy returning officer?—There is one principal returning officer, and he appoints the deputy returning officers.

9028. Mr. Leatham.] Will you proceed with your statement of the method of taking the ballot?—It is contained in clause 31 of the Electoral Act, No. 12, of 1858: "The election of members of the Legislative Council and House of Assembly at each voting place shall be held before the returning officer or his deputy, and the voting at every election shall commence at nine o'clock in the forenoon, and shall finally close at five o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and shall be conducted in manner following, that is to say, every elector entitled to vote, and who shall vote in the election of members of the Legislative Council or House of Assembly, as the case may be, shall vote at the voting place in the district or division for which his name appears on the electoral roll, and shall present himself to the returning officer or his deputy at such voting place, and state his Christian and surname, abode and profession, or occupation; and in case of voting for a member of the Legislative Council, the nature of his qualification, and the place where the property or qualification is situated; whereupon the returning officer or his deputy shall place a mark against the voter's name on the electoral roll, and hand to such voter a voting paper bearing the initials of the returning officer or his deputy, and containing the Christian and surname of each candidate, and a blank square printed opposite to the name of each candidate, with a number corresponding with the order of nomination inserted in such square; and, in the event of two or more candidates being of the same name, the voting paper shall contain the description of each such candidate in addition to his Christian and surname and number, and no other matter or thing; and there shall be provided separate apartments, or places forming part of the polling booth, into which the voter shall immediately retire, and there alone, and in private, without interruption, indicate the name of the candidate for whom he intends to vote by making a cross within the square opposite the name of such candidate, and shall then fold the same paper, and immediately deliver it so folded, to the returning officer, or to his deputy, who shall forthwith publicly, and without opening the same, deposit it in a box to be provided for that purpose; and no voting paper so deposited in any box shall, on any account, be taken therefrom, unless in the presence of scrutineers after the close of the election; provided, that no voting paper shall be received unless it be so folded as to render it impossible for the returning officer or any other person to see for what candidate or candidates the vote is given; and any voter wilfully infringing any of the provisions of this clause, or obstructing the voting by any unnecessary delay in performing any act within the polling booth or room, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour;" that is the form of proceeding of the elector in going into the booth and giving his vote.

Mr. F. S. Dutton.

9029. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Torrens before this Committee?—I was here the whole time. I did not quite catch the whole of his evidence, but I did most of it.

9030. Have you any remarks to make upon any points stated by him?—The greater part of Colonel Torrens' evidence, of course, is very much what I would have given myself, if I had been examined first, which, therefore, I need not repeat; but there were two points upon which, with the permission of the Committee, I wish to take exception. Two quotations from Colonel Torrens' evidence have been published in a very influential evening paper, the "Pall Mall Gazette"; and I am afraid that the quotation of those two paragraphs may have the effect of giving an erroneous impression as to the secrecy of our ballot, because, of course, unless the ballot is absolutely secret, all argument in favour of that important measure must, of necessity, fall to the ground. I must myself maintain most positively that the operation of the ballot in South Australia is absolutely secret; with the permission of the Committee, I would wish to quote those two paragraphs, in order to draw the attention of the Committee to them; and there is a remark or two that I wish to make upon them. The first quotation from Colonel Torrens's evidence is, "That after the ballot had been in operation some time, it practically, became known how everybody voted." Now, that, to a certain extent, there is some truth in; that I cannot deny; because any man can say, "I voted for So-and-so"; but still that would not militate against the secrecy of the ballot, because if John Jones says, "I voted for Tom Brown," nobody can tell whether he did so or not; it is utterly impossible; and therefore it is a mere surmise to say that it practically becomes known how everybody votes; since there is no possibility of proving, if a man says, "I voted for So-and-so," whether he did vote for So-and-so or not.

9031. Are there not a number of persons who do not reveal their votes at all?—There are a number of persons who do not reveal their votes at all; and it is quite optional for any one to say how he voted; there is no necessity for him to say so unless he likes, and if he does say so, there is no possibility of proving whether he is speaking the truth or not.

9032. Mr. Villiers.] What you wish to convey to the Committee is, that if it becomes known how a person has voted it only becomes known by the voter himself telling it?—Yes, it is utterly impossible that it can be known in any other way.

9033. Mr. Hunt.] If he tells a falsehood on the subject, there is no means of confuting him?—There is no means of confuting him. The other point that I wish to refer to is rather more important. The "Pall Mall Gazette" goes on to say, "Colonel Torrens further admitted that the state of the poll somehow got known frequently before the election was over." I do not know whether Colonel Torrens stated that in his evidence, but if he did he must have done so inadvertently, because it is quite contrary to the known facts of the electoral system in South Australia that such a thing has ever occurred.

9034. Mr. Cross.] I think he stated, that before an outlying box had come in, it was often stated that such-and-such a man was elected unless the box gave a different result?—I was anxious to correct the quotation given in the "Pall Mall Gazette," because it would lead to erroneous opinions on that subject.

9035. Sir George Grey.] You wish to say that the state of the poll is never known till the final declaration, after the scrutiny?—Never in any instance; it is quite impossible that it could be known.

9037. Could you say what was the year when the ballot was adopted in that colony?—In 1858.

9038. And you were witness to its operation in every year up to 1865?—Yes, till 1865; and I have stood contested elections under the old system and under the ballot also.

9039. For a town or country constituency?—Both for the city of Adelaide and a county election; it may be that our elections are very lively, but of course, on the nomination day everything is conducted very quietly and orderly; but before the election every candidate goes about to different parts of the electoral district to address the electors, and at those meetings the proceedings are very lively, sometimes even boisterous; so that the electors in South Australia have every opportunity of satisfying themselves as to the political sentiments of the candidates.

9040. Sir George Grey.] You heard, perhaps, Colonel Torrens's evidence with respect to the petition which had been presented; are petitions against the return of members frequent in South Australia?—Very seldom.

9041. On what grounds are petitions presented?—I do not bring to my recollection more than one or two at the outside.

9042. Colonel Torrens mentioned one which was presented in which the member was unseated for bribery, and the question was put to him, how was it ascertained that the bribed voter voted for him, if that was so ascertained, and he said that he had not very accurate information upon the subject; can you give any information as to that?—I was fortunate enough to find a newspaper containing a report of that case, and if the Committee will allow me I will leave it with them, if they would like to peruse the proceedings which took place (handing in the same).

9043. Can you tell us whether it was ascertained that the voters who had been bribed actually voted for the member who was alleged to have bribed them?—It was not so much a question of bribery as paying their expenses to reach the polling place from a distance.

9044. Was it ascertained that those voters whose expenses were so paid actually voted for the member who was unseated on account of that payment?—It was proved on the trial, that those men said that they had promised to vote for the candidate, and the evidence was considered satisfactory to the court, because the member was unseated, and he was fined 150 l., and declared to be unable to sit in that Parliament.

9045. Then the evidence rested, did it not, on their own statement?—The evidence rested on the statement of those witnesses, and others who heard them make those statements, who were all obliged to attend the court.

9046. Are the voting cards destroyed immediately after the scrutiny, and by whom?—The voting papers are destroyed immediately after the scrutiny is completed, by the returning officer, in the presence of the scrutineers. This is the form of the voting paper:—

9047. Mr. Villiers.] Have you ever known any attempt made to induce people not to vote at all?—I cannot say that I have, but I would not like to give any evidence which I was not quite sure about.

9048. Have you ever known any attempt made on the part of candidates to evade the effect of the ballot?—No, I never have heard of any instance of that kind.

9049. Does it ever occur that persons present themselves with papers who are not voters, who in fact personate other voters?—There has only been one instance where a suspicion arose that personation had taken place, but it was not proved, and no proceedings were taken in consequence; in fact, personation is quite unknown.

9050. I suppose that the register is always present at the time, and that the person does state that he is a voter, and is on the register when he appears?—One safeguard which we consider very important against personation is, that each candidate is allowed to have a scrutineer who is present during the time the voter comes up to get his ticket, and then those scrutineers are generally selected as being people who are well acquainted with the residents in the district.

9052. I presume it is not difficult to know the voters in a colony like South Australia?—No, of course the constituency not being so large, they are mostly known, but I cannot conceive that any man would willingly run the risk of the severe punishment attached to personating, because he could have no object in doing it. The penalty is a misdemeanour, and he may be imprisoned for two years if he is found out; therefore, what object could a man have for doing it. I can understand a man being corrupt, but I cannot understand a man running such a risk for nothing, or perhaps for 5 s., or 2 s. 6 d., or 1 l.

9053. How many electors are there altogether for the Lower House in South Australia?—I have brought a return which I found amongst the printed papers in my office, which shows that the number of voters for the House of Assembly in 1863 were 25,929; that is the whole number for the 18 electoral districts, each district returning two members.

9054. How many members are there in the House of Assembly?—Thirty-six; there are 18 districts which are as nearly equal as possible, and two members for each district.

9055. Is there a separate register for each district?—Yes.

9056. Is the register formed as it is here, by some person revising the lists that are prepared?—Yes, I think it is framed on the English system of registration.

9057. Is the Upper House also elective?—The Upper House is also elective, and for that there are 14,600 constituents.

9058. Is that upon a higher qualification?—With regard to the House of Assembly, it has no qualification at all, excepting six months registration, and being 21 years of age; it is practically universal suffrage.

9059. But there must be residence, must there not, in a given district?—The residence is not mentioned; the Act merely requires that the elector shall be six months on the register.

9060. What is the qualification for the Upper House?—For the Upper House, the qualification is a freehold of 50 l. or a leasehold of 25 l.; therefore the qualification is very trifling, even for the Upper House.

9061. Is it for the same period that the members of both Houses are elected?—No, they are not; the members of the Upper House are elected for 12 years, and every four years one-third of the total number, or six members, go out by rotation.

9062. Does that apply to both Houses?—No, it applies only to the Upper House.

9063. Then there is no general re-election of the whole House?—There is no general re-election of both Houses together. The Upper House is never dissolved; the Governor has by law no power to dissolve the Upper House.

9064. When there is a dissolution of that Parliament, it is only the Lower House?—It is only a dissolution a dissolution of the House of Assembly, and the House of Assembly is elected for three years.

18 June 1869.

9065. Are the persons elected to the Upper House chosen by ballot?—They are all chosen by ballot, precisely in the same way as for the Lower House.

9066. And the voters are all registered to vote for that House?—Yes; the whole machinery is precisely the same as the Lower House.

9067. Is there never any disturbance or riot on the occasion of the voting?—Never; the elections are conducted with the utmost quietude.

9069. Do they put forth addresses, and announce their opinions?—Yes, they put forth addresses, and they are generally invited to stand; and in that case, 300, or 400, or 500 electors may sign the requisition; but that is only an invitation to stand; they do not pledge themselves to vote for the candidate.

9070. Is it a matter of much interest when there is an election for the Chamber?—Yes, the elections excite a good deal of interest.

9071. Are the members paid in South Australia?—No; we have constantly resisted that; we do not approve of it at all.

9072. Is there no political excitement?—There is a good deal of political excitement during the elections.

9073. Are there a great many contests?—There are very few elections without a contest. There are always more candidates than can be elected.

9074. Is it usual to re-elect the same men?—Yes, in many instances it is. I have always been fortunate enough to be re-elected; in fact, in 1862, I was in England for a short time, and I was elected during my absence, whilst I was out of the colony.

9075. So that you do not see anything like caprice or changeableness on the part of voters, arising out of the security that they have in voting by ballot?—No, unless a member happens to have given offence to his constituents, which is sometimes the case.

9076. But that would apply, would it not, whether it was open voting or secret voting?—Yes, it would apply in both cases.

9077. Are the Committee to understand you, as far as you have observed it, that there is no inconvenience or evil arising at all from secret voting?—Quite the contrary. I think that the benefits are very great indeed.

9078. It has corrected many of the evils that are observed here, but you have observed none that are arising out of vote by ballot?—Precisely so.

9080. Supposing that persons have been induced to vote under that system by bribes, you can never fix them with having voted for the person for whom they received the money?—No, you never can tell whether they keep their promise of voting for the person for whom they were bribed to vote; and consequently one would suppose that no one in his senses would throw away his money in bribing a person over whom he had no control.

9081. That is supposing that he paid the money before he was returned; but would it prevent a person undertaking to pay a sum of money supposing he was returned?—Even in that case you could not possibly tell whether a particular man voted for him.

9082. The object of a person is to gain his election, and if he gains his election by corrupt means it is immaterial to him whether he pays the money to all the persons that voted for him so long as his election is obtained?—Yes; but I cannot see that anyone would be fool enough to throw away money in that way.

9083. But supposing a person is anxious to gain the election by whatever means, and is willing to spend 10,000*l.* to gain the election, if he says "I will pay 10,000*l.* if I am returned," supposing he thinks that a seat is worth that sum if he is returned, and pays 10,000*l.*, he has not thrown away his money so far as his view is concerned?—Might I ask to whom is he to pay the money; that is the difficulty about it.

9084. Supposing a man employs an agent to make out a list of corrupt voters in a constituency, and he tells the person who has made out that list, "If I am returned, but not else, I will pay you 10,000*l.* to distribute as you like," and he is returned, and he pays that 10,000*l.* to the person who has made out the list, leaving it to him to distribute it, do not you think that by that means bribery would obtain just as much under the system of the ballot, supposing there were persons found that wished to corrupt constituencies as it would under the present system?—I do not mean to say that people might not be found who had a great deal of money, and who might try to do it in that way; but I cannot myself imagine that anyone would do it.

9085. In this case of the Mount Barker election, which was tried at Adelaide, although the system of voting was secret, a person was found to spend money to take up persons to the poll?—Yes; but, you know, there is nothing perfect under the sun, and we may start from that principle.

9086. In this Mount Barker case the charge was, that one of the candidates paid money to take voters up to the poll, although he did not know how they would vote?—Yes.

9087. In that particular case a person was found who was willing to risk his money, even without knowing how they would vote?—Yes.

9088. And his presumption was, that if he paid the money they would vote for him?—Yes.

9089. And the election was upset upon that ground?—Yes, it was.

9090. Do not you think that where there is a great desire to obtain a seat other persons might be found to risk their money equally with the candidate at Mount Barker?—People might try to do it.

9091. Supposing that he did that, you have no means of proving that the person who received the money voted for the candidate from whom the money came?—Precisely so. I am speaking, of course, for South Australia.

9092. We understand, from Colonel Torrens, that in South Australia the voting papers are immediately destroyed?—Yes, they are immediately destroyed after the scrutiny is completed.

9093. At Melbourne are the papers kept?—I believe so; but I do not speak positively with respect to Melbourne.

9094. Do you object to their being kept?—I object to it because in Melbourne the voting papers, as I am informed, without being positive about it, have a number corresponding with the number of the elector on the roll; so that by a scrutiny you would find out how a man voted, and that I object to.

9095. The principle is this, is it not, that on the back of the paper the number of the voter on the electoral roll is printed in Melbourne?—I believe that that is the case.

9096. Then, the voting paper is preserved, so that there may be a scrutiny?—Yes.

9097. What is your objection to that?—I say that that is not the ballot; my objection is, that it is quite a different thing from voting by ballot; there cannot be a scrutiny with the ballot.

9098. And you object to having a scrutiny?—Yes, I object to having a scrutiny.

9099. Do you think that persons ought to be allowed to vote without its being possible to prove that they had been bribed for their vote?—Yes, just so; I say that if a man is allowed to vote, he ought to be allowed to vote in such a way that it can never be found out how he voted.

9100. Even although he voted corruptly?—Yes, even although he voted corruptly; it is for you to prove that he did vote corruptly by any means at your disposal, but not through the means of his vote.

9101. Do you think that you ought to do away with the means of proving that?—We must try to prove it in a different way; if a man once goes to the ballot-box with his vote, that vote ought to be unimpeached and unimpeachable.

9102. You are not sufficiently acquainted with the plan at Melbourne to know whether the voting papers are ever examined, except in the case of a scrutiny?—No, I know very little about the Melbourne system.

9103. In the case of South Australia, conveying voters to the poll is prohibited by law, is it not?—Yes.

9104. And the election was vitiated on that ground in the case that you refer to?—Yes; in the case of Mr. Dunn's election that was the ground.

9105. I suppose that persons are induced to convey voters to the poll on account of the inequality which exists between those who live near the polling places and those who live at a distance?—Yes; but still the country must expect something from a voter; if the voter places any value on his vote the country must expect him to take the trouble to reach the polling place.

9106. Do you think it is right that one voter should have an advantage over another from the accidental circumstance of living near the polling place?—We tried to obviate that as much as possible, by multiplying the polling places; and I do not think that there is any polling place, except in very remote pastural districts, more than five miles distant from the furthest voter on the list.

9107. But in the case of five miles, do not you think that it would be unfair that one voter should have to go five miles to vote, and another should only have to go half-a-mile?—But how are you to alter it?

9108. Do not you think that that gives one voter an unfair advantage over another?—Certainly the voter who lives nearer the polling booth would have an advantage to that extent.

9109. Might not the inconvenience of having to go five miles to the poll just make the difference as to whether the voter would go or not?—Yes, I think so.

9110. And that in itself would give a very great advantage to those voters who live near the polling place?—Yes, there is no doubt about that. Perhaps I may here state that the number of voters amounts to from 60 to 70 per cent. of the number of qualified electors; that is to say, supposing there are 100 qualified electors, taking the average of all our elections, I think, as near as can be ascertained, only about from 60 to 70 vote; therefore, the presumption is that the other 30 or 40 lose their votes either because they are too far away, or will not take the trouble to go to the poll; but there is no doubt that that is the cause of the number of voters being so much less than the number of qualified electors.

9111. I see by this report that the election petition was tried by a court, consisting of four members of Parliament, and a judge as president; has that system been long in force?—That is part of the Electoral Act. The constitution of that court is provided for in the Electoral Act.

9112. Do you know whether there have been many petitions tried under that system?—No, I think only two; I think there was only one besides this one.

9113. Were there many petitions before that Act was passed?—No, I do not think there were.

9114. Under that Act has the judge a vote?—I think he has only a casting vote, as well as I recollect.

9115. Supposing the other members of the court are divided, two and two, he then has a vote?—Yes, he would have a casting vote then; that is the object of having four members with the judge.

9116. Are there rules laid down in the Act as to what the duties of the judge are?—That is all provided in the Electoral Act; it prescribes what they are to do.

9117. Are you sufficiently acquainted with it to tell us what is prescribed for them?—I do not recollect the precise words of the Act.

9118. Does he go down to the constituency to try the case, or does he sit at the seat of the Legislature?—At the seat of the Legislature; generally in one of the committee-rooms.

9119. You think there have been only two petitions; do you know whether the result of those two petitions has been satisfactory to the Legislature?—Entirely so.

9120. Do you know whether, on points of law, the judge decides the question, or whether it is put to the whole court?—I am not quite sure upon that point, but I fancy that the reason of appointing a judge to preside over the court is, that he should decide any legal points.

9121. If there is a question about the admissibility of evidence, do you know whether the judge decides it, or whether it is put to the whole court?—I am not quite sure upon that point, but I can put in a copy of the Act, if the Committee wish (delivering in the same).—There is another point which arose in Colonel Torrens' evidence, which I might mention, namely, the educational test of the electors, according to the last census returns out of 25,929 electors, there were 2,273 of the age of 21 years and upwards, or about nine per cent. who could not read.

9122. Do you know whether any of them voted?—They were qualified to vote.

9124. I see in this evidence that they were told by the canvassers to vote for the top and bottom, or for the middle candidate; I suppose that the system of having squares on the voting paper was intended to guide voters who could not read or write?—My own idea is, that let a man be ever so ignorant, if he cannot read a word, as it is put in that case, he will be able to use his eyesight and sense and make a cross, top or bottom, or top and middle, or middle and bottom.

9125. But there being those squares, no voter would be so unintelligent as not to be able to put it at the top or the middle?—That is my idea. The names of the candidates are always printed alphabetically, so that one might suppose that a man would not make a mistake.

9126. You would not assist a voter who could not spell?—Certainly not; if people are so ignorant that they cannot read a word or two, I do not see that that should stand in the way of any Electoral Act.

9127. Mr. Bright.] Could you give the Committee, from your own experience, any description of the change that was made by the introduction of the ballot; you say that there were persons who were against it who, since the introduction, have become in favour of it, and that now, generally, it is unanimously accepted; what was the change which it produced?—Before the ballot was in operation, our elections were exceedingly riotous. Of course our community has the rowdy elements as well as other countries, and on election days those troublesome elements came to the surface; and I myself have been in the balcony of an hotel during one of the city elections, when the raging mob down in the street were so violent, that I certainly would not have risked my life to have crossed the street. That was with open voting; but now all that has disappeared. By the operation of the ballot the elections are conducted perfectly quietly; and as far as rioting is concerned, every vestige of it has disappeared. Then, again, with regard to the expenses of the elections, during the time of the open voting the principal expense of the candidates was to keep a number of public-houses open. Every one knows what it means to keep open house in public-houses. It is generally believed that two or three candidates have had to pay 2,000 l. and 3,000 l., and I believe on one occasion 4,000 l. for the expenses of elections; and those expenses were mainly for keeping open house in different parts of the district during the time the election was on. All that has disappeared.

9128. Will you explain how the ballot has affected that particular evil?—In the first place, it is illegal under the Electoral Act; but no one dreams now of going to any expense, or spending a pound in treating the electors, for the best of all reasons, that under the ballot, you cannot tell that spending money will do you any good.

9129. Do you mean that it is illegal to keep a public-house open, or that it is illegal to give drink?—It is illegal to give drink, or to keep open house.

9130. Was not it so before that Act passed?—It was always illegal, but it was a common practice before the ballot was introduced for the candidates through their friends to keep open house in public-houses, with the view to influence voters to vote for them.

9131. Do you consider that the uncertainty which the ballot introduced into what may be called the contract between the man who gives the drink, and the man who is expected to give the vote, has had great effect in preventing the distribution of drink?—I believe it has, because the Act provides that no action at law shall lie against any candidate for any expenses of any kind; so that any man who was to supply drink in the hope that the candidate would pay for it afterwards, has no means of enforcing payment for it, supposing that the candidate says that he will not pay.

9132. Is there any other point in which you have observed a difference between the before and the after?—Those are the two principal points, the cessation of rioting and drunkenness and the cessation of the great expenses of the election; it also prevents ill blood arising between neighbours and friends.

9133. Looking at the ballot as a mere question of machinery and as a mere mode of voting apart from its acting as a shelter to the voter, have you observed that the quiet of the polling day has been greatly observed by the fact of the state of the poll being unknown?—Yes, I think that it has a very material effect in keeping people quiet, because it is well known that nothing can be ascertained during the time the voting is going on, and it is generally the next morning before the result is known.

9134. And as men in going to the poll or coming from it cannot be distinguished as belonging to one party or the other, are they not less subject to insult and occasionally to mob violence than they were before?—Precisely; there is no difficulty whatever now for a voter to approach the polling booth, but in the time of the open voting, as I have said, it was sometimes as much as a man's life was worth to cross the street to get to the polling booth.

9136. There are two sorts of influence which a man may exercise in an election; one which we all allow, which is unavoidable and legitimate, and another which is just the contrary of all that; whilst the ballot destroys the one which is generally condemned, what is its effect upon the other;

other: that is to say, in the case of a man who is wealthy, or who is cultivated, or generous, or able, or supposed to be wise in public affairs, does not the operation of the ballot leave all that personal influence to its full effect?—I should say that it would have a greater effect; it would induce many quiet thinking people to take an interest in elections when, otherwise, they would not. I have known many instances of people of great respectability and wealth, who would have nothing to do with elections, simply because they would not expose themselves to the annoyance of mob violence, having to force their way through a multitude to get to the polling place.

9137. With some of the opponents of the ballot in this country, one argument has been that it would prevent the influence which every good man has in his sphere from having its due effect, that the ballot, whilst screening a man from mob violence, would, some how or other, relieve him from the better influence, it may be, of some neighbour with whom he was acquainted; do you observe at all that the legitimate influence of any of the eminent members of your population has been diminished by the ballot?—I should say, certainly not. On the contrary, the likelihood would be that it would be increased by it, for the very reason that people could turn their attention to politics with more satisfaction to themselves.

9138. On the question of personation, is there any difference between ballot and no ballot; in both cases a voter comes into the polling booth, and he gives his name; it is found upon the register and ticked off, and he votes either by open voting, as here, or by ballot, as with you, but the question of personation remains, does it not, absolutely untouched by the ballot?—Yes, the question of personation is precisely the same under both systems. If a man will run the risk of personating another man he can do it just as well under open voting as under the ballot, and there is no means of preventing a man running that risk.

9140. Mr. Bright.] With regard to the question of expenses and the distance of travelling, I suppose people do not go all the same distance to church in your colony, do they?—No, they do not; some of them have to go much further than others.

9141. Or to market?—No, or to market.

9142. Or to their business?—No.

9143. And it is not considered a hardship that one man goes five miles and another goes 10?—Not the least.

9144. You have probably heard of a squatter going 100 miles to vote?—Yes, very often; and 200 miles even.

9145. How long have you been away from the colony?—I left the colony in September 1865. I have been in England four years.

9146. During the time that you have been in England this subject has been frequently brought under your notice I believe?—Yes, frequently.

9147. From your personal knowledge of what is going on in the colony, are you able to assure the Committee that the opinion in favour of the ballot remains unchanged, and that continued experience confirms the people in their approval of it?—Undoubtedly. I am in constant communication with people in the colony, and I constantly read the newspapers which come from the colony, and therefore I am quite au fait as to what is going on there, and I can speak positively that there has not been the slightest change of opinion.

9148. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Are there more or fewer contests since the ballot was introduced?—I can scarcely speak to that point. The contests would depend entirely on local influences, and they would depend on the individuality of the candidates themselves. I do not think one could lay down any rule for that.

9149. Do you think that there are more changes of representatives under the new system than there were under the old?—No, I do not believe that there are; I believe it depends entirely on the members themselves; if they prove themselves to be useful members I have seen no disposition in the constituencies to change them.

9151. But are there committees, or agents, taking any part for candidates in bringing up voters to the polling-booth, or do they go up separately?—It is illegal to do so; and of course the election would run the risk of being vitiated even without any interference of the candidate himself, if it were proved afterwards.

9154. What number of polling-places, in proportion to the population, have you?—I should say that there is a polling-place for every 500 electors, or thereabouts.

9155. What is the greatest distance that anybody has to go?—I should think about five miles, on an average, in the country districts.

9156. In the towns, of course, it would be a great deal less?—Yes; it is a great deal less in towns.

9157. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Is there much anxiety to get a seat in the Lower House in South Australia?—Yes; there are always a great many more candidates than there are seats.

9158. What was the average expenditure at an election before the passing of the ballot?—It varied. My own election for the City of Adelaide cost about 400 l., but I have just stated that, it is believed some candidated have had to pay 2,000 l., 3,000 l., and in one case 4,000 l., at a time of considerable political excitement; they could afford the money, and were determined to get in, and the money very soon went.

9159. Of course, as a rule, the sums paid are not quite equal to those that are paid in England?—No;

18 June 1869.

No; I should think it never exceeded 4,000 l. and this would be an exceptional case.

9160. Do you think that the fact that the ballot has put down bribery in South Australia is a strong argument for supposing that it would do the same in England?—I very little doubt that it would; of course I cannot speak positively about that.

9161. There would not be the same temptation?—There would not be the inducement for bribery.

9162. There would not be the same temptation for corrupt voters to organise themselves into clubs, as the Right honourable Member suggested, in South Australia, as there might be in England?—I have no doubt that the effect in England would be quite as beneficial as out there.

9163. In spite of the temptation to corruption being greater?—I think so; there is no question about it.

9164. Did you hear Mr. Torrens' evidence?—I was in the room, but sitting at the back I could not catch the whole of it, but I heard most of it.

9165. I think Mr. Torrens said something as to the fact that one political party had been practically annihilated in South Australia by the result of various measures with regard to elections?—I do not know to what that referred.

9166. He said that in former times there had been a marked difference between political parties in election contests, but that the result of various measures with regard to elections had been the annihilation of one party?—I should say that there are no parties now in South Australia as there are in England; there are no Conservatives and Liberals as in England.

9167. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Were you an advocate of the ballot before it was introduced?—I take credit to myself for being the father of the ballot in Australia; I was the first who ever introduced the subject in any British Legislature in Australia.

9168. Then you have a parental affection for it?—Decidedly; but not alone that; I can safely say that no act of my political life has given me so much satisfaction as what I did 15 or 16 years ago with reference to the ballot, because, if that is possible, I am more strongly in favour of it now, after 15 years' experience, than when I introduced it before I had any experience about it.

9170. Is that the general state of feeling among politicians?—I do not think it is; of course every man who gets into Parliament, if he is fit for it, would naturally look to working his way up to obtain a seat in the Administration, but unless he is fit for it, he would have no more chance of doing it than a man would have it in England.

9171. Can there be said to be party government in South Australia?—Not in the sense that it is understood in England; there are no Conservative and Liberal parties.

9172. What, in your opinion, has been the result of this change in the system of election upon the Government of the colony; is it better conducted than before, or worse?—I should say it is better conducted, for the simple reason that now we have absolute control over our own affairs, which we had not before that system.

9173. How do you mean that you have absolute control over your own affairs?—Because, under the old system, the Governor, as the Queen's representative, had the absolute disposal of the waste lands of the Crown, but under the present constitution the British Government made over to the Legislature that control which formerly rested with the Governor.

9174. I am rather speaking of the effect of the composition of the House of Legislature upon the Government of the colony, arising from the ballot and those other measures; do you think that the difference which exists now in comparison with the former composition of the Legislature, in fact the absence of any party feeling, has had a beneficial effect upon the Government of the colony or not?—I think there is no question about it; the only inconvenience of our present system is, that administrations are not very long lived, but if they are turned out, other men, equally capable, are put in their places.

9175. Is not it a regular system of intrigue to get office?—No; that has no effect upon the general policy of the country.

9176. Do you think it is no injury to the colony that the Legislature should be composed of such persons as Mr. Torrens described?—Not the slightest; I say it is very much to their credit that they are there, because it is through their good qualities that they have attained to that position.

9177. Taking that description to be even partially accurate, do you think that the politicians of the kind that he described are politicians of good quality?—All I can say is, that I have never found any of the members of different administrations who were not quite fit for the position; they have never done anything to disgrace the position, and consequently I would draw the conclusion that no ill effects would flow from it.

9178. What inducements do they hold out to the electors to vote for them?—None whatever; they do not hold out any inducements. Of course when they attend the electoral meetings many subjects of local interest are sure to be brought to the notice of the candidates, and I do not see any impropriety in a candidate stating that if he was returned he would pay due attention to those local matters.

9179. But is there not something more than that; does not a candidate very generally promise that he will support a large expenditure of public money for the benefit of his constituency?—No; I deny that in toto.

9180. I asked Mr. Torrens that question, and he denied it also, and you agree with him?—Yes; I deny that in toto.

9181. You partially agree with Mr. Torrens' assertion, I think, as to the extinction of the Conservative party?—The Conservative party, whatever that may mean, is still in existence there; there; but the subject never comes up; we can discuss politics there without its ever being brought to the test of those two points which in England are so strongly insisted upon.

9182. Sir George Grey.] Is there a party there which calls itself Conservative, as distinct from a party which calls itself Liberal?—Not at present; there was formerly, but not now.

9183. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You do not attribute the absence of rioting, which you have spoken of, in any degree to the extinction of the Conservative party which formerly existed?—I attribute the absence of rioting entirely to the operation of the ballot, and nothing else.

9184. Do not you see that if by the operation of the ballot and the adoption of a different suffrage, with the other measures which have been spoken of, the result was to place the whole of the power in the hands of one particular party to the extinction of the other; the party which had the power naturally would not riot?—I cannot say that it has had any effect of that kind, because our parties were never so clearly defined as that.

9185. Then you attribute the absence of rioting to the introduction of the ballot only, and not to the extinction of the other party?—Not to the extinction of one party.

9186. Mr. Cross.] I presume that what you have handed in represents something like the voting papers which are used?—Yes.

9187. Who prepares those voting papers?—The returning officer.

9188. Is there any particular way in which they are folded up when they are put into the box?—They are folded up across and down the middle, and the initials of the returning officer are on the outside of the paper, folded up as it is before you, so that when he gets it back he can see that it is the same paper that he issued out.

9189. Are the initials of the returning officer put on the paper before the man takes it into the room?—Yes, before the returning officer gives it to the elector.

9190. Does the voter put the paper into the ballot box himself, or give it into the returning officer's hands?—He gives it to the returning officer, and the returning officer puts it into the box, that is the process.

9191. What kind of paper is it on?—It is some kind of paper which would not be transparent, so that you cannot see the marks through it.

9192. Is there any particular mark upon the paper like our bank notes, or anything of that kind, to make it Government paper?—No; it has not been thought necessary to do that.

9193. Would there be any possibility in the way that voting is carried out in South Australia for a man to put two papers inside instead of one?—I think not; because the moment it was given to the returning officer he could tell at once whether it contained one or two papers. I should think that there was no risk of that.

9195. Do they take the number of the people who vote; is there any officer who ticks off the name as every man goes to vote, so as to take the number of them?—It is the duty of the poll clerk, under the direction of the returning officer, to do that; as the voter comes into the booth his name is ticked off in the electoral list.

9196. Then is it the duty of any officer, when making up the returns, to see that the number of papers in the ballot boxes correspond with the number of people who are supposed to have voted?—Yes; that is done on the scrutiny after the ballot boxes are opened.

9197. You said that a candidate might not go about canvassing, and I see there is a clause in the Act which prevents his doing so; how long is that supposed to be in force; how many weeks or months before the election?—It varies; sometimes the elections take place within a shorter time than at others.

9198. Supposing that the House of Assemby is sitting at the present moment, and you were likely to have a general election soon, should you come under the penalties of the Act if you went to a man and said, "At the next election will you vote for me if I stand"?—I should think I would, decidedly.

9199. Chairman.] In this law which you put in it is said that no candidate is allowed to canvass the electors personally, or solicit votes personally, or address or attend meetings of electors, within 24 hours of the time appointed for the nomination; is that the case at present?—There was an amendment of the Act with regard to some formalities in some details in 1859. Candidates may now address meetings within 24 hours of the nomination; and also immediately after the official declaration of the poll. Letters proposing candidates may be delivered to the returning officer any time up to noon of the day of nomination.

9200. Did I rightly understand you to say, in answer to the Honourable Member for South Lancashire, that a candidate was not allowed to canvass the electors personally at all?—No, he is not allowed to canvass the electors personally.

9201. Sir George Grey.] The words are: "It shall not be lawful for any candidate for election as a member of the Legislative Council or House of Assembly, to solicit personally the vote of any elector, or to attend any meeting of electors convened or held for electoral purposes, if such meeting be held within three days of the day appointed for the nomination of candidates for any electoral district"?—He is not allowed to attend any meeting within 24 hours of the day appointed for the nomination.

9202. Mr. Cross.] In fact, the prohibition of canvassing extends to all times?—Just so; he never dares ask any man for his vote.

9203. Are there men sent about to canvass for him?—His friends do that. Every candidate is supposed to have a number of friends, who are desirous of getting him elected, and they form themselves into a committee; that is not illegal.

9204. I presume you have seen an election in England?—Yes, I am an elector for Westminster.

9205. And you know the system of canvassing?—Yes.

9206. Does that go on in South Australia?—No.

9207. But it is the duty of the friends who go about, and who may canvass, to take a book with them, I presume?—No, they do not. Canvassing, as far as it can be called canvassing, is more in the shape of holding meetings and making speeches in favour of the candidate; but they never make out any lists of the parties who are likely to vote one way or the other, as that would be useless under the ballot.

9208. Are the friends of each party, before the eleciton comes on, able to make a tolerable guess whether their candidate is sure to win or not?—Generally speaking, both sides express great confidence of returning their candidate.

18 June 1869.

9209. But do they make an estimate of the people who are expected to vote for the candidate?—Yes, but they have no means of knowing whether that estimate is true or not; but I have always found that both candidates are equally confident of success.

9210. You say that there has been much greater quietness in the carrying on of the elections since the ballot has been in force; I presume by that you mean, since that the Ballot Act has been in force?—Since the Ballot Act has been in operation.

9211. But you do not mean to lead the Committee to believe that all that additional quietness has arisen from the ballot?—Yes, I am quite positive it has.

9212. But I think you have told us that there are very often riotous meetings held?—Yes, that is still the case, before the day of nomination.

9213. Do not you think that the operation of this Act, by stopping the holding of meetings for three days before the election, has been the means of making the elections quieter?—Meetings may be held up to the evening before the day of election; it is the rioting at the nomination and polling which has been effectually done away with by the ballot.

9214. Would not that have been the case whether the votes in the end had been given by the ballot or by open voting?—I do not think so.

9215. To a great extent, at all events?—Yes, it might, if meetings had been prevented for three days prior to election under open voting; but people knowing that their votes will be absolutely secret, that of itself has a very calming influence.

9216. But at the same time the stopping of those riotous meetings for three days must necessarily of itself have a great tendency to make them quieter?—The electors may meet up to the night before the election, only the candidate may not address them within 24 hours of the nomination.

9217. Are those meetings riotous up to the last moment?—I would not exactly say riotous, but they are lively, boisterous.

9218. With regard to public-houses, that provision which I see in the Act about public-houses, I presume, was not in force under the old law?—It has always been illegal.

9219. But, practically, it was not acted upon?—Practically it was not acted upon.

9220. That, no doubt, has had a very beneficial effect upon the elections?—No doubt of it.

9221. Mr. Villiers.] Are the public-houses closed on the day of the election?—No, they are not.

9222. Mr. Cross.] I think Mr. Torrens told us that he had taken the existence of Administrations in South Australia for a great many years, and that the average was about seven months?—I have not made up the average, but some of our Administrations are rather short; I myself was a member of one Administration for 21 months, which was considered a very good period; of another which lasted only 11 days; and of another for six months.

9223. There is at the present moment no great political question which is disturbing the South Australian Colony, is there?—No.

9224. In fact, they are all local matters chiefly?—They are local matters which crop up just at the time, the excitement caused by which is forgotten as soon as it is all over.

9225. How do the members vote in the House; do they vote as they do here, one party going into one lobby, and the other going into the other lobby?—No, we vote by going to different sides of the House, without leaving the House.

9226. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Is there now a regular ministerial party, or opposition party in the House?—Yes, there always is.

9227. And it is known to which a member belongs, and which way he is likely to vote?—Yes, to a certain extent it is; but the Ministry cannot always rely upon their supporters.

9228. In fact, there are parties in the House, though not among the constituency?—Yes.

9229. Mr. James.] Had you any experience in elections prior to 1858?—Yes, I was returned for the first time in 1851.

9230. Did personal bribery exist then?—I really would not say much about bribery. I have no reason for saying that bribery, as it is understood in England, has ever been resorted to; my principal experience was with regard to treating.

9231. What was the tribunal for trying contested elections before the Act of 1858?—I think it was very much the same as at present.

9232. Did a judge preside before 1858 with assessors of the House?—Yes; it was very much the same, I believe.

9233. Were any members ever unseated for treating?—I think not. I think there were only two petitions altogether.

9234. Were those two for bribery since 1858?—I do not recollect what the first petition was for. I think one was, as I have stated, for bringing up electors.

9235. Is the Act of 1858 that you speak of, the only Act touching corrupt practices that you have?—No, there was a previous Act to that; No. 1, of 1851.

9236. Is that Act still in force?—No, it is superseded by this Act.

9237. Then all the penalties for bribery or treating are contained in this Act?—Yes, this Act was passed consequent on the passing of the Constitution Act of 1855-56, and necessarily superseded the Electoral Act, No. 1, of 1851.

9238. There have been none subsequently, or contemporaneous?—This is the one that we are now acting upon, with some slight subsequent amendments in minor details.

9239. Does this Act contain clauses with reference to corrupt practices as well as the mode of voting?—Yes.

9240. I suppose that there have been no prosecutions at all for corrupt practices before any of those tribunals?—No.

9241. Do they employ paid agents as well as the friends of the candidates to canvass?—Yes, I think the committees who form themselves to support any particular candidate send agents about the country.

9242. Do those persons canvass the same as paid canvassers here do?—Not in the same way. See Questions 9203 and 9207 ante.

9243. Do not they make returns of their canvass?—No, I do not think they do. See Question 9207 ante.

9244. What does that proceed from; is it that the population is so scattered?—No; I fancy that the object of not doing it is that it is valueless. It would be of no value to them to have a list list of names, when they cannot tell whether they will vote for a particular candidate or not. A promise would be of no value, and the object of sending agents about the country is more for the purpose of holding meetings, and at those meetings to make speeches, and recommend some particular candidate.

9245. What is the penalty for a Member canvassing; does it lose him his seat?—I think that it would come under the same clause as Mr. Dunn's case, who lost his election.

9246. Do you think that the ballot has altered the class of representatives in the Assembly?—I do not know that it has very much altered the class of men. I have generally found that the people who have been sent as representatives into the Legislature, have been people who are very well qualified for it, and very proper men.

9247. Do they form the same class of men, that is to say, are they equal in intelligence and education to those that were returned before the ballot?—Yes.

9249. What is the general class that are elected; do any uneducated men get returned in South Australia?—That is a very wide term, to say uneducated; it would be difficult to say.

9250. Do any men in a different relative position to Members in England get returned; any men of quite the lower orders in Australia; any working men, for instance?—As I have already said, no one has ever been returned, within my experience, whom I did not consider quite fitted for the position.

9251. Mr. Dalglish.] If the ballot was done away with, and there was a return to the old system of voting, do you think that the elections would be as quiet and orderly as they are at present?—I am quite sure they would not.

9253. Do you mean to say that personation with the connivance of the candidate or his agents would not void an election?—The case has never arisen, therefore I cannot say what the effect would be; and I think that personation would so very rarely be resorted to, that I would not myself attach any importance to it.

9254. Mr. Staveley Hill.] According to the Act, if the voting paper was wrongly folded, would it be had as a vote?—The paper must be folded in such a way, that the returning officer cannot see the mark. The words are, "Provided that no voting paper shall be received unless it be so folded as to render it impossible for the returning officer, or any other person, to see for what candidate or candidates the vote is given."

9255. Have you known many papers rejected on account of being wrongly folded?—I have never been present myself at any scrutiny, but there are a good many informal votes at each election, and they are thrown away.

9256. And the man is not allowed to vote again?—No, the vote is rejected on the scrutiny.

9257. Have you known many attempts at personation?—I have not known a single case of attempt at personation within my knowledge.

9258. I think I understood you to say that each party appoints a scrutineer?—Yes.

9259. Why does each party appoint a scrutineer?—It stands to reason that the scrutineer for each candidate is supposed to watch over the interests of the candidate.

9260. If you do not know which way a person is going to vote, or which way he has voted, why should each party have a scrutineer there?—The great object of having a scrutineer is to see that the parties coming up to the returning officer to get their tickets are voters, and I have explained that scrutineers are generally selected from their local knowledge.

9261. If a vote is completely unknown, and the way in which a person is going to vote is completely unknown, would it not be as well to appoint only one official for the purpose instead of each party appointing one?—No, I think our plan is the best, to allow each candidate to have a scrutineer.

9262. Does not that seem to point to this, that they know which way a person is going to vote?—No, I do not think it does.

9263. What takes place upon an objection, supposing a person comes up, and the scrutineers say, "You are not Adam Smith," what takes place?—He would have to produce credible witnesses to show that he was Adam Smith; he would have to bring some neighbour or produce some other proof that he was the person he represented himself to be.

9264. Is that provided for in the Act?—Yes; and there are certain questions which the returning officers are allowed to ask.

9265. Supposing 20 persons are guilty of personation, and their votes are taken, though they may be punished, will the election remain?—Yes, the election will remain.

9266. You say that you were once nominated and elected in your absence; how did you manage with regard to the provision that a candidate must signify his consent to act if elected?—I was on my way out, and I had written out to say that I would stand again. It was my own county, and my letter was taken by the returning officer as sufficient, although written from England, and written before the election; in fact, I was returned by the same constituency. I do not think it was quite regular.

9267. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are there many Irish in Australia?—Yes, a good many.

9268. Do they take any interest in elections?—A very lively interest.

9269. Do they take as much interest now under the ballot as they formerly did without?—Yes, the Irish, I think, take more interest in elections than either the Scotch or the English.

9270. Do you find that the ballot, as applied to them, answers as well as to any other part of the constituency?—I think they are just as well satisfied with it as the English or Scotch.

9271. Mr. Villiers.] Are they generally Catholics?—Yes; the Irish are generally Catholics.

18 June 1869.

9272. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are there not two parties amongst the Irish there as well as in this country?—I have no doubt that there are some Protestants amongst them, but the great bulk of the Irish, I believe, are Roman Catholics.

9273. It has been stated before this Committee that the great political parties are nearly extinct out there; is that the case with regard to the Irish population?—Certainly; it is the case with them, because there are no political platforms to go on.

9275. Can you explain why a difference exists between this country and that in that respect?—Probably the reason is, that all religions are equally free and unconnected with the State; but with us it is more a question of who the candidate is. If he is genenerally acceptable they never stop to inquire what his religion is. I may say that I myself am a Protestant, but the Roman Catholics have always been staunch supporters of me.

9276. I am not alluding to the religion of the candidate, but religious questions, and also questions of education, which are questions of great interest in this country, do not they exist there?—Yes, but those I would class as questions of local importance only, as contradistinguished from real political subjects, such as they are in England; subjects affecting the Conservative or the Liberal interest.

9277. Surely you do not call questions of religion or education questions of local interest; they must be of interest to the whole colony?—Precisely so; and therefore I would say that they would not be questions affecting Conservatives or Liberals, but the whole of the community, and on that account they would not divide the community into two parties, between Conservatives and Liberals.

9278. But those questions have not lost their interest in Australia, have they?—Quite the contrary.

9279. Did you ever know elections turn upon those questions?—Not upon the question of education; but the question of education is almost always made one of the questions at each election.

9280. Do the clergy ever take any prominent part in elections in Australia?—Not any prominent part.

9281. Do they take any part?—They are allowed to vote, but they do not take any prominent part.

9282. Do they take no part beyond merely voting?—They do not attend any of the meetings; the conduct of the clergy of all denominations is exceedingly proper and respectable, and always has been in South Australia.

9283. Sir George Grey.] Do the Catholic priests take any part in elections?—Merely as individual electors.

9284. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are there no disturbances at the polling places?—Never at the polling places; there are slight disturbances at the electoral meetings before the elections, but never at the polling booths.

9285. Did you never know of any disturbance at the place where the ballot was taken, arising from the Irish element in the population?—Never at the polling booth.

9286. Do you think that if the ballot was applied to Ireland the same result would follow?—If you wish for my opinion, I should certainly say yes; I say that the ballot would have the same effect everywhere; whether it is in Kamschatka or in Ireland, I am in favour of it.

9287. Mr. Bright.] With regard to the question which the honourable Baronet put to you about ministers, do Catholic priests take any more prominent part in elections than the ministers of Protestant churches?—I cannot say that they do; the Irish have always taken a great interest in elections, and I dare say that the Irish priests would on that account also take an interest.

9288. Do they attend meetings and harangue the populace?—No, they never do.

9289. Is there any feeling in the colony that the vote of the Catholic population is determined, not by their fair sense of public affairs, but by any secret pressure on the part of the priesthood?—I believe not.

9290. Mr. Villiers.] Is there any belief that the priest learns how they vote after they have given their vote?—I never heard of it; I never heard the question mooted at all, or any doubt expressed about it.

9291. Chairman.] As to the provision of the Act which forbids a candidate to canvass personally, is it found that that operates practically to restrain candidates altogether from a personal canvass?—Entirely.

9293. What would be your opinion of extending that provision to the prohibition of all personal canvass, either by the candidate or his friends?—Canvassing is really of very little practical value, because if 500 men were to say, "We will all promise you faithfully to vote for John Thomas," when the election came on not a soul can tell whether all of those 500 men will not vote for John Jones or the opposite side.

9294. Surely whatever pressure could be put by a candidate on an elector, the same pressure might be put by the candidate's friends?—It might, certainly; but in practice it has not been found so.

9295. If it would be bad in the one case why should it not be bad in the other?—I, myself, think that a candidate is much better restricted from all personal intercourse with electors.

9296. Do you not think that that provision might be beneficially extended to the prohibition of all personal canvassing?—I would rather allow the electors to have full scope to exercise their opinions, and to do what they can for their candidate; I do not think that electors should be too much restricted.

9297. Mr. Villiers.] You would not put down paid agency for canvassing, would you not?—I do not think there is any paid agency in existence in South Australia.

9298. It is not illegal, is it?—Yes, it is illegal to this extent, that the candidate must never repay pay a farthing of it; he cannot be compelled by law to pay any expenses that are incurred.

9299. Is it a large proportion of the electors who vote upon each occasion?—I have mentioned the proportion; from 60 to 70 per cent., as well as I can make out from the different returns.

9300. Do you find that there is no difference in that in consequence of the ballot?—No; I think that it is principally owing to causes over which the electors have no control; it might result from causes, which would arise under both systems; but under the former system there was the same per-centage.

9302. Chairman.] You stated, did you not, that you had a good deal to do with the introduction of the ballot?—I was the first who introduced a motion on the subject in the legislature.

9303. Did you then, or have you since, examined many different systems of secret voting?—No, I am not practically acquainted with any system excepting our own.

9304. When you were considering the introduction of the ballot, did you not consider what system would be the best?—No; the first discussion that we had upon it was simply with a view to get the legislature to adopt the principle without entering into details.

9305. Having adopted the principle, how was the particular mode decided upon?—It took several years before we carried the ballot, but I proposed the subject in the very first Session in 1851.

9306. Sir George Grey.] Who drew this Act with the minute provisions with regard to the mode of taking votes?—That Act was prepared by the Government itself; I was a member of the Administration in that year (from September 1857 to June 1859).

9307. I presume that you did not suggest all those details yourself?—No; they were all suggested by different members when the Act was discussed.

9308. Mr. Bright.] After the principle had been accepted, it became the business of the Government, did it not, to propose some mode of carrying that principle out?—Just so.

9309. Do you know at all whether they made any inquiry; whether they had any committee or any mode of investigation to ascertain the different plans that might be adopted?—No, I do not think that there was any committee of investigation as to details; I think the details were sketched out by the then attorney general, the present Chief Justice Hanson, and they were afterwards modified and added to in discussion in the House.

9310. And on the whole they have been successful?—On the whole they have been very successful; there was a slight alteration afterwards, but not in any leading point.

9311. Chairman.] Had the ballot been adopted in any other Australian colony before it was adopted in South Australia?—It was adopted simultaneously in Victoria and South Australia, and afterwards in Tasmania; I think Tasmania followed us, and Sydney, I believe, was the last of all.

9312. You had no experience to guide yourselves by except the experience of the ballot in America?—Just so; we had nothing to go upon excepting what we could pick up from books.

9313. Your mode of voting is very different from the American system, is it not?—I believe it is; but I do not profess to any very accurate knowledge of the American system, only in general terms.

9314. Mr. Brand.] Have elections been more or less expensive since the adoption of the ballot?—They are very inexpensive now.

9315. Are they less expensive now than they were when you had open voting?—Yes, much less expensive.

9316. As to canvassing, has there been more or less canvassing since the adoption of the ballot?—There has been less canvassing since the adoption of the ballot than there was before, because, under open voting, the canvass was conducted precisely the same as in England; lists were made out, and every man was canvassed.

9317. You stated, in answer to an Honourable Member, that there were two members for each electoral district; is that so?—Yes.

9318. Did I not understand from Mr. Torrens that the city of Adelaide was divided into three wards, and each ward returned one member?—That was formerly; but the present division of electoral districts divides the city of Adelaide into east and west.

9319. There are there two members for the east division and two for the west division?—Yes, that is the present electoral distribution.

9320. Sir George Grey.] Is it the case that the ballot was not introduced into South Australia until after universal suffrage had been established?—Universal suffrage was established by the Constitution Act itself.

9321. At what date?—In 1855-56.

9322. And the ballot was established in 1858, two years afterwards?—Yes.

9323. It was never in force when the constituency was more restricted?—No, it was not.

9325. You were asked some questions as to the possibility of bribery being carried on under the ballot, by a gross sum of money being given to be paid, upon the return of a particular member. Do not you think that that would be a much more easy process in a very small constituency of 600 or 700 than it would be in a large one?—Yes, no doubt it would be more easy in a small constituency than in a large one.

9326. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Is education compulsory in Australia?—No, not compulsory.

9327. Is it assisted by the State?—Yes.

9328. Mr. Raikes.] Has the general effect of the ballot in Australia been, you think, to extinguish bribery?—I believe it has.

9329. Have you seen a telegram in the paper, to-day, from Melbourne, to this effect, that members who had been expelled for bribery had been re-elected by their constituents?—I have, and I am very sorry to see it.

9330. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Referring to the question asked you by the Right honourable Member for Cambridgeshire, as to the reduction of expenses of elections since the adoption of the ballot, you refer, do you not, merely to the illegal expenses?—I refer to all expenses. My own expenses the last time I was elected under the ballot only amounted to between 45 l. and 50 l.

9331. But, comparing the amount expended under the old system and under the new, did your answer refer to legal expenses or to illegal expenditure?—Entirely to legal expenditure. I do not assume that there is any illegal expenditure.

9332. In what way have the legal expenses been diminished since the introduction of the ballot?—I have already explained that, under the open system, the great expense was the keeping open of public-houses.

9333. Was not that illegal?—It was illegal, but still it was done.

9334. Do you mean that the diminution had been in the legal expenses or in the illegal expenses?—I mean in the expenses altogether; in fact, the only expense which we are put to now is the paying for the advertisements in the newspapers, printing, and posting placards, and such like expenses.

9335. I want to know whether an election in South Australia can be conducted legally more cheaply under the ballot than it could be under the old system?—I think that the legal expenses are pretty much the same as they were.

9336. Therefore the difference is in the illegal expenses?—Yes.

9337. Chairman.] With reference to that point, was it not legal formerly to employ paid canvassers under the open system?—I am not quite sure whether that was a legal expense or not.

9338. Mr. Brand.] Are we to understand that the adoption of the ballot has tended to diminish the illegal expenses?—I think the illegal expenses have disappeared altogether; it has not alone diminished them, but they have disappeared altogether.

9339. Did they exist before the ballot was adopted?—Yes, to a very considerable extent.

9340. Mr. Hunt.] Who pays the expenses of conducting the elections?—The Government pay all the expenses of ballot boxes, polling booths, and everything of that sort, and of the officers who preside at the polling places. I will deliver in a return of one general election by which the Committee can see the details (delivering in the same).

9341. Mr. Villiers.] Are the people who are returned generally people in business?—Partly in business, and partly gentlemen of landed estates, and partly squatters or people who have large sheep stations.

9342. But they are chosen freely without reference to their occupation or their origin?—Yes, quite freely and independently; it is only a question as to whether the man is considered fit for the position, and whether he is popular.

9343. You stated, did you not, that no religious feelings enter at all into the consideration?—Not at all.

9344. And Irish gentlemen are chosen for the Government just as much as English?—Yes.

9345. Mr. Hunt.] The return which you have handed in of the expenses of a general election, applies, does it not, to both Houses?—Yes, both the Legislative Council and the House of Parliament.

9346. I see that they are classified under different heads, copies of electoral roll, certificates, notices of writ, and so on; do those fall on the public?—Everything connected with the machinery of the election is paid by the Government.

9347. I also observe that in one case there is one item for "costs of scrutiny"; what does that refer to?—That is the scrutiny of the votes after the ballot boxes are opened.

9348. Mr. Cross.] Then are there no other legal expenses?—None whatever; all the public expenses are paid by the Government.

9349. Then the candidate cannot legally spend a farthing himself in any way?—Excepting that he has some expenses in addressing the electors through the newspaper advertisements, and so on.

9350. Has he to make any return of his expenses to an election auditor or anything of that kind?—No.

9351. Chairman.] Have you any other suggestion to make to the Committee?—There is one other point which I wish to mention. A question arose as to the voting of people who could not read. That we have already disposed of, and then another question arose as to people who might be blind, how they could vote under the ballot. It occurs to me that in the first place there would be very few blind people, but I do not see that even a blind man should lose his vote, because there might be a zinc plate of exactly the same size as the voting paper, and it might have squares cut out to fit exactly over the squares on the voting paper, so that a blind man would very easily in that case be able to vote; he would be able to make his mark exactly in the square opposite the name of the candidate for whom he wished to vote, and the names being printed alphabetically he would know which square to make the mark in.

9352. Mr. Bright.] If a man goes into the retired part of the polling booth to give his vote, and is totally unable to read, and, in fact, incompetent to do it, is any person ever deputed to assist him?—No, he is not allowed to have any assistance; if he cannot do it himself his vote fails. I cannot say that I have very much sympathy for those who lose their votes because they cannot read.

9353. Mr. Cross.] Do you know whether there are many votes given which are lost in consequence of being improperly filled up?—Yes, I should say about fully five, six, or seven per cent. of all the votes are illegal in some way or other.

9355. Whatever the illegality is?—Yes, whatever the illegality, or rather, irregularity is, the vote is lost.

9356. Mr. Brand.] As to the expenses of a general election of Parliament in South Australia, it appears by this return, as I understand it, that the total expenses attending the election of all the members of the House of Assembly paid by the Government amounted to 5,120 l.; is that correct?—Yes; and I would just point out that this was the first general election when both Houses were elected, and such a case can never occur again.

9357. I am speaking of the expenses attending the election of members of the House of Assembly, not the Legislative Council?—Yes, that is quite so, but the total expenses you will find amount to 10,000 l. for the two Houses.

9358. Sir George Grey.] That does not include, does it, the payment to the returning officer, or the sum to be paid as annual salary to the sheriff or to those who act as his deputies?—Our sheriff is the principal returning officer; I think he gets some fees, but I do not think he gets separately paid for that duty.

Mr. JOHN IRVING, called in; and Examined.

9359. Mr. Leatham.] ARE you a resident of Carlisle?—Yes.

9360. Have you held any public office there?—I have been a member of the corporation for some years, and I have held the office of Mayor.

9361. Do you know the number of electors who were in the employ of the London and North Western Company at the last election?—Yes; there were about 154, I think.

9362. Do you know how those men voted?—Yes; 136 voted plumpers for Mr. Hodgson, the Conservative candidate, two split between Mr. Hodgson and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, one between Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Potter, and 15 split between Mr. Potter and Sir Wilfrid Lawson.

9363. Have you any means of knowing what the political opinions of those men are as a class?—I have, from conversations that I have had with many workmen so employed, both previous to the election and subsequent to it.

9364. Is that the only means you have of knowing their general politics?—Yes; but it is pretty well understood in Carlisle what their leanings are.

9365. Is there a mechanics' institute in Carlisle?—Yes, there is a mechanics' institute in connection with the workshops of that company, and in that institute there are 13 or 14 newspapers taken, six or seven of which are daily, and of those daily papers six are Liberal and one Conservative; and there are the same proportions with regard to the weekly papers.

9366. Do you know whether the great bulk of those 154 voters are members of that mechanics' institute?—They are chiefly.

9368. Mr. Leatham.] Is the mechanics' institute for the exclusive use of the persons who are employed on the railway?—Yes.

9369. Was it the general opinion amongst those men until a certain time before the election that they would be allowed to vote as they pleased?—Yes; the election was a subject which very much engaged their attention in the early part of November and previously, and up to the 5th of November the men had a strong conviction that they would be permitted to exercise their franchise as they thought best.

9370. What occurred on the 5th of November which should lead them to form a different opinion?—They were waited upon by a canvassing party in the interest of Mr. Hodgson.

9371. Mr. Hodgson is a director of the London and North Western Railway Company, is he not?—Yes; the men who were then on the works were seen by the canvassers, and, as far as I am able to ascertain, they made very little way amongst the men. They stated to some of them that they thought they were going against their own interest, that Mr. Hodgson had been the means of getting those works erected, and consequently they were indebted to him for their employment, and that their voting in antagonism to him would be like quarrelling with their bread and butter.

9372. Did Mr. Hodgson canvass the men himself?—He did subsequently to that. I may observe that on that occasion when those parties were canvassed, one man decidedly stated, that under no circumstances would he be induced to vote for Mr. Hodgson; and when the man who was importuning him wanted to argue the question with him the answer on the part of the voter was, that he need not trouble himself, for he was quite as well qualified to judge of the question at issue before the country as the canvasser was to teach him. The canvasser thereupon said, "If you do not vote for Mr. Hodgson, it will be the worse for you," and that man was subsequently discharged from the works.

9374. Do you remember any circumstance which took place on that occasion?—Yes; Mr. Hodgson was accompanied by some of his friends, who had been there on the previous occasion, as well as the foreman of the works in one of the departments, that same foreman having accompanied the canvassers on the 5th of November; the men were seen in one of the departments singly, and of course some of them, who had intended voting for the Liberals, were obliged, through fear, to promise to vote for Mr. Hodgson. In some cases they had promised to split their vote, in the first place, but before the election came on that which was intended to be a split vote was subsequently turned into a plumper for Mr. Hodgson.

9375. You said that the men were canvassed singly; in any of the shops were they canvassed collectively?—Yes, they were. They were called together in the office of one of the foremen, and by one of the canvassers, those were asked to hold up their hands who were favourable to Mr. Hodgson's election.

9376. Was Mr. Hodgson present?—He was.

9377. And was the foreman present?—Yes, the foreman was present. The bulk of them, I think, with the exception of two, held up their hands for Mr. Hodgson, many of them having previously stated unreservedly to their fellow-workmen their intention to vote for the Liberals, and notwithstanding the pledge which they had given to those who had canvassed them on the part of Messrs. Lawson and Potter.

9378. Was any subsequent meeting of the workmen held?—I may say with reference to that occasion to which I refer, that the fact was called in question of the men having been so assembled and the vote taken; and eight of the workmen signed a declaration, which appeared in a large placard on the day of the nomination, denying the truth of this allegation which had been made by Sir Wilfrid Lawson two nights previously at a meeting that he had addressed in the Athenæum; but notwithstanding that denial, it was quite notorious amongst the workmen, and was the subject of remark that such act had taken place. I have also been informed, both by the men who were present, and who voted for Potter and Lawson, and also by those who voted for Mr. Hodgson, that it was true that the vote was so taken by a show of hands.

9380. And that the men were asked to hold up their hands to indicate the way they intended to vote?

vote?—I have no doubt whatever that that took place.

9381. Was there any meeting of the workmen subsequent to that?—Yes. Several men in the evening of that 9th of November were asked to be on Mr. Hodgson's committee, and they were required to assemble at a public-house that night in the same ward where the works are situated, and the foreman, who went round with the canvassing party, and who went round with Mr. Hodgson also, was in the chair.

9382. Was a show of hands asked for on that occasion?—I have not been able to see anyone who was at that meeting, although it is a subject of general conversation amongst the men from that time up to the present, that a show of hands was upon that occasion taken.

9384. A week after the election, were any men discharged?—There were. In consequence of that notice, 22 men were discharged.

9385. How many of those voted Liberal?—Of the 15 who voted Liberal, five were discharged; the only workmen that they could have discharged out of the 15 were six; the others were of a class of workmen that they were not discharging.

9386. Why could they not have discharged the others?—Because they had plenty of work for that class of men. Six came under that class of men that they were going to reduce in number. One of the six whom they could have discharged did not receive notice to leave, and there was an impression that he had voted for Mr. Hodgson.

9387. How do you know that there was that impression?—It was the subject of conversation amongst the workmen that he had been so fortunate as to get rid of the notice of discharge; but after the poll-book came out, when it was discovered that he had polled for Potter and Lawson, he told them that it was a mistake.

9388. Was any application made by the chairman of the Liberal committee at Carlisle to the chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company, inviting him to send a declaration, on the part of the directors, to the workmen in their employ, to the effect that they should be free to vote as they pleased?—Yes; there was one sent to the chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company, and one sent to the chairman of the North Eastern Railway Company; and this letter was addressed to the chairman of the Liberal committee, Mr. Robert Furguson, by Mr. Moon, the chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company; it is sent from the office of the company at Euston Station, London, and dated the 10th of November 1868: "Sir,—In reply to your inquiry of yesterday's date, as to whether the board of this company had made any announcement to the effect that the railway never interfered with its servants, I beg to inform you that no announcement whatever has been made by this company, nor do they intend to make any. The subject was brought under the consideration of the board in consequence of several communications similar to yours of the 24th September having been addressed to them; but it was decided that as they had never on any previous occasion interfered with the free action of their officers and servants, it was unnecessary to make any such announcement as that referred to by you.—I am, sir, your obedient servant, Richard Moon." I may say, with reference to that, that the representation contained in this letter, that no interference had ever been made with the men on previous occasions, I know perfectly well is not true as regards Carlisle, because on each occasion Mr. Hodgson, while he has offered himself as a candidate, has invariably canvassed the men.

9389. Sir George Grey.] Did the Liberal candidates canvass persons in the employ of the railway also?—They did not, nor did they canvass a single elector in the city.

9390. Was there any obstacle presented to their canvassing on the part of the company?—It was never asked for, and those who had charge of the canvass, and members of the committee, were strictly forbidden to go on any of the railway works to see any man.

9391. You do not mean they were forbidden by the company?—No; the North Eastern did issue a notice to say that their men were free to vote as they liked, and that no persons were to be allowed to canvass the men on the company's works; that notice was put up in the works; but notwithstanding that notice, Mr. Hodgson canvassed the men in the employ of the North Eastern Company, although his attention was called to the notice on the part of the man who took him round.

9392. Mr. Leatham.] Mr. Hodgson was a candidate at the previous election in 1865, was he not?—He was.

9393. Do you know how the men in the employ of the North Western Railway Company on that occasion voted?—Yes; in 1865, with the limited constituency, there were 30 voters in the employ of the North Western Railway Company, and of those 30, 27 plumped for Mr. Hodgson, two voted for Lawson and Hodgson, not one for Potter and Hodgson, nor did any one vote for Lawson and Potter, and one man did not vote at all. We find in our experience with men of that class that whenever a split has been got between the opposing parties, the second vote has always been given to our strongest man. Perhaps, before I leave that part of the case, I may be allowed to observe one thing. If the men in the employ of the London and North Western Railway Company, on the occasion of the election of 1865, had been permitted to vote as they liked (taking the North Eastern and other companies as an index, where they were free to vote as they liked, and where there was no canvassing), the result would have been that Mr. Hodgson would not have been returned; the return would have been Potter and Lawson.

9394. Have you any further remark to make with regard to the London and North Western Railway Company?—Yes, I may observe also that if those 15 men had not been found true to their pledges, and had been operated on in the same way as the others who voted for Mr. Hodgson Hodgson, the consequence would have been that Mr. Hodgson would have been returned, and Mr. Potter would have been turned out.

9395. Sir George Grey.] What became of those five men out of those 15 who were discharged?—One man went to Dublin; one was taken on the works again through the intervention of the foreman, under a fear that a representation would be made of that circumstance to the head manager at Crewe; one man is now in the employ of another firm in Carlisle; he was the person to whom I referred as having had a threat offered him. He stated that he had been anxious to have the franchise for many years, but in place of its being a blessing to him, it had become a great curse, and there is one man at present unemployed.

9396. When you speak of the North Eastern Railway Company, do you refer to the persons employed upon the Newcastle and Carlisle line?—Yes.

9398. How many of them were there who voted?—There were 45 voters, 27 of whom voted for Potter and Lawson, two for Potter and Hodgson, two for Lawson and Hodgson, eight plumped for Hodgson, and six did not vote at all. The number on the roll for the London and North Western works would have been three more; but they expressed a wish to the legal agent of the Liberal party previous to the registration that they would rather be off the roll, and they desired that he would object to their votes; he did object, and of course the men did not appear, and they were struck off, because they felt that they would not be free to act as they like, and they could not bear the infliction of being coerced to vote contrary to their opinion.

9399, Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Did I understand you to say that Mr. Hodgson established the railway works at Carlisle?—No; that was the reason given on the part of those who were canvassing in his interest to induce the men to vote; the railway company established the works; but the statement made to the men was, that it had been done at the instance, and through the instrumentality of Mr. Hodgson alone, and therefore, they said that this ought to induce them to vote for him.

9400. Was he a director of the company at the time the works were established?—He was.

9401. Did he take an active part in establishing them?—I suppose in common with his colleagues; I am not aware that he took any extra interest beyond that.

9402. Does he take an active interest in the management of the London and North Western Railway at Carlisle?—Yes, he does; we feel that very seriously in our electioneering matters.

9403. Is he popular amongst the workmen?—Yes, to a certain extent, where they are full in accord with him in political opinion; but certainly not so with others, except so far as being a member of the board that gives them employment.

9404. Do not you think it possible that, as a member of the board that gives them employment, they might wish to support him on account of liking him, irrespectively of their political opinions?—My experience would lead me to a different conclusion altogether.

9405. Do not you think that that is the ground upon which candidates are often supported?—Unfortunately it is so.

9406. Were no votes given to the other candidates at Carlisle on account of personal liking?—I do not think there were any. In fact the candidates never made it their business to ask a single elector for a vote. In Carlisle we consider it rather degrading for a candidate to do so.

9407. You spoke of Mr. Hodgson canvassing the men; is there any reason why, as a candidate he should not canvass them?—I think that it is very improper, in the position which he holds as a member of the Board of Directors of the London and North Western Company that he should be permitted to go upon the works to canvass the men.

9408. Did he canvass the other electors in the city?—I do not know that he canvassed them all; but he did make a general canvass throughout the whole town more or less.

9409. You think that if he had been a stranger he might have done it; but being a director he should not have canvassed them on the works?—He could have seen them at their homes, which would have been much better.

9410. You object to his going into the works, not to their houses?—I object to his canvassing more particularly in the works, because the very circumstance of Mr. Hodgson, as a director, going there to canvass them was an improper influence.

9411. It would save time and trouble, would it not, to get the men all together and canvass them?—No doubt for his purpose it would, but still it was not a justifiable act.

9412. Mr. Leatham.] The foreman was present, you say, with Mr. Hodgson at the time he canvassed them?—Yes.

9413. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] He naturally would be in the works would he not?—Yes; but it was not necessary that he should leave his work to go with Mr. Hodgson.

9414. You spoke of the members of the Mechanics Institute; are there many non-voters who work for the railway company who are members of that institute?—Yes, there are.

9415. What is the proportion of non-voters compared with the voters?—I should think, probably, there would be about as many non-voters as voters. I said there were 300 altogether; but that may be a little over the mark.

9416. Supposing the non-voters to be different in politics to the voters, that might account for the papers that were taken in, might it not?—Of course it is all done by voting; but judging of the non-voters as of the voters, I should consider that the same run of opinion would prevail amongst the non-voters as does with the voters.

9417. How is it that that they are non-voters; are they lodgers?—Some of them are lodgers, and some of them are the sons of men who are in the employ of the railway.

9418. I did not quite catch that part of your evidence as to the loss of employment; were any men threatened with loss of employment except those as you spoke of as being discharged?—No.

those who had been there the shorter time, and who voted for Mr. Hodgson, were retained in the service; and others, against whom no complaint had been previously made, were discharged.

9420. And they were five in number, I think?—Yes.

9421. You said that one man was taken on under fear of representation being made to the manager at Crewe?—Yes, that was the general impression amongst the men.

9422. Do you know that to be a fact?—I have not had it from the man himself.

9423. What means have you of knowing that it is true?—I had conversations with some other workmen upon the subject, and they said that they thought so; and the man was taunted with it himself.

9424. Was any public statement of it made in the newspapers?—No.

9426. But the man was taken on?—Yes.

9427. Sir George Grey.] Was it believed then that the manager at Crewe would have disapproved of any coercion or any undue influence, and would have restored the man to his employ if he had been told of it?—Yes, and that he would have found fault with the foreman for taking the part which he did amongst the men at the time of the election.

9428. You do not object to the action of the company, as a corporate body, represented by their manager at Crewe?—Yes, I do; but I hold that the manager at Crewe would consider it within his province, and consistent with his duty, to rebuke those under him who are employing their time, which ought to have been devoted to the service of the company, in trying to influence men contrary to their convictions.

9429. He being a servant of the company, acting under their directions?—Yes.

9430. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Do you not know what the politics of the manager at Crewe are?—No, I do not.

9431. Do you know what the politics of the members of the London and North Western Board are?—I have heard that they are very much divided. Mr. Charles Howard, one of the Members for the eastern division of the county of Cumberland, is a member of the Board, and he would scorn to do such an act as to go and canvass the men in the works.

9432. He is a Liberal, is he not?—Yes, he is.

9433. If a representation had been made to the board that Mr. Hodgson, as a Conservative, was influencing the men wrongfully at Carlisle, would not Mr. Howard very likely have taken the matter up at the Board?—I am not responsible for what Mr. Howard would do.

9434. Is it not probable?—I dare say that he would not like, in a matter of that kind, to come in conflict with his colleague.

9435. Do you know Mr. Moon's politics?—I do not.

9436. Do you know Mr. Brown Westhead's politics?—Yes.

9437. You know that they are Liberal?—Yes.

9438. Was not there every facility, if this influence had been wrongfully used, for representations to have been made to the board and enforced by members of the board?—We thought that it was useless to make any further application. The letter was addressed to the chairman of the company, the 24th of September, and was never acknowledged till the 10th of November. I do not know whether that is the practice of conducting correspondence by that railway company, but we thought that it was highly improper to allow it to remain so long unanswered.

9439. Were any of the members of the North Eastern Board connected with the Carlisle election in any way?—No.

9440. Is neither Sir Wilfrid Lawson nor Mr. Potter a member of that Board?—No; Sir Wilfrid Lawson is a member of the Maryport Board, but that is not connected with the North Eastern Company.

9441. Were any men in the employ of the Maryport Railway voters for Carlisle?—I did not take a return of them.

9442. Do you know how they voted?—I do not.

9443. Should you think it wrong to say that they supported Sir Wilfrid Lawson?—Not at all; because the great bulk of the workmen in Carlisle, the better class of them, where they are free to act as they like, are of a Liberal mind.

9444. That is to say, in your opinion, they are Liberal?—But I happen to know them pretty well. I have lived amongst them 40 years, and I am brought a great deal into contact with them.

9445. I understood you to say that the majority of the North Eastern Company's workmen voted for the two Liberal candidates?—Yes.

9446. Was there no one taking any interest in the Carlisle election on the Liberal side, who had anything to do with the North Eastern Railway Board?—I believe not; not that I am aware of.

9447. Was there any manager of the North Eastern Company that took an interest in the election?—The only manager who took an interest on the works was opposed to us, and he was the man who went round the works with Mr. Hodgson, and who called Mr. Hodgson's attention to the notice on the part of the Board, that no person would be permitted to canvass on their works.

9448. Sir George Grey.] Are the works common to both companies?—No, they are quite distinct.

9449. You were asked whether there was any person resident in Carlisle connected with the North Eastern Railway Company who took an interest in the election; that has nothing to do, I suppose, with the works?—The question put to me by the honourable Member was as regards the North Eastern works. This same man who took Mr. Hodgson over the North Eastern works, after having called his attention to the notice, went round the works, of course, in direct violation of this notice, and the company fined him.

9450. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Was that the manager of the works?—No, he was the foreman of the store department.

9451. Was it a fact that no one besides that man in authority in the North Eastern works, or the North Eastern Railway, took any part in the election to influence the men?—I believe not. In fact, two or three of the most influential men in connection with those works were against us.

9452. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that the notice published by that company encouraged the workmen to vote freely?—I do. It prevented those those who held opinions different to us taking any part whatever in canvassing. We called the attention of the Board to the circumstance of this man taking Mr. Hodgson over the works; and the secretary of the company, in obedience to the order of the chairman, wrote to us to say that an inquiry would be directed into the man's conduct; and the result of the inquiry led to his being fined.

9453. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Who is the chairman of the North Eastern Railway Company?— Mr. Thompson, the late Member for Whitby.

9454. He is a Liberal in politics, is he not?—Yes.

9455. Mr. Locke.] You say that out of the 15 there were five men discharged; how many were discharged altogether at that time?—Twenty-two.

9456. What description of men were the other 17?—I do not know exactly; part of them would be voters, some of them voting for Mr. Hodgson, and probably some not voting at all.

9457. Then there were some in the interest of Mr. Hodgson that were discharged?—Yes, because they could not have discharged 22 that had voted for the Liberals.

9458. But they discharged some of those who voted for Mr. Hodgson also?—Yes, because all the Liberals that were discharged were all that they could discharge, excepting one.

9459. Why was that?—The others were not of that class that they were reducing.

9460. Then they reduced 17 besides those five of that class that they could reduce?—Yes.

9461. Mr. Leatham.] The 17 men were not all voters, were they?—I am not aware; I take it that probably two-thirds of them were.

9462. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You stated, did you not, that the Mechanics' Institute take in six or seven Liberal papers?—They took in the following daily papers: the "Telegraph," the "Star," the "Standard," the "Manchester Examiner" and "Times," the "Manchester Guardian," the "Newcastle Daily Chronicle," and the "Scotsman"; and of those seven daily papers six are Liberal and one Conservative.

9463. Are there any Conservative papers published in that neighbourhood?—Yes, there are the daily papers published outside Carlisle, and the Carlisle ones. There are two Carlisle journals published on the Friday, two published on the Tuesday, and two copies of the "Express," and one of the "Examiner," those all being Liberal; and there is the "Patriot," Conservative paper, published there, of which they take one copy.

9464. Are there any more Conservative papers published in the county but not taken in there?—Yes, there is one at Whitehaven.

9465. Sir George Grey.] Are there not such papers as the "Newcastle Journal"?—Yes.

9466. Is there any Conservative Manchester paper?—Yes; there are Conservative papers published at all the places from where the others come; there are two Manchester Liberal papers taken in, and there is a Manchester daily Conservative paper which they do not take in.

9467. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You think that their taking in those papers showed the politics of the institute?—I think it is a very strong indication.

9468. Would not they be likely to take in the papers which would be most interesting to them, and the best written?—Not necessarily so; that, to a certain extent, would apply.

9469. Are there any papers of strong political bias in the neighbourhood which they do not take in?—There is the "Cumberland Packet."

9470. Is that a paper of large circulation?—I do not know the extent of it; it is published in the west part of the county.

9471. Mr. Hunt.] Is it the practice of Liberals generally to take in the papers only which advocate their views?—No.

9472. Why did you say that the number of papers which they took in on one side as compared with the other was an indication of their views?—Because the disposition would be more to read the articles written by Liberal men than on the other side; and also I belong to a newsroom where we take in a larger proportion of Conservative papers than all the members like.

9473. Chairman.] I did not quite understand you by whom were those men dismissed; who had the actual dismissal of the men?—The foreman of the works.

9474. Was not it sanctioned by any higher authority than the foreman?—No; the employing and the discharging of the men are within his province.

9476. Has he the power of discharging what men he pleases?—I cannot say as to that; but even if he had to consult his superior at Crewe, I take it that his recommendation would have considerable weight.

9477. Who would send the positive order that such and such men were to go?—It was sent from the works at Crewe.

9478. Sir George Grey.] Was the order to discharge a certain number because they were not wanted?—Yes.

9479. Did the selection of the men to be discharged rest with this foreman?—Yes, entirely.

9480. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You do not mean to say that the foreman dismissed those men; he only acted in obedience to the locomotive superintendent at Crewe, did he not?—He selected out of the number those that were to go.

9481. Did he not make a report?—I do not know.

9482. Are you speaking of your own knowledge?—I am speaking of my own knowledge as to the men being dismissed.

9483. You do not believe that the foreman has the power of dismissing men from the railway works?—I do, certainly.

9484. Chairman.] You believe that those men were selected by the foreman, and that it was he who had the real power of selecting those men who were to be dismissed?—Yes; I believe he is fully responsible for their discharge.

9485. Was the discharge of those men, and the intimidation which it was alleged was exercised by the railway company, commented upon in any of the Carlisle newspapers?—Yes. At the time that this was, a placard signed by eight men, denying the fact that they had been assembled together and a vote taken, appeared in front of the hustings on the day of the nomination; it was commented upon by the Carlisle paper the day following.

9486. Was any denial ever put forward by the Conservative party, or by any railway official, that such intimidation had been practised?—No, nothing beyond this placard.

9487. Will you read it?—It is headed, "A gross mistake stated by Sir Wilfrid Lawson. We, the undersigned employés of the London and North Western Railway, being present when W. N. Hodgson, Esq., visited the London and North Western works at St. Nicholas, beg to contradict the assertion of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's informant, as stated in his speech made in the Athenæum on Thursday night. He stated that he had been informed that W. N. Hodgson, Esq., a director on the London and North Western Railway, had called together a great number of men in a room belonging to the London and North Western Railway, and there had the men called upon to hold up their hands if they were going to vote for Mr. Hodgson. We beg most distinctly to state that no such thing was done by Mr. Hodgson; but one of the men who was passing at the time, whose name is Thompson, a non-elector, and a native of Preston, made use of the following words: 'You that are for Church and State, hold up your hands for Nicholson Hodgson!' And we further wish to say, in justice to ourselves and Mr. Hodgson, we never heard of any case of intimidation during the time we have been in the service of the company; and we feel such disgraceful slander is an injustice to ourselves and the service. We should not have taken notice of it, but for the high regard which is entertained by ourselves and fellow workmen towards Mr. Hodgson, and we feel that we are in duty bound to contradict such vile statements; and we also feel it a duty to ourselves and Mr. Hodgson to render an account of what has been said about Mr. Hodgson during the time he was amongst us. We must also add, that any such slanders of this kind only tend to strengthen the feeling we have for W. N. Hodgson, Esq." Then come the names of eight electors who were present, and then there is this postscript: "P. S.—Mr. Hodgson's visit to the works was not for the purpose of soliciting votes, but to thank us for our promises, and to answer any questions that might be put to him." That postscript is totally at variance with the truth. I have it on evidence from men who were present, both who voted contrary to Mr. Hodgson and who voted for him, assuring me most distinctly that the statement signed by those men is incorrect. One of those men on the day after the election was in a state of drunkenness, and he was taunting one of the men who was a Liberal in politics, but had been obliged to vote contrary to his conviction from fear of losing his situation. This man taunted the other voter with being obliged to vote, notwithstanding that he had promised to the contrary; and the man was so enraged at his conduct that he says, "I did not do as you did, sign my name to a damned lie," meaning this document. The man thereupon laid hold of him, and threw him over his buttock, and lamed him; the man was laid up for a fortnight, and I believe that matter was hushed up. He was obliged to pay the man his wages, and something else, to keep the matter quiet, lest it should cause trouble at headquarters.

9488. Mr. Hunt.] It comes to this, that the man said he signed his name to a damned lie, which he immediately resented?—Yes, that is quite consistent with the fact.

9489. And the man who was attacked on account of that imputation, took no steps to recover damages in any way?—No, the only step that was taken, was a threat to report him to headquarters. I believe that his wages were paid to him during his illness. If the man had taken steps to prosecute the other man, the chances are, that he would have been got rid of from the works, and of course the fear of that would prevent him doing so.

Rt. Hon. G. W. Hunt, M.P.

9490. Chairman.] HAVE you any suggestion to make to the Committee with reference to the subject of their inquiry?—I merely wish to submit a plan to the Committee for polling in counties. There is a great evil at present in county voters having to go long distances to vote, and the consequence of that has been, that the Legislature has sanctioned the providing of conveyances for voters, not paying the voters the expenses of their own conveyance, but providing conveyances for them. I think that this is wrong in principle, but it is the only means of enabling voters who live at a distance from the polling places to vote, and I wish to suggest a scheme by which every voter resident in a county might vote near his own home. I think this might be done by having the votes taken by the parish officers, and I would suggest this, that a register might be made to answer all the purpose of a poll-book; that there might be added to every register a certain margin with columns ruled, in which might be entered the names of the voters and the way they had voted. That the clerk of the peace on the occasion of each election might send a sheet relating to each parish, to the overseers of that parish, and that the overseers might use that sheet as the poll-book for the parish; and I think that, in addition to the column in the margin for the purpose of recording the vote, there might be a counterfoil the same as in a cheque-book, and that the parish officer should enter the vote of each voter in duplicate; then he should tear off the counterfoil which would be a duplicate of the poll-sheet, so far as that vote was concerned, and hand it to the voter at the time of his voting, so that the voter should have a receipt for his vote, and that it would be impossible for the overseer afterwards to alter the sheet; the voter himself would have a check, so that if there was any such falsification, it could be immediately disproved. I would have the overseer find a room in the parish for taking the votes, which would be an open court, and the voters should go there within the hours to be prescribed, and there record their votes, in the same way as they are now taken at the polling booths; and then at the close of the poll the overseers should sign the poll sheet, should place it in an envelope, should take it to the post office and register it, and it should be addressed to the returning officer. I also propose that the declaration of the poll should be later than it is now, that a longer interval should elapse between the close of the poll and the declaration, so as to ensure getting all the polling sheets from the different parishes. The only inconvenience venience would be this, that the result of the poll would be known perhaps a day or two days later than it is at present. I think by those means you would enable all voters, except those who were living away from their qualifications, to record their votes without any loss of time, without liability to be personated, and without any expense as regards conveyance.

9491. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that the overseers might be trusted to put the questions to the voters which the law authorises to be put, and to do all the business which is now required of a deputy returning officer in the polling booths?—I think so, if you consider that at present the overseer is entrusted with the duty of making out lists. It rests with him to receive the notices from the claimants, and make out a list of claims, and to submit them to the revising barrister. He receives those claims now at a time when there is no one to look after him. I think, myself, that he has now an opportunity of depriving persons of their votes by refusing to enter their claims, but we do not find that the overseers do so. I think that, in this country, everyone who holds an official position feels a sense of responsibility upon him.

9492. Chairman.] It would be necessary, would it not, to have a representative of each candidate present?—I do not think that it would; I think that where any candidate had a partisan in a parish he would generally be present; and if there was more than one, they would arrange who should be present in the room. But even supposing it was necessary for each candidate to have some one to look after his interest, it would be a far cheaper thing than the present system of the candidate finding conveyances for the voters to go to the poll.

9493. That amounts, does it not, to having a polling-place in each parish?—Yes.

9495. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is not the overseer in those country parishes very often a perfectly uneducated man?—If he is too uneducated to take votes in that way he is too uneducated to make out the list of voters which he is now required by law to do.

9496. Is there not great complaint now of the way in which the register is made up?—I think now and then there are complaints, but not as a rule. But taking the vote is a very simple matter, it is merely making a line opposite the name; they would not even have to write the voter's name, according to my plan, because they would take the register which would be used as a poll-book, and under the candidate's name they would merely make a mark. I can hardly conceive of any person appointed an overseer, who would not be capable of doing such an extremely simple an act as that.

9497. Mr. Brand.] How do you provide for the case of non-resident voters?—I must leave them as they are. I do not think that is a very important matter. Non-resident voters are generally persons to whom the expense of going to the poll is no great object. But if you want to carry out the system perfectly you might do this: you might have central polling places for all England, in the different centres of population. You might appoint a public officer to take votes for every county in England, say, in London, Manchester, Birmingham, and so forth, under proper safeguards, and then have those certified votes transmitted to the returning officer for each county. But I do not think it would be any very great hardship for those who are non-resident at a distance, and who are generally the more wealthy persons, to be at the expense of coming to vote in their own parishes. You would at least have this advantage, that non-resident voters would not be personated as they are now, because in parishes where their qualification lies there would be sure to be some one who would know them.

9498. Do I understand that, according to your plan, that should be the process with every voter?—Yes, I would make it the duty of the parish officer to take the votes, whatever the number was.

9499. Mr. Locke.] Where do you propose that he should take the votes?—I propose that the overseer should find a room, and I believe that in every parish he would be able to find a room for such a purpose. There is generally a school-room in every parish.

9500. You propose that he should have that on the day of the election?—Yes, only on the day of the election, and within prescribed hours.

9501. Sir George Grey.] You are, of course, well acquainted with the power which now exists for increasing the number of polling places where the number is insufficient?—Yes.

9502. Taking your own county of Northamptonshire, has that been carried out to the full extent which the law allows, or might not there be more polling places than there were at the last election?— There might be more polling places under the recent Act, but in my own division we have not increased the number of polling places, because they had been increased before, but in the other division, where the polling places were too few for convenience, steps are now being taken to increase the number of polling places; but the difficulty always is this, that a good many persons object to increasing the number of polling places under the present system, because, they say, it causes an increase of expense. Polling booths have to be put up, and deputy returning officers have to be engaged, and all those things increase the expenses of an election. According to my proposition, there would be no expense at all as regards that. I should expect the overseer to perform the duties without any remuneration, except expenses out of pocket, which, I take it, would be very small indeed.

9503. Would it not be necessary to have check clerks at every polling place?—I do not think myself that it would be. I think persons in every parish would voluntarily keep watch over the proceedings of the overseership, but I do not think that a parish officer, acting officially, and so forth, would be likely to be guilty of any improper conduct in the discharge of his duties. I should like to add this, that even supposing the system of the ballot is adopted, it is necessary in fairness to the voter that there should be a polling place in every parish, and it is more necessary now than it used to be in consequence of the lowering of the franchise. Shopkeepers, for instance, who have to attend to their business, have no time to go to a town some miles off and record their vote. Therefore, I think, that under any system of voting there ought to be a polling place in every parish.

9504. Mr. Locke.] In very large parishes that would involve a great deal of machinery, would it not, as the overseer himself could not do it all? —I think he might. In general, in very large parishes, there is a paid assistant overseer, and the overseer might have the assistance of a deputy in that way.

9505. Then you would allow him to employ persons under him?—He might do so, under certain restrictions.

9506. Mr. Raikes.] Do you propose to confine this entirely to counties?—Perhaps the same system might be adopted in boroughs such as Shoreham, which are, in fact, like divisions of counties.

9507. Mr. Fawcett.] If your scheme were carried out, I presume you would render the conveyance of voters illegal?—Yes, certainly.

9508. Do you think that this scheme of yours would very greatly diminish the expense of county elections?—I think very considerably indeed; and even supposing that candidates were obliged to retain some person to look after their interests in every parish, I think the expenses would not be one-tenth of what they are now.

9509. Should you also render the paying for the conveyance of non-resident voters illegal?—I should have no objection to making it entirely illegal to provide conveyance for voters if their was a polling place in every parish. With regard to out-voters, it is a question upon which other persons might entertain a different opinion.

9510. Did I understand you that you would be in favour of allowing South Lancashire voters, for instance, who lived in London, to vote in London, by going to a central authority and voting?—I think that might be done. This scheme does not at all depend upon that, but I think it might be done. If persons living at a distance are still allowed to record their votes, it might be possible to provide the means of their doing so in that way; you might have certain places in London, for instance.

9511. Does not it strike you that if that were done, the non-resident voters would be so much increased that they would swamp the resident voters in the county?—That, of course, would be an argument against it; but this is no part of the scheme. I merely suggested it in answer to a question from an honourable Member of the Committee. No doubt that would be an argument against it.

9512. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] On whom would you place the overseer's expenses; on the candidates or on the county?—According to the present law the candidate would have to pay the expenses, and supposing that that law was continued, of course the expenses of the overseer would fall upon the candidate; but if the law was altered, throwing the expenses of conducting an election upon the ratepayers, of course the overseer's expenses would be thrown upon them in that case.

9513. But it is not part of your plan to alter the law?—No. My impression is this; that the expense of conducting an election in that way would be so exceedingly small, that it would be very immaterial whether it fell upon the candidate or upon the ratepayers. I think that there are 153 parishes in my division, and I do not myself suppose that it would cost 5*s.* each under such a system.

9514. Not including the providing of rooms? —No, I think not; I think the room would in almost every case be found for nothing.

9515. Mr. Edward Egerton.] But it would be necessary to have a check clerk in every case, would it not?—I do not think so; but if the candidate wished to have a check clerk, he might; supposing that you had a check clerk in every parish, I suppose you would not give the check clerk more than a guinea, and I should have been very glad to compound for 153 guineas the expenses of my election.

9517. Do you think that if polling places were multiplied to the extent to which the law now allows, so as to bring them very much nearer the residences of the voters, there would not be a great saving of expense in their conveyance, counterbalancing the increased expense, owing to the poll clerks who would be required, and other expenses?—I think that within certain limits the multiplication of polling places decreases the expenses of an election to candidates in counties; but when you go beyond those limits, I am not prepared to say then that it would decrease the expenditure.

9518. Do you think it is the apprehension of increased expenditure which prevents polling places being multiplied to the extent to which they now might be done by law?—Yes, I am sure it is.

9519.] Chairman.] What is the number of persons now officially employed in each polling booth?—I think there is the sheriff's deputy, and there are two poll clerks relieving one another, and then the candidates provide check clerks. I think there are three official persons, but I really am hardly a competent witness upon that subject.

9520. There are three official persons, and one invariably employed by each party; you think that those might be altogether reduced to one?— Yes, I think so; because in this instance the numbers who would vote in any one place would be very considerably reduced, and the person taking the poll would know personally nearly every voter.

9522. Take the case of a voter in a distant part of a county; how would he know whether his vote counted or not in the aggregate number?— I would always have the whole of the names published afterwards, and then if he found that his vote was not reckoned up, or reckoned for the wrong candidate, he would be able to produce the counterfoil which he had received, showing that he had voted in a particular way.

9523. In what way could that mistake be rectified except by an election petition?—I suppose it could could not, except by an election petition; no more it can now. That was just the case which arose at Warrington, the other day. It was alleged that a certain number of votes had been given, and had not been recorded by the returning officer. What I should propose is this: that after the election the poll sheets for each parish should be put up at the church door, and then every voter resident in the parish would have an opportunity of seeing whether his vote had been duly counted by the returning officer; and if not there could be a petition.

9525. Chairman.] I think you mentioned that the overseers have now the preparation of the register?—Not of the register, but of the lists for the revising barrister's court.

9526. Is it not come within your knowledge that great complaints have been made of the negligent way in which they perform their duty?—Yes, complaints are made sometimes, but it is not a very easy task for an unprofessional person to make out lists for the revising barrister. Sometimes there is confusion made by the overseers between the old lists and the new claims. I believe a common mistake of the overseers is this, that instead of leaving the old lists as they stand, and making out a new list of claims, they think it necessary to copy out the old lists, mixing up the claims with them. I do not think that there is often a complaint made that they make any other mistake.

9527. You are aware that it is alleged that in some country districts, in many districts, in fact, great undue influence is put upon voters by persons possessing property, or some other kind of power?—We have heard of it in this Committee.

9529. Does not an unpopular candidate get his votes together in this way: that he sends his agents or canvassers to collect what voters he has in the districts which are against him, and they collect them together and bring them all up to the poll together?—I believe that is done sometimes.

9531. Supposing the ballot were adopted, would there be in that case any great objection to the polling for the counties being prolonged for more than one day?—I do not think I have considered that question; I think it is generally desirable to get an election over as soon as possible; it is always an excitement.

9532. Would your objection be altered if the ballot were adopted in this way; that supposing the polling were to last for two or three days, an authorised person might take the ballot boxes from one place to another in the district?—They might do so, but I think it would be pretty well known how the election stood if they were to do so. In my county they would know pretty well. If a person who had charge of the ballot-box went to a certain parish, they would know that there would be so many votes one way, and so many another, and I think that any person who went with him would be able to make out pretty much how the poll stood, but I would do it simultaneously all over the division.

9533. Why would that be the case more than if the same voters had to go up to a certain polling place to give their votes?—It would be very nearly the same. At present you do not know how the poll is going on at distant polling places, but according to my suggested scheme, it would go on simultaneously in every parish, and it would be impossible then to know how the poll stood.

9534. If the ballot were adopted you would still have a ballot box in each village?—Yes; I think that now there is excessive unfairness to the country voters; the town voters have a very undue advantage, living near the polling places. A man, perhaps, in five or ten minutes can go and record his vote if he happens to live in a town; but if he happens to live 10 miles from the polling place it takes him a whole day, involving him or somebody else on the same side of politics in a large expense.

9535. Is there anybody in your division living 10 miles from a polling place?—Yes; I think so; my county is peculiarly shaped; we have done all that we fairly can in my division to increase the number of polling places; but I think there are still cases of voters having to go 10 miles to a polling place; not many, but there are some, I think.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. GEORGE FREDERIC VERDON, C.B., called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. F. Verdon, C.B.

22 June 1869

9536. Chairman.] You have been connected with one of the Australian Governments, have you not?—I was a member of the Government of Victoria.

9537. Will you tell the Committee in what capacity?—As treasurer.

9538. At what time?—In the years 1860 and 1861, and from 1863 until last year.

9539. Have you also been a member of the Legislature?—Yes.

9540. Will you tell the Committee what are the elective assemblies of Victoria?—There are two Legislative Chambers, the Legislative Council, and the Legislative Assembly.

9541. What are the franchises for those two assemblies?—The members of the Legislative Council are elected by the holders of property, persons who possess certain freehold or leasehold property are entitled to vote for members of the Legislative Council, who are required to be possessed of a certain property qualification according to law; the members of the Legislative Assembly do not require to have any qualification, and the election of the Legislative Assembly are either ratepayers upon the ratepayer's roll, or the holders of electoral rights, to which all persons who are either natural born subjects or naturalised subjects of Her Majesty are entitled, upon certain conditions prescribed by the Act.

9542. What are the numbers which compose the two Assemblies?—Thirty members compose the Council, and 78 members compose the Assembly.

9543. Do you know what are the numbers on the electoral roll for each, or approximately?—I can scarcely say without reference, they change from time to time, but I could furnish the Committee with the information.

9544. Are the Council and the Assembly elected at the same time, and for the same periods?—No; the members of the Assembly are elected for three years, and the members of the Council are elected for 10 years, and they go out by rotation in batches of six every two years.

9545. May both Chambers be dissolved by the governor?—The Legislative Council cannot be dissolved.

9546. Must the elections take place at stated periods?—Yes.

9547. What is the mode of election for each of these Assemblies?—The elections are conducted by ballot for both Houses.

9548. Can you describe to the Committee the process of election from beginning to end, the nomination, and so on?—I can either do so, or I can, if the Committee prefer it, mention that part of the Act which relates to the proceedings at and concerning elections. It would be scarcely possible to give the Committee full information without reading the whole of that part of the Act, because it relates to all the details for conducting elections, which are very important where the ballot is the principle observed. There are about 74 sections which form part of the Act, all relating more or less directly to the mode in which the election by ballot is conducted. If I may venture to suggest it, it would be scarcely possible for the Committee to acquire an accurate notion of the mode of conducting an election in Victoria, unless all those sections, to which I refer, in Part 3 of "The Electoral Act of 1865," the 29th of Victoria, c. 279, ss. 70 to 144, be recorded or taken notice of by the Committee.

9549. Will you describe, shortly, what is the system?—The first difference which appears between the old form of election, which was the open system, and that of the ballot, consists in the nomination.

9550. When did the change take place?—The ballot was introduced in Victoria about 13 years ago. There is no longer a public nomination of candidates; the nomination consists in a written paper which is to be delivered to the returning officer within certain dates, signed by not less than 10 qualified electors; and to which is added a declaration on the part of each candidate that he is prepared to serve if elected. In the case of the Council, each candidate has to deposit a sum of 100 l., and in the case of the Assembly, a sum of 50*l.* This money, it is provided by the Act, shall go to the expense of the elections, if it should be forfeited, as it may be if any candidate receives less than one-fifth of the number of votes given to the candidate at the head of the poll, if there be more than one, or than the successful candidate, if there be only one. This provision was introduced in order to prevent persons allowing themselves to be nominated who were not in earnest, and who really did not desire to serve if elected.

9551. Are the necessary expenses borne by the Government?—The expenses may be classified under two heads. The ordinary expenses of conducting the election, the hiring of rooms where that is necessary, and the ordinary printing of the official notices is undertaken by the Government, but of course all the expenses of canvassing where there is canvassing, and the printing of the candidates' addresses are borne by the candidates. The nomination paper having been received by the returning officer is posted by him in certain conspicuous places; so that the electors may see who have been nominated. After a certain number of days, if there be more persons nominated than are required to fill the vacancies, the returning officer proceeds to take the votes of the electors, and he does that by the ballot.

9553. And can those nominations be sent in up to the day fixed for the nomination?—Yes, to a certain hour of that day, and the nomination paper having been sent in and duly posted, and there being more candidates than vacancies to be filled the returning officer then proceeds to conduct the election, and a proper place is chosen for the purpose.

9554. Mr. Hunt.] What means are taken to verify the nomination papers; what security has the returning officer that the nominations are bonâ fide?—The security provided by the Act is, that the nomination paper shall be signed by not less than 10 of the electors for the district in which the election is being conducted, and that there shall be also at the foot of the nomination paper a declaration signed by the candidate to the effect that he is willing to serve, all the names of course being known to the returning officer as the names of persons who are on the roll of the electors.

9555. How does the returning officer know that the signatures are genuine of the 10 electors and of the candidate?—He has, of course, the ordinary means of satisfying himself as to that.

9556. He can find that those names are on the register, but how does he ascertain that the signatures are genuine; would it be possible for 10 persons to sign the names of 10 electors, and for the eleventh to sign the name of the candidate, without being detected?—It would be very difficult.

9557. What security is there against that?—One security exists in this, that all the electors who vote as the holders of electors' rights, have to sign their names (I shall presently describe what that means) in a book which is kept, and to which every returning officer has access, and, of course, he can compare the handwriting. But, of course, the Committee must not be misled by that, because the nomination paper might be signed by 10 persons who are voters in virtue of their being ratepayers or holders of property, not by virtue of their being holders of electoral rights. I think in that case there would not be the same means of checking.

9558. Chairman.] I suppose there is a penalty for any one forging a nomination paper?—Yes; a very severe one. It cannot possibly do any real harm, but as soon as the notice appeared, if the signatures were forged, or if the person nominated were not really willing to be a candidate, and his signature also were forged, the contradiction would appear at once, and the electors would not be misled.

9559. Sir George Grey.] There is always deposited a certain sum of money, is there not, to accompany the nomination?—Yes. A room has to be fitted up and divided into a certain number of polling booths, each booth being sufficiently large to admit of the presence of one person at a time, and being provided with a desk and a pencil with which the voter strikes out the names from the voting paper of the persons for whom he does not intend to vote. Upon the day of the election the door is opened and persons are permitted to enter and to tender their votes; certain persons only are allowed to be in the room at the time of taking the votes, those persons being the returning officer or his deputy, the poll clerks, and the scrutineers duly appointed under the Act, and any voters not exceeding six in number, being actually engaged in voting, to be designated, if necessary, by the returning officer or his deputy, at any one time. Without the consent of the returning officer or his deputy, no one can remain in the polling-room during the taking of the poll.

9561. Chairman.] Before an elector proceeds into a booth, where he strikes out the names of the candidates, for whom he does not intend to vote, what test has he to pass in order to prove that he is the right voter?—He enters the room and addressing the returning officer, claims to be allowed to vote; the returning officer thereupon asks him whether he claims to vote as a ratepayer, or the holder of property, or as the holder of an elector's right. If he says that he claims as being upon the ratepayers' roll, the scrutineers and the poll clerks examine the roll and look to see if his name be there; if they find that his name is duly recorded upon the roll, the returning officer hands to him a voting paper, which has been previously to the election initialled by him, and which upon delivery to the voter is numbered by the returning officer in accordance with the numbering upon the electoral roll, each name on the electoral roll having a number corresponding to it. Having received the paper so initialled and so numbered, the voter retires into one of the polling booths, and there strikes out from the voting paper the name or names of the person or persons for whom he does not intend to vote. Then he is instructed to fold up the paper in such a way as to conceal the names upon the face of the paper, and in such a way as to conceal the number on the back of the paper; he then comes into the room where the ballot box stands in an open place upon a table in front of the returning officer, and he himself deposits into a properly made opening in the ballot box, the paper so folded up, and he then leaves the polling place.

9562. Sir George Grey.] Does he sign this voting paper in the room when he is perfectly alone?—He marks it when he is perfectly alone. The polling booths are made in compartments, placed against the wall of the room, and sufficiently deep to prevent anyone from seeing the voter or interfering with him in any way while he marks the voting paper.

9564. Supposing he does not comply with the regulations as to folding up the paper properly, is the vote lost?—No; but before the paper can be put into the box it must be so folded up, and the returning officer will call upon him to do so.

9565. Mr. Hunt.] Does the voting take place in those retired corners, or in sight of anybody?—It takes place in the polling booth as distinguished from the room of which the polling-booths form part.

9566. Supposing the voter does not fold up his paper but brings it out open in the room, is he allowed to place it in the ballot-box?—If he does not desire the protection of the ballot, and wishes to declare how he votes there is nothing to prevent his doing so, and I have seen that done.

9567. Is that commonly done?—No, they generally fold them. It would be difficult to insert a voting paper unfolded.

9568. Chairman.] If necessary it can be ascertained afterwards can it not, how each voter has voted?—Yes; by means of the number which I have already described. According to the law in order to protect the secrecy of the ballot, and at the same time to retain the power which is sometimes necessary in cases of appeal or petition to ascertain how each person has voted, a number is placed upon the back of the paper by the returning officer, and the scrutineers have to make a declaration of secrecy, and the returning officer who is always a responsible person, and can be trusted by every body, is enjoined by the Act when, after having opened the ballot-box he declares upon the face of the ballot papers how each vote has gone to be careful to conceal from himself, and from all others who may be there,—who are the scrutineers and the poll clerks,—the number on the back of the paper. The way in which that is done is this: the paper is folded and put in the box, and each paper is taken out folded, and placed upon the table before the returning officer and opened, so that the back is not seen by anybody. The vote is then read from the face of the ballot paper, and the ballot paper is put on one side until the box has been emptied.

9569. Sir George Grey.] Is that done in the presence of some persons?—Yes, it is done in the presence of the poll clerks and the scrutineers, and there being, of course conflicting opinions and interests, they all keep very keenly watching the result.

9570. Mr. Locke.] Is the number on the back of the paper?—Yes, the number is on the back of the paper.

9571. Chairman.] You stated that the paper not only bears a number, but that it is always signed by the proper officer?—No; it is initialled or signed on the back by the returning officer, in order as far as possible to prevent the chance of spurious papers being inserted.

9572. Then the only means of identification is the number?—Yes; which can only be used as a means of identification by being compared with the corresponding number in the electors' roll.

9573. Mr. Hunt. Is the number put on the paper at the time when the voter presents himself in the room?—Yes, not before.

9574. With a pen or a pencil?—With a pen usually, by the returning officer.

9575. Chairman.] How long does the voting continue?—One day, from 9 until 4 o'clock.

9576. Mr. Hunt.] What is there to prevent a voter taking in a paper with his right number endorsed upon it and forging the initials of the returning officer or his deputy?—He could not put into the box any paper which was not given to him by the returning officer unless he brought a paper in for the purpose; he might do that, of course.

9577. Chairman.] After the poll is closed, which lasts till four o'clock, does the scrutiny immediately begin?—Technically of course, a scrutiny does not take place except in the case of a petition.

9578. I mean the counting of the votes?—The counting of the votes takes place at once; the room is cleared of all persons who are not entitled by law to be present; that is to say, the returning officer, the scrutineers, and the poll-clerks; but I ought to have observed that, before any voting papers are put into the box at all it is opened in the presence of the persons entitled to be there, so that every one may see that there is nothing in it; it is then closed and locked, and at the close of the poll it is opened by the returning officer and the papers are taken out one by one in the way I have described; they are then made up in a parcel and sealed by the returning officer, and of course the parcels are never opened unless it be necessary to do so upon a petition.

9579. Are the votes counted at the polling-place where they were delivered?—Yes, when there is only one polling place.

9580. The ballot box is not removed to any other place?—When there are more polling places than one the ballot box is removed, because the returning officer appoints deputies at the commencement of the election who are authorised to act for him in all the various electoral districts in which the booths are provided, and who forward the ballot boxes to the returning officer when the poll is over.

9581. Are the number of the votes which have been given for each candidate at each polling-place announced there?—Yes, after they have been given at each polling-place. It is not officially done; there is no concealment of it, but it is not considered that the poll has been declared until it has been declared from the central polling place at which all the returns from the deputy returning officers come in.

9582. There are, I presume, a number of polling-places ling-places to one electoral district?—Yes, where the electoral district is very large.

9583. And the result of the election is not officially declared until all the results of the election at each polling-place have been brought in to the nomination place?—Yes, that is so.

9584. When does the declaration of the poll take place?—Usually upon the day following at 12 o'clock, there is an official declaration of the poll.

9585. Is that done publicly?—Yes, it is done publicly.

9586. Have you ever known objections to be made to the validity of an election?—Yes.

9587. At what stage?—After the election has taken place necessarily, because any objections, which are made before that, would be objections to some particular voter. I take it that objections to an election can only take place after the result has been announced. Objections sometimes take place in the polling place to particular voters, the objections being raised by the scrutineers; as, for instance, that a man is not qualified to vote, in which case certain questions are prescribed by the Act which the returning officer is bound, upon the requisition of the scrutineer, to put to the voter, and which he is bound to answer; and in the case of voters who vote as the holders of electoral rights, who, as I before mentioned, have to sign their names in a book, the returning officer may be called upon by the scrutineers to call upon a voter to sign his name, and he is then enjoined to compare the signature so made with the signature formerly made in the book in which the signatures are recorded, and if there be a sufficient difference to induce the returning officer to believe that the voter is not qualified, and is not the same person, the vote so tendered is put on one side, and not then accepted.

9588. Is that within the control of the returning officer?—Yes, who may be moved, as I have explained, by the scrutineers either to ask those questions, or to cause the signature to be made.

9590. Have you known objections made?—Yes, I have been a member of the Elections and Qualifications Committee.

9591. Within what time must the objection be made?—It is within a certain number of days.

9592. Are the polling papers preserved until that number of days has expired?—Yes.

9593. After the expiration of that time are they destroyed?—I am not quite sure how long they are kept, or whether they are destroyed at the end of a certain time. My impression is that they are destroyed after having been kept a sufficient time to be used in case a petition should be presented.

9594. Are the electoral districts large?—Yes, some of them are very large. The principle upon which the districts are divided is that of population, as nearly as possible. Of course, where the population is scattered, the districts are geographically very large.

9595. Can you state about what number of electors are distributed to each district?—It is very unequal, a return could be furnished showing it, but the population of all new countries is very migratory, and it is impossible to keep the electoral divisions equal without altering the law so frequently as to produce great inconvenience.

9596. Speaking roughly, could you say about what number of voters belonged to each district?—Speaking roughly, from 500 to 8,000 voters. I am speaking now of the electors for the House of Assembly, the electors for the Legislative Council are a much less numerous body; speaking roughly, there were about 10,000 under the old law. The qualification of members and electors has been recently reduced, and the number on the roll for the Council will be greatly increased.

9597. Are the electoral districts for the election of members of the Council the same as those for the Assembly?—No; they are different, both by name and in character. The districts for which members of the Legislative Council are elected are termed provinces, and are very much larger than the electoral districts from which the representatives are chosen for the Legislative Assembly.

9599. I think you stated that you have known cases of petitions being presented against the return of members; are they frequent?—No.

9600. Can you tell the Committee what has been the result of such petitions?—It has been various; in some cases the petition has been successful, and the member petitioned against has lost his seat.

9601. On what grounds has such a decision been given?—I remember that in some cases votes have been disallowed upon the disqualification of the electors being established; and where the election has been a very close one, perhaps half-a-dozen votes between the two candidates, enough votes have been challenged, and successfully challenged, to alter the state of the poll.

9602. That, I presume, has been the result of a scrutiny?—Yes, that has been the result of a scrutiny.

9603. That scrutiny, I think, could not be conducted, except by some such provision as you have described, of numbering the votes?—I believe it to be impossible to conduct it without that means being left open.

9604. Mr. Bright.] Have there been any petitions charging bribery or corruption?—I think there have been some in which treating, as one form of bribery, has been alleged.

9605. Chairman.] In the case of a scrutiny, are the whole of the numbers made public, or only those which have been decided to have been improperly given?—Only those which are challenged.

9606. In the case of a scrutiny then, is it necessary for the judicial authority whatever it is, or the court, to go through the whole of the votes?—No, not necessarily so. Supposing that a petition alleged that A. B. and C. were not entitled titled to vote or were bribed, the chairman of the Elections and Qualification Committee would only examine the votes discovered by means of the numbers of A. B. and C. Of course a petition could be so framed, as to make it necessary for the Elections and Qualifications Committee to examine all the votes; but in that case they would observe the secrecy of the ballot, as far as it was possible to do it, consistently with the still higher duty of discovering the fraud.

9607. What is the court which tries election petitions?—A committee of the Legislative Assembly, in the case of the Assembly, or of the Council in the case of the Council appointed by warrant of the Speaker, following I believe the English practice; it is not an elected committee, but appointed by the nomination of the Speaker, who issues his warrant, and lays it upon the table a certain number of times, in order that objection may be raised to it if any one see fit.

9608. Mr. Bright.] In whose custody are the voting papers kept?—They are in the possession of the returning officer until the conclusion of the election, and they are then forwarded I think to the Chief Secretary, who is the Minister under whose department all the business of the elections is conducted.

9609. Chairman.] Have you ever known any petition presented on account of any irregularities which took place during the election?—Yes; but there is a section of the Act to which perhaps it would be convenient to refer, which gives power to the Governor in Council to cure any defects in the conduct of an election, which ought not to affect the validity of the election. Technical errors or omissions, which may have been made, and which in a court of law would be held perhaps to make the election invalid, may be cured by the order of the Governor in Council.

9610. Has fraud, such as the putting of forged voting papers into the ballot-box ever been alleged?—Never.

9611. As I understand you, when petitions have taken place, the grounds of the petition have been the disqualification of voters or bribery?—Yes; I never heard of a case of stuffing the ballot-box in Victoria.

9612. Do you recollect any other grounds which have been alleged?—No, I cannot remember now any other.

9613. Were you acquainted with the colony before the introduction of this system?—I was.

9614. What opinion have you formed of the operation of this mode of voting, first as to the purity of elections?—I believe that, although perhaps there is no country in which less protection is needed for the voter, the effect of the ballot has been most beneficial in both respects; I believe that it has tended to keep the elections pure, for they never had been I think very corrupt; and I am quite certain from my own experience and observation that the effect of the ballot is to make the election an orderly and decent proceeding instead of the reverse.

9615. You do not think that bribery prevailed to any great extent before the introduction of the ballot?—No.

9616. Used there to be any drinking?—Yes.

9617. Has that been diminished?—Not altogether, but to a very great extent it has.

9618. There does still exist some treating?—If I may be permitted to say so, undiscriminating treating is the only kind of treating that is possible now; but for those who choose to maintain the secrecy of the ballot, it is quite impossible for any one to ascertain how the people vote; and it is difficult for candidates to treat their supporters under those circumstances unless they declare themselves.

9619. Do candidates attempt to obtain general popularity by means of indiscriminate treating?—Very little.

9620. Should you say that treating had diminished since the introduction of the ballot?—Yes, I should say so, although I am bound to say that before the ballot, although there was treating, it never prevailed to a very great extent.

9621. Do you understand by treating, keeping public-houses open at the expense of the candidate?—I understand that to be the meaning of the term.

9622. Are the elections, in general, quietly conducted now?—Yes.

9624. Have you never known of attempts made to prevent voters who were supposed to be hostile from coming to the poll?—No.

9625. Is there much excitement about the election often?—Yes, intense excitement; but it is the excitement caused by the political questions which are being discussed.

9626. Do a large number of the electors generally give their votes?—Yes, the proportion varies in various districts. Where the districts are very large, and the electors have to come in a great distance in order to record their votes, so large a proportion of the total number on the roll do not record their votes as in smaller districts, and in towns where the polling places are easily accessible.

9627. You would not say that the introduction of the ballot had caused any apathy on the subject of elections?—No, I should say not, certainly.

9628. Have contests been frequent under the ballot?—Yes, for the Legislative Assembly they have been.

9629. Is it the rule or the exception for a contest to take place?—The rule.

9630. What number of members are elected for one district?—I think three is the greatest number in any district that I can remember.

9631. Does any district return only one member?—Yes.

9632. Can each voter give as many votes as there are members?—Yes.

9633. Are there generally a great number of candidates, or only about double the number for whom there are vacancies?—That depends entirely upon the circumstances of the case; if there be a general election, there are of course not so many candidates in each district as there may be, and frequently are, in the case of an isolated election taking place while the House is sitting.

9634. In such a case there are sometimes a great number of candidates?—Yes.

9635. Have you formed any opinion as to whether the system as practised in Victoria is superior or inferior to other ballot systems?—I think that in that particular, which I have mentioned, namely, that a scrutiny is possible without in any material degree affecting the secrecy of the ballot, and the protection which the ballot affords, the plan observed in Victoria is superior to the plans observed in other colonies and countries where no scrutiny is possible. My belief is that where there can be no scrutiny, the facility for stuffing the ballot-box, or for recording improper votes, is greater.

9636. Is secrecy practically preserved, or is it generally known how each voter votes?—In some cases it is known, and in some cases it is not; it is made known by some electors who choose to do so, who think it is proper that they should declare how they vote, and it is concealed by those who choose to avail themselves of the advantage which the ballot confers.

9637. But the system does give perfect secrecy if it is required by the electors?—Yes, perfectly so.

9638. Have you any knowledge of elections as they are at present conducted in this country?—I have not seen any election that has taken place in England since I have been here.

9640. Do you think that in a very small constituency it would practically give secrecy?—I think so, if secrecy be desired by the electors; but it must always be remembered that if the electors choose to reject the protection which the ballot affords them, if they think fit to declare how they vote, they can do so, and especially if the candidates think it proper to canvass and endeavour to ascertain how electors will vote before the election takes place. Many of the candidates in Victoria consider that that is inconsistent with the ballot, and I think I may say that there is scarcely such a thing known as a personal canvass there; most of the candidates for the Legislature of Victoria are content to let their views be known at public meetings; they rely almost exclusively upon that for the favour of the electors.

9641. Is there a great amount of that open public canvassing before an election?—No; I said that there is no personal canvassing, but it does sometimes occur, and I may say that it frequently occurs that the committees of the candidates exert themselves to secure votes for their candidates; but in that case I have frequently known it to happen that electors who have been canvassed have resented it as an offence against the principle of the ballot, and have absolutely refused to say how they would vote; so that personal canvass, I may say, is almost abolished, and the canvassing of committees is not nearly so much pursued as it used to be.

9644. But you believe that if a voter wishes to keep his vote secret he is able to do so?—I am quite certain of it; I should perhaps add in this connection, that there are some persons in Victoria who consider that the ballot is not sufficiently secret, because of the numbers which I have spoken of being inscribed upon the back of the voting papers. There are some persons who are suspicious, and think that it is impossible that the returning officer can observe the law, which requires him not to see what the number is. And I was a member of a committee of the Legislative Assembly appointed to consider the electoral law, when this question was discussed, and a suggestion was made, which I think would entirely meet the objection, for the complete protection of the ballot: the plan was this, to have a part of each voting paper like the flap of an envelope with adhesive gum, and that the number should be inscribed, so that when the flap is turned over upon it, and sealed down, it is utterly impossible without cutting the paper to discover what the number is, so that when the paper is taken out of the ballot-box and unfolded, the returning officer, nor the scrutineers, nor anybody in the room, can discover what the number is, nor can connect the number with the person on the electoral roll to whom the number applies. That plan has not been adopted, because the objection that the voting papers are not secret is not sufficiently strong or universally entertained to warrant a change in the law; but I think that if the objection were strongly and more generally entertained, that would be the way in which it would be met.

9645. Is any difficulty found in obtaining the services of properly qualified returning officers?—None.

9646. By whom are they appointed?—They are appointed by the Governor in Council. It is regarded as a very honourable office.

9647. Are they appointed for each election, or are they permanently appointed?—They are appointed during the pleasure of the Governor in Council, and they may act for any number of elections, but they may be removed.

9648. Is there any great responsibility which attaches to that office; if the returning officer was disposed to favour one candidate, would it be possible or easy for him to do so?—I think it would be most difficult, because he is never alone. Always assuming that it is possible for him to attempt such a thing, the men who are appointed are men of high standing, and are not to be suspected of such a breach of the law, for which, by the way, they render themselves liable to a penalty of 200 l. if they are convicted of any malfeasance at all in conducting their duties; but it would be

be impossible, almost, for them to be successful in any such attempt, because they are never alone, for they are perpetually watched by persons of conflicting interests, the representatives of the various candidates. The scrutineers representing A. would be prepared to detect anything done in favour of candidate B.

9649. When you say that the returning officer is appointed by the Governor in Council, do you mean the returning officer for each polling district, or the returning officer at each polling place?—The returning officer for each electoral district is appointed by the Governor in Council, and he, under the Act, appoints his deputy returning officers for the respective polling places if there be more than one.

9650. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to the security, that a voter should not use a paper which is not given to that voter by the returning officer or his deputy, supposing that a voter brings into the room, already prepared, a voting paper in favour of any particular candidate or candidates, with the right number written on the back, and the initials of the returning officer forged upon it, is there anything to prevent him making use of such a paper?—He has, in the first place, to pass the ordeal of the polling booth itself; he has to come into the room and come out of the polling place with the paper, and unless it were a very exact copy, unless it were a fac-simile of the proper voting paper it would be detected. Those voting papers are printed upon Government paper in a special way, and of course they are only liable to such objections as might be urged against any printed document.

9651. Is the form of the paper changed at each election?—I am not sure that it is in any special way. I do not think it is.

9652. Supposing that a person had procured the voting paper used at one election, he could have it copied for another election, could he not?—Yes.

9653. The paper is not manufactured specially for voting?—No; it is a paper that is ordinarily used for Government forms.

9654. Have you ever heard of this being done: a voter coming into the ballot-room, receiving the proper paper, putting it into his pocket, putting in another paper into the ballot-box, coming out of the room and giving the proper paper to another voter to make use of?—I never heard of such a case.

9655. Do you know that that has happened in Tasmania?—I have heard that it has happened there, but I never heard that it has happened anywhere else.

9656. Have you heard that it has been carried on systematically in Tasmania, in order to be able to bribe the voters voting upon the system you have described?—No; I have never heard of that.

9657. Do you see anything to prevent it?—I have mentioned already the difficulties which would occur.

9658. The difficulties which you mentioned were in the case of a person making use of a paper which he himself had prepared, but will you address yourself to the difficulty of preventing it; bringing a voting paper out of the ballot-room, and giving it to voter B., and B. making use of it, and voter B. transferring his paper to voter C., and so on?—I do not quite see what advantage it would be to any one to adopt that course.

9659. This advantage, that, by sacrificing the first vote, a person might be enabled to bribe every subsequent voter?—Of course it is possible to bribe every voter now.

9660. If you understand me, A. gets a proper voting paper from the returning officer, but does not make use of it, and his vote is thrown aside; then he brings that paper out to voter B., strikes out the name that he is wished to strike out, and receives a bribe for so doing, and then goes in and receives that voting paper from the returning officer, but does not make use of it, but having the voting paper B., comes out and hands his voting paper to voter C.?—I think that if that were done to any considerable extent, it could scarcely fail to be discovered. In the case of a scrutiny, of course the whole thing would be detected.

9661. How?—Because the persons who voted would know how they voted, and upon a scrutiny, their votes being examined, it would be ascertained how they voted.

9663. Supposing that A., B., C., and D., four voters, are all in collusion on the subject and receive bribes for their votes, voter A. sacrifices his own vote by using a paper which will not count at all, his vote being lost he puts the paper into the box, but which, on a scrutiny or the examination when the poll is declared, is lost; then voter B. uses voter A.'s paper, voter C. uses voter B.'s, and voter D. uses voter C.'s, what is there in the scrutiny to show who put the particular paper into the box?—I cannot see in what way that could be detected, but I would observe that the only object that I can make out which would be gained by anybody by that, would be to ascertain on the part of the briber that the bribed had done their part.

9664. But there is nothing according to the present system to show who has put the paper into the box?—Not any particular paper; there is nothing but the precaution which I have already stated.

9665. Supposing that that is not done, but supposing that a person comes and personates a voter and is not detected at the time, on a scrutiny there would be nothing to prove that the person who put the voting paper as the number I have described into the box was the voter?—Except the fact that the voter himself did not do it, and if there was any question about it he would be called himself.

9666. Supposing that a person successfully personates a voter and the voting paper is counted, you never would afterwards disprove except by the production of the voter himself that he had been personated, could you?—There is a check before that; the scrutineers are appointed from their personal knowledge of the voters.

9667. I am putting to you the case of a voter being successfully personated?—In that case, which would be an extraordinary and exceptional one, there would be a difficulty in finding it out.

9668. So that if the scrutineers failed to detect the personation at the time you could not afterwards wards prove it on a scrutiny?—Excepting by the production of the person who is alleged to have voted, but did not vote, and for whom somebody else voted.

9669. Mr. Bright.] In your colony, does the voter deposit the paper in the box himself, or does he hand it to the returning officer?—He deposits it himself.

9670. Has not it been suggested that the handing of it to the returning officer would be a mode to meet the objection which has just been raised?—I have not heard it suggested, and my impression is that the very unlikely difficulty which would have to be met in that way would not be worth the risk of letting the returning officer unnecessarily know how a man had voted. If he did not examine the paper, I presume he would scarcely be able to tell what paper it was. If he merely mechanically put it in as the voter himself put it in, I do not see that the substitution of the returning officer for the voter himself in the act of putting it in, would make any difference.

9671. Is there not any plan of putting the initials of the returning officer on the face of the paper?—No, the initials are on the back.

9672. If it was handed to the returning officer he would see that it was the same voting paper which had been handed to the voter?—Yes, if the initials or name were on the back; but, according to the case submitted by the Right honourable Member, it would not answer the objection, because all the papers which are to be put into the ballot box by the bribed voters would be papers actually initialled or signed by the returning officer, and brought out for that purpose, except the first one.

9673. Mr. Hunt.] You do not know yourself that that has been successfully done in Tasmania?—I do not know that it has been; but I am quite sure that it has not been done in Victoria.

9674. But at the present moment you see no way of meeting that objection?—No.

9675. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] When you say that the returning officer of a district is appointed by the Governor in Council, what is the precise meaning of that appointment; is it made by the Governor, or is it made by the Council, who I suppose are the Ministry?—The Council consists of the Cabinet for the time being who advise the Governor in all matters, and who, of course, advise him upon that, and the Governor appoints, as the Queen does here, with the advice of Her Ministers.

9676. Then the appointment is practically made by the Ministry for the time being?—Yes, certainly, and upon their responsibility.

9677. And, of course, that Ministry are of one party as it were?—Yes.

9679. He has great power, has he not, under this system of finding out the way in which persons vote?—It is possible that he might if he were very expert in the handling of the papers, and if he were able to meet the objections which would be instantly urged by the scrutineers who were present to his looking at the numbers; he might in that case see some of them, but I believe physically that it would be almost impossible for him to connect the numbers with the names on the roll which is not then before him, and to do that without being detected and stopped by the scrutineers, and afterwards fined by the magistrates, as provided by the Act.

9680. Did you state what the number of voters was in the constituencies, on an average?—I stated that the two extremes were from 500 to 8,000. There are constituencies of 500, which have been reduced to that number by the migration of the people; 500 is a smaller number than would be in one district under ordinary circumstances.

9681. It might be possible, might it not, for the returning officer in a very small constituency to be able to connect the names of the voters with the numbers?—Unless he were able to retain in his memory the names on the roll with the corresponding numbers, and in carrying all those names and numbers in his mind, to observe how each number voted, because he would only have the number on the ballot paper, he might do that by a very great effort of memory; and always assuming that he, contrary to law, looked at the back of the ballot paper instead of the front when he declares how the vote has gone.

9682. So that the whole thing is public if he chooses?—Of course it is physically possible; he could turn it over, but the instant he did it the scrutineer would call it in question, and demand that the examination of the voting papers should be stopped in order that that question might be decided.

9683. You stated that freedom from rioting had been secured by the poll being kept secret; might not that result be arrived at equally by the whole poll being kept secret as by each individual vote being kept secret?—No; because it is utterly impossible, if the scrutineers are admitted into the polling place, to keep the state of the poll secret. The scrutineers keep a record of the votes, and if they are publicly declared and proclaimed, they can state from hour to hour, or minute to minute, how the voting is going on.

9684. Do you think it would be impossible to prevent their imparting that knowledge?—You might lock them up; but I think they would contrive to give information to the voters coming in to vote.

9685. Is there much anxiety in Victoria on the part of the persons who are candidates for the Assembly to get elected to it?—Yes; I have already, in reply to a question, explained that in the case of a general election there are not so many candidates for each constituency as there are when there is only one election.

9686. What is the point upon which elections turn; is there any regular party feeling, as there is in England?—Yes.

9687. Do parties continue to be opposed to one another on definite grounds?—Yes; parties who have been opposed continue to be opposed to one another; for the last 10 or 12 years, certainly.

9688. Then the Government of Victoria is by a system of party, precisely the same as it is in this country?—Precisely; I ought perhaps to qualify that answer in this respect; in a new country there is so very much to be done in the way of creative works, so much to be done about which everybody agrees, so many material things to be looked after, that there is not perhaps time or room for so many theoretical differences as there is here.

9689. Has the fact of those works having to be done any influence in inducing electors to vote for any particular candidate?—I do not think so; of course, this consideration must not be lost sight of in my last answer, that where the whole electing body is divided into electoral districts, members representing particular districts, and who advocate the interests of those particular districts, are more favoured than, perhaps, strangers, who do not know what the interest of the particular districts are, and who would not be disposed to advocate them as strongly as local members; but that, I believe, is common to other countries.

Mr. G. F. Verdon, C.B.

22 June 1869.

9690. Is it common for a candidate to promise that he will secure the expenditure of a certain amount of Government money in the district if he is elected?—No, I never heard of so coarse a promise as that being given by anybody, and if it were it would be resented by the Government, and I do not think he would be able to carry his promise out.

9691. You stated, did you not, that the ballot had put down bribery very much?—Yes, but let me rather say that it has prevented it; it has literally come before it; there never has been any great amount of bribery in Victoria, nor will there be in any new country, especially where the franchise is very extended; it is too large a matter, even if candidates were to be found able and willing to bribe; it would be such a very costly business to bribe a sufficient number to turn the scale, that it would be hopeless, even if persons were so disposed. Although men there value the honour of being elected members of the Legislature, it is not so great an honour as to justify them in expending a very large sum of money.

9692. And bribery really never existed very much in Victoria?—I do not think it ever did.

9694. Had there been a great demand for it for some time previously?—No.

9695. What led to the adoption of the ballot?—I think, in the first instance, that it was taken up as a theoretical principle rather than from absolute necessity for it at the time; it was necessary, no doubt, but not in the same degree that it is necessary in other countries, I think.

9696. Then it was not introduced as a remedy for existing evils in the shape of intimidation and bribery?—No, I do not think that that was the principal object of its introduction.

9697. Did it find one friend in the first instance?—Yes.

9698. Who was that?—Mr. William Nicholson.

9699. Was it debated much in the Assembly?—It led to a change in the Government.

9700. Did the incoming Government adopt it as their principle?—Yes, as far as I remember it, it was a ministerial crisis; there was a temporary change in the Government; Mr. Nicholson, who introduced the ballot, was not in the first instance successful in forming a Government, but he eventually became Chief Secretary and head of the Government.

9701. Did he introduce it then?—The ballot was introduced by him.

9702. What was the state of public opinion, was it gradually in favour of the ballot, or was it immediate?—In the absence of any experience of it, in the first instance, I think, that public opinion was divided upon the subject. All that party which we called the Conservative party were opposed to it, all the others, as a matter of principle, were in favour of it; but now that it has been tried, my belief is that a very few prominent men in public life in Victoria, on either side, would consent to any alteration.

9703. Have you had any protest against it?—No.

9704. You talked about the state of public opinion in Victoria; what are the questions generally which divide the two great parties in that country; are they questions connected with land?—In the first instance they were; the two parties were separated by that question; one party desired to make the lands available upon very favourable terms to persons going from this country, and to those who were then there, and the other party maintained the expediency of selling the lands by auction at a certain price without the facilities, which it was proposed by the Liberal party to give.

9705. And that difference of opinion has continued up to this time, has it not?—It is not now so strongly marked as it was, because the law of the country provides that lands shall be given to all who are willing to settle upon them upon very advantageous terms.

9706. Has not that question been the cause of several changes of Government in Victoria?—It has, but not now.

9707. Within a very recent period?—Yes, within the last few years; but there has been one Government in office now practically since 1863.

9708. I understand you to state as the result of your opinion, that nearly the whole of the people in Victoria are favourable to the ballot?—I should say so; of course we have no means of judging absolutely, but my opinion is, that if the people were to be polled to-morrow, there would be very few indeed who would vote against it.

9709. Mr. Locke.] You stated, at the outset of your evidence, that there were expenses incurred by candidates; what are those expenses?—The hire of committee-rooms, the hire of rooms for public meetings, and the printing.

9710. Is that all?—Yes, that is all; I ought to add, perhaps, the hire of carriages to convey voters to the places of voting.

9711. The candidates do pay for the carriage of voters to the poll?—They do in districts where it is necessary.

9712. Is that legal?—Yes.

9713. And there is no restriction whatever upon that?—No.

9714. What are the distances that they have to carry the voters?—That depends entirely upon the size of the district; some districts are very large, and voters may have to be brought as far as 20 miles, or 30 miles, perhaps.

9715. Have you a great many polling places?—Yes, in very large districts necessarily have a very great many.

9716. About what would be the area of the largest district where there are 12,000 electors?—The largest number of electors are sometimes in the smallest districts; it is the sparsely populated districts which are so very large. I can scarcely give you, without reference, exactly or approximately the size for any one district, but they are very large, as large as English counties.

9717. Did I understand you to say that the distance which a candidate would have to bring voters would not be more than 30 miles?—No, it would be considered that if a voter had to come further further than that, or even as far, his convenience had not been sufficiently consulted in the appointment of polling places, which can only be appointed by the returning officer upon certain specified conditions being fulfilled; at least, the returning officer recommends it upon the requisition of the persons interested; and the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the returning officer, or police magistrate, appoints a polling place, so that there is a check upon any abuse of that power.

9718. Has the candidate to make a return of his expenses?—He has to make a return of his expenses.

9719. In what way is that done?—It is published.

9720. To whom is the return made?—To the returning officer.

9721. And that is published by him?—Yes.

9722. Can you state with respect to any particular election, what that sum has amounted to for the expenses of the candidate?—I can only speak of my own election. Mine was scarcely a proper criterion, because it was a very small town, and of course the expenses were not so great as in other places. I have never spent more than 500 l. upon an election.

9723. Was it that contested election?—Yes, a very severely contested election.

9724. Yours was a town constituency; how many voters were there in the town?—Twelve hundred.

9725. In a large district representing, I suppose, about three counties in this country, can you state what expenses have been incurred by a candidate?—I can only speak from hearsay. I have heard of as much as 2,000 l. or 3,000 l. having been expended on an election where there has been a very severe contest.

9726. Has that been the returned amount?—I am not sure as to that, but that was an extreme and an unusual case.

9727. Do you know whether or not the candidates always make a full and accurate return of all their expenses?—It is quite impossible for me to say; I only know my own case.

9728. What is the opinion in the country?—Whether every shilling is certified or not, I do not know, but I am quite satisfied of this, that for the most part the expenditure consists of the various items that I have mentioned, the hire of committee-rooms, the hire of carriages, and printing.

9729. Are there any paid canvassers?—I think that in some cases there have been, but that is very exceptional.

9730. Can a voter be a canvasser?—Necessarily so, because nearly all are voters.

9731. Then a voter may be paid as a canvasser?—It is possible, but I question if that would be considered legitimate.

9732. Has the question ever been raised?—Not to my knowledge, for the reason which I have given, that canvassing is not the rule there, it is very exceptional, and it is inconsistent with the ballot. The effect of the ballot is to reduce canvassing.

9733. You have been asked with regard to A, B, C, and D, taking in those papers; are you of opinion or not that a number being placed upon the paper would be a check to anything of that sort; that you would be able to know whether the person whom his number represents has voted or not, or at all events has been supposed to vote?—I have explained that the principal check upon that is, in fact, that they take care to appoint in each polling place for every electoral district people who are thoroughly acquainted with the personal appearance of nearly every voter in the district, and it would therefore be a most difficult thing for anybody to personate anybody else.

9734. That identification takes place in the outer room, as I understand you?—There is usually only one room, because the polling-booths are merely cells divided by wooden partitions in the room.

9735. Are those large rooms?—Yes.

9736. Must they necessarily be so?—Yes.

9737. And in that part of the room which the voters come to in the first instance he is identified?—Yes.

9738. Then is the paper by which he is to vote handed to him?—Yes.

9739. With a number on the outside?—Yes.

9740. Then he goes into the cell, he folds the paper, he then takes the paper to the box, and he just puts it in?—Yes, having folded it.

9741. So that the paper is not manipulated in any way by the returning officer or anyone else?—I have already explained, that before an election commences, it is the duty of the returning officer to sign his initials on the backs of all the papers.

9742. Do you think that it would be an advantage if the paper were handed into the hands of the returning officer, and that the returning officer should place it in the box?—I do not think so.

9743. Have you ever seen an election in Paris?—No.

9744. Mr. Graves.] You have spoken of different lists, the ratepayers' list and two other lists; will you explain what the different lists are?—The whole of Victoria is divided into municipal disticts; all the ratepayers in each municipal district are placed upon what is called the municipal roll, that is, the roll of persons who are ratepayers, and are therefore entitled to vote. It is the duty of the town clerk, in each municipal district, to return that roll as the roll of that district, which, after having passed the revision court, becomes the ratepayers' electoral roll for that district, that is to say, all persons who are ratepayers in any municipal district become ipso facto electors for the electoral district, of which the municipal district forms a part; that constitutes one roll, and is called the ratepayers' roll. The other roll consists of the names of those persons who claim in virtue of manhood suffrage; we issue to them an elector's right, and that is called the electors' right roll. Those are the only two lists.

9745. Is the payment of rates a condition of the name being placed upon the ratepayers' list?—Yes; each person claiming to have his name inserted on the roll must not only be a ratepayer, but must have actually paid the rates due before he is entitled to vote.

9746. Sir George Grey.] That is for the municipal elections, is it not?—Yes, that is for the municipal elections; and if he be not on the municipal roll, showing that he is a person entitled to vote at the municipal election, he cannot be allowed to vote for the electoral district, because the ratepayers' roll becomes the electoral roll.

Mr. G. F. Verdon, C.B.

22 June 1869.

9747. Mr. Graves.] Is anything paid for getting on the electors' rights list?—One shilling for registration.

9748. Anyone claiming to be on that list must himself come and make the application?—He must make a personal application to the electoral registrar of his district, and he must answer certain questions prescribed by the Act, as to his having resided in the colony for a certain time, and he must then sign his name in a book kept for the purpose by the electoral registrar; he then receives an elector's right; his name is inscribed upon a list which afterwards, after having passed the revision court, becomes the roll, and if no successful objection be urged to his name being included on the list it is recorded there, and he, upon the production of his elector's right when he goes to the polling-place, is entitled to vote, unless there be some question as to his identity, when certain queries can be addressed to him by the returning officer which he is bound to answer; and if there still remain any doubt as to his identity, he is required to sign his name, and a comparison is then made between the signature in the book in the polling-place and the signature in the book when he applied for the elector's right, and if there be a sufficient difference to warrant the returning officer in doubting his identity, his vote is not at that time received, but his voting paper is put on one side for further examination.

9749. Chairman.] Do a large number of persons who would be qualified omit to go through the process of having their names placed upon the roll?—I think the great majority of the persons who vote in Victoria are qualified in respect of being ratepayers or holders of property.

9750. Are there a large number besides those who are qualified who do not go through the necessary process?—I cannot say what proportion, if there is any proportion of the remainder, that is, of persons who are not ratepayers, but who would be entitled under manhood suffrage to electors' rights, who do not ask for electors' rights.

9751. Does the 1*s.* prevent a great many claims?—No.

9752. Would it be a corrupt payment for anyone to pay the 1*s.* for the voter for the registration?—It would be so considered.

9753. Mr. Graves.] Is residence a necessity for getting on that electors' rights list?—Yes.

9754. What length of residence? — Six months.

9755. Sir George Grey.] Does that apply both to the ratepayers' list and to the electors' rights list?—I am speaking now of the electors' rights list.

9756. Mr. Graves.] Are they both the same, or is there any difference as regards residence for ratepayers?—No; I think if a person be once on the list of ratepaying electors he becomes qualified even without having resided for the six months required in the case of a manhood suffrage claimant.

9757. Have all who are on the ratepayers' list a vote either for the municipality or for the Assembly?—Yes; it is the list which is the roll for the municipal district which becomes the roll for the electoral district after it has passed the revision court.

9758. Has each person on that list the same number of votes for the one as for the other, or is there any distinction; has a person on that list of voters so prepared for the municipality any plurality of votes?—If he have property in other electoral districts he may vote in respect of that property, but not in the same district; that is at the election of a member to serve in the Legislative Assembly, but in the ordinary municipal elections for municipal councillors, where property is the main thing considered; a person owning property of a certain value may have votes within certain limits in proportion to the value of his property; in other words, he has a plurality of votes in the case of municipal elections.

9759. What is the maximum number of votes that anyone can have for municipal elections?—Three, I think, is the number.

9760. You have no plurality of votes for the Parliamentary elections?—No.

9761. May I ask if voting is confined to males both in the municipal lists and also in the Parliamentary lists?—I think it is every male person; I am not quite sure, but the question has been raised, and I believe it can be ascertained on looking at the Municipal Act.

9762. What provision is made for voters who can neither read nor write, in objecting to any persons upon the list as they go in to mark up their ballot paper?—There is this distinction, almost an anomalous distinction, between the cases of electors who vote on their electors' rights and those who vote because they are on the ratepayers' lists In the case that I have mentioned of electors' right holders, each person claiming to vote has to sign his name; that provision does not apply to persons who vote because they happen to be ratepayers, but only for manhood suffrage votes.

9763. But if a man cannot read, what happens?—He cannot have his elector's right, because he has to sign his name; it is a condition precedent.

9764. Is it an actual disqualification if he cannot read or write?—Yes, in that way it is, indirectly.

9765. Then it would be difficult, where an elector can neither read nor write, to carry out a machinery such as you have been describing?—Provision is made for that case, but only in the case of those persons who are on the ratepayers' roll. In that case, if a person cannot read or write, the returning officer is required by the Act to go with him into one of those places, and, at his request, to mark out the name of the person or persons for whom he does not intend to vote.

9766. You spoke of a suggestion which had been made for giving greater security to the ballot, that by turning down a flap upon the voting paper, a number could be inserted and gummed down by some adhesive matter?—Yes.

9767. Supposing the case of a scrutiny, how would it be possible to avoid opening all those numbers up to detect any particular number?—In that case that would have to be done. All the numbers would have to be exposed by cutting the flap, but it would not be necessary from that, that all the numbers should be compared with the names of the persons upon the electoral roll.

9768. Mr. Cross.] Will you tell me whether there are any large number of waste votes from the papers being improperly filled up?—No; the process is so simple that it is not often the case that a mistake is made. There used to be sometimes a doubt when pens and ink were used, because because the voter in folding the paper, not having blotted it properly, might perhaps make more marks than he intended, but now that pencils are used, that does not so often occur; a very small per-centage indeed of the votes are doubtful, and that is where the mark is sprawling or perhaps touching two names, and it does not appear to be quite clear which one was intended to be struck out; in that case the returning officer exercises his judgment, and obtains the assistance of the scrutineers and poll clerks to determine what the intention of the voter might be, but that is very exceptional.

9769. They are the absolute judges upon that matter?—Yes; unless afterwards there should be a scrutiny, when of course their decision would be liable to review by the Elections and Qualifications Committee.

9770. What is the proportion of the people now living in the colony who cannot read or write?—I could scarcely say without statistics, but a very large proportion can read and write, and the proportion of those who can read and write is increasing every year; a very large sum is spent by the public upon education.

9771. I believe you are acquainted to some extent with education in England?—Yes.

9772. Should you say that education in the colony is more advanced than it is in England?—Yes; I should say considerably, and if I may venture to say so, for this reason, that it has been made a great national question with us, because those who have had the direction of affairs in Victoria, have felt a peculiar responsibility resting upon them in the face of almost universal suffrage, which we have there, and it has been considered a duty on the part of all Governments, quite irrespective of party, to make the people, by means of public instruction, fit to exercise the franchise which they possess, 9773. Supposing a man fills up a voting paper and puts it in the ballot-box and goes away, and then another man comes up and claims to vote in the same name, that does happen now and then, I presume?—It is very seldom successful, because the scrutineers are able to detect almost every person.

9774. Supposing that that man comes a second time and makes a claim, what is done with the voting paper?—If it is detected, the voting paper is rejected, and if it should get into the box, of course it affects the election to that extent.

9776. What is done with all those papers which are put on one side, when the election is over?—They are examined by the returning officer, with a view to determine whether they should be received or not.

9777. Now, take the case of personation; supposing that the returning officer was satisfied that the right man was the second man, would he allow that vote?—Yes.

9778. So that both votes would be allowed in that instance?—Subject to alteration afterwards, when the box was opened, or to the examination of a scrutiny upon a petition.

9779. In ordinary cases, when the second vote was allowed, would the first still remain good?—I am not quite sure what the practice of the returning officer would be in that case; I may be perhaps permitted to mention that one gentleman summoned to attend the Committee to-day, Mr. Paterson Muir, has had great experience as a returning officer, and will be able to inform the Committee with respect to all those details with which I am not so well acquainted.

9780. Mr. William Henry Smith.] You mentioned that it is usual for candidates to furnish conveyances for voters; can you tell the Committee by what process the candidates arrive at the conclusion that it is to their interest to convey the voters to the poll, seeing that there is no canvass?—It is owing partly to the condition of the district and the condition of the outlying parts of it from the nearest polling place, which, of course, they will be quite aware of, and partly from the description of their committees, the members of which are all resident in the locality, and who know it well.

9781. Then there is a canvass, which results in a certain amount of knowledge as to the mode in which a man is going to vote?—To some extent.

9783. And do the candidates agree to furnish a certain number of conveyances?—Yes, that is the usual course, in order to render it possible for every party in the district to vote.

9784. Mr. Whitbread.] You were examined at some length by the Right honourable Member for Northamptonshire, upon the system of bribery which had been carried out successfully in Tasmania, and that was done by one man sacrificing his vote, and bringing out his paper, and so handing on that paper in succession to a chain of voters all bribed. I want to ask you whether it would not be quite possible to meet such a case as that, by having attached to the voting paper a small slip, upon which the returning officer should put a mark or a consecutive number, and which slip should be torn from the voting paper just before it was put into the box; would it not be a complete check against a system of that sort, if when this voting paper is to be put into the ballot-box, the officer who presides over the box would simply tear it off, and that the number is the consecutive number in which the voter ought to have voted?—But the question is when is the returning officer to tear off the slip.

9786. Do you see how this arrangement could be defeated by a voter desiring to be bribed, and to show how he voted?—Unless by the production duction of a similar paper; he might forge the slip just as well as the paper.

22 June 1869.

9787. Will you tell the Committee on what grounds a scrutiny can be demanded?—Upon any one of those grounds which are usually alleged in a petition addressed to Parliament under the old law of England, which has been borrowed by us.

9788. To whom is the petition addressed?—To that branch of the Legislature in which the member is.

9789. Does that branch of the Legislature exercise their right of refusing to have a scrutiny?—It does not rest with the Legislature as a body. As I have already explained, the practice is that at the beginning of every Parliament, the Speaker nominates a certain number from all sides of the House, and constitutes them the Committee of Elections and Qualifications; he lays his warrant upon the table containing their names, and does so three times on different occasions, in order that objections may be raised if the House think fit to exercise any judgment in the matter, which is very unusual. That Committee is sworn to act in a quasi-judicial capacity as judging upon the petition presented to Parliament, which, as a matter of course, are referred, without going into the merits at all, to the Elections and Qualifications Committee, and it rests with that committee to determine what shall be done with petitions.

9791. If the petition alleges personation largely and bribery largely, does that court ever refuse to have an inquiry?—I never heard of such a case. The petitioner appears by counsel before the committee, and if he makes out a primâ facia case, the committee will proceed at any length in order to determine the question as to bribery, or any other allegation in the petition.

9792. Then a voter who gives his vote on the understanding that it is a secret vote, and that he can maintain his secrecy, is liable, if any one chooses to present a petition, to have his vote laid open after all?—He is liable, but that is all.

9794. So that if a man of great influence, a large employer of labour, or a landowner, is defeated, and desires to know how his tenants or his employés voted, he has nothing to do but to present a petition?—He has a great deal more to do than that, because he has to prove his petition, or to make out a primâ facie case at all events; and, first of all, only such votes as were challenged would be examined, unless it were absolutely in the cause of justice to examine them all, and his mere allegation that voters had been bribed, would not be accepted by the committee in support of the primâ facie case.

9795. But having proved a primâ facie case, he can have as many votes examined as he chooses to challenge in his petition?—Within the discretion of the committee; he cannot insist upon having votes examined unless the committee agree with him in considering that they ought to be examined.

9796. Mr. Bright.] Would not it be necessary to prove that A., B., and C. had been bribed, before he could ask to be allowed to prove that they had voted for a particular candidate?—In the case of bribery, yes; but I understand that other allegations were included, the question of personation, for instance.

9797. Mr. Whitbread.] Has there ever been a complaint against a returning officer of improper conduct in the polling?—There have been very many complaints, not of any improper conduct as defined by the Act, but of errors of judgment on minor points; but there never has been any serious objection within my knowledge.

9798. What has been the cost of a scrutiny, taking the average; is it a very expensive affair?—That depends entirely upon circumstances. If witnesses have to be brought long distances, of course the expenses are very heavy, but it is a matter upon which it is almost impossible to give a categorical answer.

9799. Who pays the cost of the scrutiny?—The petitioner; at least the costs eventually abide the issue; they are determined by the committee upon the merits of the case afterwards.

9800. Mr. Leatham.] Some of your constituencies are very small, are they not?—Yes, some of them are.

9801. Is secrecy practically maintained in such a constituency as 500, where of course it is very desirable?—That is my opinion, and my experience.

9802. The security against personation is precisely the same under the ballot as it is under open voting, is it not?—The same security is obtained by means of the scrutineers in every such case.

9803. How large a proportion of the electors in your constituencies record their votes on the average?—It differs; in some of the towns, where the people are all close together, a very much larger proportion of them vote than in scattered localities, where they cannot so easily get to the polling places.

9804. And it also depends in some measure, does it not, upon the keenness of the contest?—Yes, it does very much.

9805. Did I understand you to say that, before the ballot was introduced, it was exclusively advocated by the popular party, and opposed by the Conservatives?—It was just one of those questions about which the two parties would differ, and upon which they did differ theoretically, but they had no practical experience.

9806. They differ as parties?—Yes, they differed as parties.

9807. Has your attention been drawn to a speech which was delivered in this House in 1860, by the Right honourable gentleman, who is now the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the ballot?—Yes.

9808. I have a report of that speech before me, in which he says, "The ballot was not in Victoria as in England, exclusively advocated by the popular or Liberal party, and opposed by Conservatives. On the contrary, some of its most strenuous advocates sat on the Conservative side of

of the House, and unquestionably its most formidable opponents were the leaders of the extreme democratic party; and to this, I think, much of its sucess is due; for not being a party measure, its details were honestly discussed, and settled by the ablest men in the House:" your opinion does not coincide with that?—After the principle was accepted, I think that there was more general approval of the measure on both sides than before, but in the first instance it was certainly a party question, although it happened that some of the leaders of the Liberal party at that time, being members of the Roman Catholic Church, and therefore opposed upon principle to secret voting, differed from their friends of the same party, and agreed with the Conservative party in objecting to the system. That I think is an explanation of the observation which Mr. Childers makes.

9809. Were there no eminent Conservatives in favour of the ballot at that time?—I am not prepared to say without looking at the division lists. I do not remember any.

9810. Is there any peculiarity in the circumstances and character of your population as distinguished from our own, which renders the ballot more applicable to their requirements than to ours?—Of course, this is merely a matter of opinion, and, as a matter of opinion, I should say that the protection which the ballot affords to those who choose to avail themselves of it, is less needed in Victoria and in all new countries, than it is here.

9812. What do you consider the weak points of the ballot system, if any, as compared with open voting?—I can see no valid objection to the ballot system. I have heard objections stated, and objections in which I do not concur, the principal one being that political feeling is reduced by the adoption of the ballot, that men who are not able to declare how they vote in public, do not care so much for the exercise of the electoral privilege. I have heard that objection stated, but the answer to that is, that those who desire to make it known, those who desire to declare how they think and how they vote, can do so under the ballot just as well as under the open system.

9814. Do you think it works better in a constituency represented by one member than in those represented by more than one?—The only distinction which occurs to me between those two cases is this, that sometimes where it is very much desired to secure the election of one man out of three or four standing for a district in which there are two or three persons to be elected, by plumping for that one man they may, perhaps, risk the election of the other persons of the same way of thinking, but for whom they did not desire so strongly to register their votes; there is just that chance.

9815. But the advantages of the exact state of the poll not being known are much greater than any disadvantages which attach to it?—I should say so, certainly.

9816. Is canvassing conducted as keenly as it was before the ballot was introduced?—No.

9817. Elections are conducted much more quietly, are they not?—Yes.

9818. Do you know whether the expenses of the candidates have increased?—It is scarcely possible to draw a fair comparison, because before the ballot was introduced elections were not so keenly contested as they have been since; there were not so many and so great differences between political parties, the colony was smaller, and I cannot draw a fair comparison.

9819. In the speech to which I have referred, the First Lord of the Admiralty stated, "Bribery and treating in the vulgar forms in which we know them, were rife in the town constituencies" before the ballot; that is hardly in accordance with some evidence which you have given this morning?—No doubt there was bribery and there was treating before the ballot, but I believe that they never prevailed to the same extent in Victoria, or in any new country with which I am acquainted, that they have in older countries.

9820. Still there were some constituencies in which bribery prevailed?—Yes.

9821. It is now equally notorious, is it not, that that evil is very much reduced?—It is very much reduced; I believe that even there is bribery and treating, but it is to a very much less extent; at least there is some treating; I do not believe that there is bribery.

9822. Sir George Grey.] You said, did you not, that the ballot had been in force about 13 years?—About that time.

9823. Have you practically universal suffrage for the House of Assembly?—Yes, we have.

9824. Was that the case before the ballot was introduced, or how long has the constituency been what it now is?—It was not the case when the ballot was first introduced, and, of course, was not the case before, but the property qualification was so very low, that it was almost impossible to draw the line between any qualification that could be stated and universal suffrage, and it was that fact which led to the adoption of universal suffrage. It was found that a very large proportion of the people of Victoria, although not possessed of freehold property, had a larger amount of personal property than many others who held real property, and it was impossible, without gross injustice, to deny them votes.

9825. You mean that, practically, the constituency was just the same under the system of open voting as it is now under the system of the ballot?—There was not so great a difference as to warrant any conclusions being drawn from it.

9826. Are the municipal elections conducted by the ballot as well as the Parliamentary?—Yes.

9827. Was it introduced at the same time in the municipal elections?—The municipal institutions which now exist were created subsequently to the introduction of the ballot.

9828. You have spoken of the different political parties in Victoria; do politics run high there?—Yes.

9829. Are parties divided by a strongly-marked line?—Yes.

9830. Are the opinions of the principal inhabitants well known, and are they known to belong to one party or the other?—Yes; for the most part.

9831. At those meetings which you have spoken

Mr. G. F. Verdon, C.B.

22 June 1869.

spoken of which are held by the candidates, are resolutions passed after hearing the candidates, approving of them as candidates, or disapproving? —Usually it is the case, although those who desire to maintain the ballot strictly object to any show of hands, or any declaration on the part of the meeting; it is generally a sort of formal resolution, moved by some one, that A. B. is a fit and proper person.

9834. You spoke of it as a matter of course; why should they be opposed to the ballot, or why were they opposed to the ballot in Victoria?—I am bound to answer your questions, and my impression and belief is that it was part, and always has been part, of the Roman Catholic system to influence in some degree the votes of the people through their clergy, upon all questions in which the interests of the Church are involved, and that, if the voters were prevented from voting in public, some portion of the control which the Roman Catholic Church conceives that it is proper to exercise over the electors through its priests would be lost; that is my belief.

9835. Do you then believe that the ballot has taken away, in a great degree, the influence which you have just now attributed to the Roman Catholic priests, and that it is, in fact, a protection to the Roman Catholic voter against the disclosure of his vote to his priest?—That is a matter of the confessional that I am not in a position to speak of.

9836. Do you suppose that the Roman Catholic priests exercise much influence over elections amongst the members of their own church?— Yes, I believe that they do.

9837. Of what nature is the influence?—I believe it is strictly and purely a moral influence, which is peculiar and proper to the relation which has always subsisted between a priest and his flock in that church.

9838. Do the clergy of other denominations exercise much influence amongst the members of their respective congregations?—No, I do not think that they do.

9839. You spoke just now of the expense of an election to the individual member; but do you know what the whole expense to the public of a general election for the House of Assembly is; I mean the expenses that are paid out of the revenue of the colony?—It varies much; about 12,000 l. I have known to be expended in a general election.

9841. Do you know what the highest amount has been in any case?—I think I remember having heard of one district in which the expense was very great, but that was the election of a member of the Legislative Council for one of the very large provinces where there were a great many polling places and poll clerks and other officers employed, and the amount then was rather more than 2,000 l., I think.

9843. With some notification upon it that it is for a person who has a plurality of votes?—The roll shows how many votes each person is entitled to.

9845. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Can he give all those votes to one person, or must he divide them? —He may give them all to one person if he thinks fit; there may be only one person to be elected.

9846. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing that a person is on the electoral roll, and he does not attend the election, has he any means afterwards of knowing whether he has been personated or not?—Yes, because the person who personates him must claim to vote in his name, and his number must be found upon the electoral roll, and the scrutineers and the returning officer know that No. 450, or whatever it may be, has voted.

9847. But has the absent elector any means of ascertaining whether his number has been made use of, and that someone else has personated him?—Yes, by inquiry.

9848. Of whom?—Of the returning officer or any of the scrutineers and poll clerks.

9849. Sir George Grey.] Are the names of the persons who actually vote published?—No, but there are several copies of the roll in the room marked simultaneously by the returning officer, the poll clerks, and the scrutineers, and from any one of them anybody can ascertain whether any particular number has voted.

9850. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing a person had been absent from his district at the time of the election, when he came home he would have to go to the returning officer and find out if he had been personated?—If he desired to know, assuming that that the person personating him had not been discovered by the scrutineers, which would most likely have been the case.

9851. Supposing an elector had died since his name had been placed on the roll, and he was personated, and supposing that the personator were not detected under the ballot, would you have any means of finding out afterwards that that dead voter had been personated?—I think not, unless by a scrutiny, but such a case could scarcely happen; it would be very unlikely indeed that anyone should be dead in a constituency, and that it should not be known to those scrutineers, because it is their business to find out all this, even if it should have escaped the revision court, or be subsequent to the revision.

Mr. WILLIAM PATERSON MUIR, called in; and Examined.

9852. Chairman.] WITH what Colony are you acquainted?—Victoria.

9853. Have you heard the evidence which has just been given by Mr. Verdon?—Yes.

9854. Is there anything in the description which he has given of the system of conducting elections in that colony with which you differ, or which you wish to correct?—I think not; I think that, generally speaking, his answers have been such as I approve of.

9855. You have had considerable experience, have you not, as returning officer?—Yes, I have had considerable experience.

9856. What opinion has that experience enabled you to form upon the subject of the operation of the ballot?—I think that it works most beneficially in all respects, and I think it that it has corrected most of the abuses that it was desired to correct, as far as I have been able to judge.

9857. Does the ballot in your opinion, insure the absolute secrecy of the voter if he desires it?—Yes, if he wishes it.

9858. Could you, as a returning officer if you had wished it, have easily made yourself acquainted with the way in which a particular elector had voted?—I do not think it is possible; at least it is hardly possible.

9859. For what reason?—Hearing the question asked, I made a little sketch of a voting paper (producing the same); this is supposed to be a voting paper with the names of the candidates in front, and it is signed by the returning officer first of all. Then the person presenting himself states his name, and by referring to the register you ascertain that his name is on the register, or that he votes under manhood suffrage; then the returning officer attaches on the corner the same number that is on the register, putting his initials at the back; then this paper is given to the person, and he is then marked off on the list as having voted, or as having received this paper. He goes into one of the booths already described, and supposing that there are three candidates, and that there are only two to be returned, he strikes out in pencil the name of the person that he does not vote for, and he votes for the other two, or he may vote for only one; he then folds this paper across and down the middle, and deposits it in the ballot-box, which is before the returning officer in a conspicuous place. Then the returning officer when he opens the box at the end of the day, say, at four o'clock, when the election closes, when no further votes can be received, takes the papers out just before him and before all the scrutineers and all the clerks, and sees that they are proper votes.

9860. Sir George Grey.] Cannot he also see the number on the paper which the officials will find attached to the name of the elector on the register?—It is possible for him to turn it up and look at it in a very deliberate way, but that would be acting contrary to the law, and the scrutineers of the various candidates are there.

9861. Mr. Bright.] Then, practically, no investigation of the mode in which any man has voted takes place under those circumstances?—None whatever.

9862. Has there ever been a complaint that that has been done?—Not that I know of; I do not think there ever has.

9863. Chairman.] Have you, as returning officer, found any difficulties in the way of working this system?—None whatever.

9864. In the matter of personation, have any difficulties ever arisen?—It sometimes occurs that persons attempt it. I have never had occasion to commit any person myself for attempting it in my capacity as returning officer, but it has been done. The returning officer has power to commit any one, if he has reason to suppose that he is attempting to personate, but I have personally never had occasion to do so.

9865. Are objections frequently made to voters by the scrutineers on either side?—Not very often, it does sometimes occur.

9866. Sir George Grey.] When one scrutineer objects, does the other support the voter, or do they both concur in the objection?—One may object, or two may object, or they may concur.

9867. Have you any reason to believe from what takes place, that the scrutineers know or suspect how a man is going to vote, so as either to oppose or support his vote?—I think that the scrutineers are usually chosen by the candidates, because they have a very intimate knowledge of the people who are going to vote, and in all probability they know how they are expected to vote very often; there is nothing to prevent that, because meetings are held at which they express their opinions.

9868. Chairman.] For which electoral district have you acted as returning officer?—For the electoral district of Melbourne.

9869. Have you the selection of the presiding officer at each polling place?—Yes.

9870. Is it always possible to find properly qualified persons to act in that way?—Yes, quite possible.

9871. Is it generally a public officer that is appointed, or is it some private individual?—It is very often a magistrate, usually some person well known, and holding a good position.

9873. Have you ever known any case in which it has been alleged that the ballot-box has been tampered with after the polling was closed?—No, I do not think that that is possible either. The ballot-box is given to the returning officer, or his deputy. I should say, that before the polling commences, this ballot-box is exhibited before all the scrutineers, and poll-clerks, and persons who are properly present; it is exhibited as being empty, and then it is locked, and at the close of the poll it is again exhibited as empty, and the votes are counted before you leave the room.

9874. By the returning officer's deputy in each polling place?—Yes.

9875. I think it was stated by a witness from South Australia that the ballot-boxes from each polling district were brought into the central election place?—That is so.

9876. Which system do you prefer?—They are counted at the polling place by the deputy of the polling place, and the deputy takes the box, after sealing up the papers, to the returning officer, and the returning officer adopts his return, and incorporates it as a whole, the returning officer taking possession of all the boxes, that is to say, the returning officer, not the deputy returning officer.

9877. I suppose that at some polling places very few votes, indeed, are given?—In Melbourne, where I have always presided, the number is very great very often.

9878. But in country districts, how is it?—Sometimes the number is very small, the people migrate so much.

9879. Is it generally known what number of votes is given for each candidate at each polling place?—Yes, it is generally known at each polling place.

9880. Is there any other remark on Mr. Verdon's examination which you wish to make?—Generally, I agree with Mr. Verdon's examination. I think with regard to the expense of the candidates, that is to say, the actual legal expense, it need not be much.

9881. Do you mean the expense which is borne by the candidate, or the expense which is borne by the Government?—The expense borne by the Government is very small in all cases, and the candidate need not necessarily go to much expense.

9883. Are the returning officer and the poll clerks paid by the public?—Yes.

9884. Chairman.] Have you heard anything of what has been described as the Tasmanian dodge?—I never heard of it until now.

9885. You have therefore not considered whether it is practicable or not?—It might be practicable to a very limited extent; to the extent of one or two votes, but not otherwise, I think.

9886. Do you think that any means might be devised to defeat it?—I do not think it would be worth while devising means to defeat anything which was so thoroughly impracticable; I mean impracticable to any extent.

9887. Do you see any objection to the vote being placed in the ballot-box by the returning officer instead of by the candidate himself, after the paper has been folded up?—I think it is better as it is, although that would make very little difference.

9888. Would not it be possible, if that were the system, for the returning officer to compare the number which he had given to the voter with the number which was brought back by him and placed in the box?—I think it would not be proper because the returning officer would have that second opportunity of finding out how the voter voted.

9889. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that it is impracticable for an election agent to give, say, a sovereign, for every legitimate voting paper brought out from the ballot-room to the Committee-room?—Of course it is quite possible.

9890. What is the difficulty; supposing there is an unscrupulous election agent and he says to the voter, "I will give you a substitute for your voting paper, and I will give you a sovereign for every legitimate voting paper that you bring out for me to place in another persons hand"?—I think there would be a break in the link every time.

9891. To put a case, A. transfers to B. and B. to C., it does not follow that it need be transferred in that succession; but, supposing that the election agent has 500 voting papers brought out to him by 500 voters and pays for them, he could put them in the hands of any other 500 voters that had not recorded their votes, could he not?—He could do so; the particular succession is not of the essence of the manœuvre, but you cannot invent any system that would not admit of some rogue finding out how to evade it.

9892. Does anything occur to you to meet the objection at this moment?—Not at this moment.

9893. You heard what was said with respect to the system of Victoria, with regard to personation, as to whether a voter who had not voted would have any means of knowing afterwards whether he had been personated; what have you to say to that?—If he referred to the register he would find whether anyone had voted in his stead.

9894. It would require a special application to the returning officer, would it not?—It would.

9895. And would the returning officer be bound to give that information?—Yes; within a certain time.

9896. Sir George Grey.] How long were you returning officer?—About 15 years, I think.

9897. Was it for the same district all the time?—Yes.

9898. Were you paid by salary?—No, not by salary; there is a sum allowed by the Government for each election to each returning officer and to each deputy returning officer.

9899. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] When the returning officer opens the voting papers, to see how the persons voted, are the scrutineers allowed to look over them with him, or does he have complete control to say merely what the vote is?—He merely says what the vote is.

9900. Nobody but himself sees actually the way in which the votes are struck out?—No one.

9904. In your colony did there ever exist any great amount of intimidation?—I think there was a great deal of bribing before the ballot, and a great deal of treating and intimidation also.

9905. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You were returning officer, were you not, before the ballot was instituted?—I was.

9906. Mr. Cross.] Are the laws about bribery and treating more stringent now than they were?—No, I do not think they are more stringent, but they are rendered inoperative, if I may say so.

9907. Are the laws themselves more stringent as to punishing bribery?—I could not say. I do not know.

9908. Have you ever had, during the last 13 years, any conviction for bribery at all?—I do not know of any.

9909. Have

9909. Have you had any prosecutions for bribery?—There have been inquiries, but I do not think there have been prosecutions. There have been prosecutions for personations, I think, but none for bribery that I remember.

9910. I suppose that when an election is over, as in England, the feeling subsides, and they do not wish to prosecute?—It very often does unless the election is very close, and perhaps one or two votes might alter it; then a scrutiny is very often called for in the hope that something may turn up.

9911. Is a scrutiny a very common thing?—No, not very.

9913. Who pays for the expenses of the scrutiny?—It abides the issue usually.

9914. But the Government does not pay, at all events?—No.

9915. Mr. William Henry Smith.] You say that the register is open in the polling-booth, and that the returning officer strikes off the name of the man as he votes?—The returning officer or his poll clerk does it.

9916. And the check clerks or the scrutineers, on behalf of the candidates, do the same thing?—Yes, for their own protection.

9917. So that it is quite competent to the candidate or his agent to know who vote, at all events?—Yes.

9918. Then it would be competent for the candidate's agent to arrange that a voter should not vote if he thought it worth his while to do so, to keep him at home, to bribe him not to vote, in fact?—It is quite possible, but he could not tell how he would vote. He does not know how he may vote. A man who is capable of being bribed is usually a dishonest person, and he cannot be relied upon in either way.

9919. It may happen that a man's political principles are known, and it may be worth the while of the candidate to prevent him from voting, and by your system it is open to the candidate, is it not, to make such an arrangement successfully?—No, I do not think so.

9920. He could even pay a man a sovereign to stay at home?—Yes, he may do that, certainly; but if he pays him to vote in a certain way he has no security whatever that he shall vote.

9921. Mr. Leatham.] You have spoken of bribery and treating before the introduction of the ballot; is it true that there was a great deal of mob intimination before the introduction of the ballot?—There was a good deal.

9922. Was that one of the reasons assigned for the introduction of the ballot?—Yes, that was one of the reasons assigned.

9923. That has wholly ceased, has it not?—Yes, that has wholly ceased.

9924. Sir George Grey.] After the declaration of the poll, the papers are all sealed up, as I understand?—Yes, they are all sealed up.

9925. Do they remain in your custody?—No, they are sent to the Chief Secretary of the Government.

9926. How soon are they sent to him?—As soon after as convenient.

9927. Do you affix a seal to the paper containing those papers?—Yes.

9928. Is it an official seal?—Yes, it is an official seal.

9929. Do you know how long they remain in the custody of the Chief Secretary of the Government?—There is a time specified by the Act, after which they are destroyed, at least, I believe so; after which no petition can be received at all events, and then the papers are of course of no further use.

9930. When that time for petitioning expires, you do not know, of your own knowledge, whether the papers are destroyed or not?—I believe they are destroyed.

9931. Mr. Bright.] Is it not the fact that they are kept in some safe custody until a certain time has elapsed, I think, generally, two years, and at the end of that time they are destroyed?—I do not know the time that they are kept, but no petition can be received after a given time specified by the Act, and I should imagine that the papers would then be destroyed, because they would be of no use.

9932. Sir George Grey.] What security is there against the Secretary of the Government before they are destroyed opening them and seeing how every voter has voted, if he chooses?—The only security is that it would be an exceedingly troublesome thing, and result in no good.

9933. But if he had any motive for ascertaining how any particular voter voted, could not he do so by that means?—Of course he could, by a very elaborate search.

9934. Mr. Whitbread.] Supposing that the time for petitioning is 14 days after the election, and, after that interval has expired, the candidate then proceeds to fulfil the corrupt promises which he had made to individuals right and left; is there any means of bringing him to account for that?—No, I think not; the bribery must precede the election; if it is any use at all it must precede the election.

9935. Mr. Bright.] Do you think it likely, after the votes had been recorded, and nobody knew how anybody voted, that any candidate would begin to pay money to voters?—I think not; I think it is not at all likely; I never heard of such a case; nothing of the kind has practically come under our notice.

9936. In that part of the world people do not part with their money on those terms, I presume?—I do not think they would. Perhaps I may be permitted to state that, as far as my observation goes, the influence that is now used at elections is a moral one, and one arising out of the questions before the country.

9937. Mr. Whitbread.] But still the expenditure is very large?—It need not be large, and I do not think it is very large.

9938. Although the interest is a moral one there is a material stimulant?—The candidate must go to certain expenses; and, supposing he has to hold meetings in a district very widely extended it will cost him a good deal of money.

9939. The last witness stated to the Committee in evidence that he spent 500*l.* in a constituency of 1,200 votes; would that be a very exaggerated expenditure, should you say?—I think it is a large sum.

9940. Mr. Bright.] Have you been a candidate yourself?—Not in Australia. I was a member of the Legislature in the West Indies, but not in Australia. I know nothing of the expenses beyond those that the Government allow; of course all the accounts come under the notice of the returning officer.

9941. Do you agree with Mr. Verdon that the ballot works so satisfactorily, that all parties in the Colony are content with it, and prefer it to open voting?—I quite agree with him; I think that all parties are quite content with it, and they would not on any account seek to change.

9942. Sir George Grey.] Do you think that there has been any change in the character of the representatives, since the ballot was introduced, or are they very much of the same class as those who were elected under open voting?—If a change has taken place, it is not on account of the ballot, but more on account of the franchise.

9943. Chairman.] Have you known, since the adoption of the ballot, of anything in the nature of a riot at an election?—No, I do not remember any; the elections are conducted very peaceably.

9944. And sometimes in the midst of a very rough population?—Yes.

9945. And in the midst of considerable excitement?—Yes, great excitement.

9946. Sir George Grey.] How is the declaration made; is it made by posting notices, stating the number that voted for each candidate or at a public meeting?—Usually the day after the returning officer states where he will declare the poll, and he declares it at a public place.

9947. Is there generally a large assemblage of people to hear the declaration?—Generally three or four persons.

9949. Are there many persons waiting to hear the declaration?—A great number, the street is usually crowded.

9950. Is it generally a peaceable assemblage, or is there much demonstration of feeling on the part of the friends of the disappointed candidate?—It is generally very peaceable, they all disperse immediately after; they know that it is quite over and done, and cannot be altered in any way, and usually it is very peaceable.

9951. Mr. Whitbread.] The candidates do not attend, I presume?—The candidates come in from time to time during the day, and of course many of them speak to their friends.

9952. But they do not address any meeting, when you officially take the poll?—Yes, sometimes they do.

9953. Does that lead to particular results?—No, they just say a few words.

9954. Sir George Grey.] Are they listened to quietly on both sides?—Yes, quite quietly, we have no rioting at all.

Mr. Allan Stewart Hankel, was called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. S. Hankel.

9955. Mr. Hunt.] Are you a naturalised British subject, carrying on business as a Merchant at Liverpool?—I am.

9956. Were you born in the United States?—I was born in Charleston, South Carolina.

9957. Did you reside long at Charleston?—Up to my 31st year.

9958. Are you familiar with elections in South Carolina?—I have had an opportunity of observing a number of elections in that place.

9959. What kind of elections?—Both municipal and legislative, and also for conventions of the state.

9960. What was the system of elections there at the time that you were there?—The system of elections in America differs in each state. There is no universal system organised by the general Government, each state regulates its own mode of elections.

9961. Can you state the mode of election in South Carolina, at the time that you were resident there?—No nomination takes place.

9962. When you speak of no nomination taking place, I presume you mean a nomination in the sense that we understand it; proposing a person as a candidate?—No nominations are necessary at all, a person could vote for whomsoever he pleased, whether the person was under nomination or not.

9963. What was the first act in the election?—The first act was the issuing of a writ by the governor of the state, if it was for the legislature, and if it was municipal it was by the mayor.

9964. Supposing the governor of the state had issued the writ, what would happen?—That writ is a proclamation ordering an election to be held in such-and-such a place.

9965. What takes place then?—Then the managers take charge of the election, and appoint certain places of polling. The managers are appointed by the governor, in case of an election for the legislature.

9966. Who are the returning officers?—The managers of the election are the returning officers; they are appointed by the governor to conduct the election.

9967. How is notice given to the constituency?—The managers publish it, and it is first made known through the proclamation of the governor in the public prints.

9968. When the time arrived for a person to be proposed as a candidate, what was done?—Generally there are public meetings. Whoever wanted to run a candidate would announce that the friends and supporters of So-and-so proposed such-and-such a person as a candidate for such-and-such election.

9969. That is done to start him as a candidate?—Yes, to start him as a candidate.

9970. Was any notice given to the manager that So-and-so would be a candidate?—None at all; the managers have nothing to do with the candidates whatsoever.

9971. Would a placard be issued, signed by certain persons, that they intended to run So-and-so as a candidate?—It is not necessary to sign their names, it is anonymous, their declaration is quite sufficient, merely mentioning that they are his friends and supporters.

9972. What steps did they take to make it known that So-and-so is a candidate?—By publication lication in the daily journals. They can vote as well for any one without his being announced.

9973. Then, when the day of the election arrived, was it known to the constituency how many candidates were in the field?—Yes, usually. If there were a great many candidates those who found that their chances were but slender would gradually pass away, and then it would get down to possibly a contest between two, or not more than three.

9974. Supposing that only the same number of candidates were in the field as there were vacancies to fill up, would there be any poll?—Yes, there would certainly be a poll; there are no hustings there.

9975. Even when the number of candidates was not greater than the number of vacancies?—Yes; you may vote for any one. On several occasions I have known it occur in my own State, where there was but a single candidate appearing, that persons would nominate another secretly the night before, and would carry on their voting; and in the middle of the day persons who had supposed that there was no opposition to their candidate would suddenly find themselves being outvoted.

9976. Are you aware whether in every case that the ballot was open?—In every case the ballot was open.

9977. It was open for what number of hours?—Usually from nine o'clock until four or five; I am not precise as to the hours.

9978. Supposing there was no actual contest, would persons still come and record their votes?—Of course the particular friends of the parties would, whoever they were.

9979. So that although no candidate appeared beyond those that were necessary to fill up the vacancies, still in every case the votes were recorded?—Yes, always; a poll must be held 9980. Did canvassing take place?—Very ardently.

9981. In what way was the canvassing conducted?—Precisely as it is done in this country through committees, and through public assemblies, and through personal canvassing.

9982. Was there any house-to-house canvassing?—Not very much by the candidates; house-to-house canvassing as far as was consistent with the respectibility of the persons that were canvassed, was carried on by committees.

9983. Were committees formed for the purpose of the personal solicitation of voters?—Undoubtedly.

9985. Did the candidates themselves appear at public meetings, and explain their opinions?—Almost always, unless their party happened to be holding two or three meetings the same evening, resolutions were passed in favour of the candidates; but I should explain that it is an understood practice, which never was deviated from, that those meetings never were disturbed on any occasion whatever; no disturbance was allowed by either of the candidates.

9986. Do you mean that the meetings were all of one particular political complexion?—Not at all, because the object sought for at public meetings was to get the opponents' party there more than their own; the object of the public meeting was to persuade and induce voters on the opposite side to join t' em; they usually wished to get the presence of voters from the other party.

9987. And at those mixed meetings were resolutions passed in favour of a particular candidate?—Yes.

9988. Will you describe to us the system of the ballot which was in force there?—You could vote upon any sort of paper; any sort of list with any design upon it; or you could write your ballot in any form.

9989. Then there were no ballot papers furnished by the managers?—None at all.

9990. Was it the practice for the committees of each candidate to provide printed ballot papers for the use of the voters?—It was; and the effort frequently was to try to imitate the designs on the tickets of their antagonists as much as possible.

9991. Mr. Bright.] For what purpose?—Because, when the excitement was great and they had ignorant people to deal with who did not know the design on the ticket, the ticket might be passed off in the hands of another person; one party, for instance, would have a ship on the top of the ticket, and the other party, when they found it out, would go and put a ticket with a ship on it into the hands of a voter; there would be two tickets of precisely opposite political complexions with a ship on the top of them; or a man would take up a ship ticket and put a ship ticket of a different understanding, but with the same picture on it, into a voter's hand, and he may be told to go and vote that ticket; or if there is a yellow ticket they may try to induce the yellow ticket holder to vote the green ticket.

9992. Mr. Hunt.] As a rule, were the voting papers of different colours?—Generally so; the only way in which secrecy could be obtained there was through the written ballot.

9993. Were those voting papers placed in an urn, or a ballot box?—In a ballot box. The election was generally held in some public place; for instance, in a fire-engine room where there was a large open space facing the street, and the front door was railed in, and there was a desk erected across it.

9994. Were the ballot papers folded up by the voters before they were placed in the ballot box?—Not necessarily; the voter could do what he pleased, you cannot call anything the practice; there was no practice about it. Some persons, it seems, did not do it, and I think a great number did not do it; a great number tried to show how they were voting instead of trying to conceal their voting.

9995. What check was there to see whether persons were entitled to vote or not?—There was very little check.

9996. I suppose, with the system of universal suffrage, there was no such check?—It was very difficult to get a check.

9997. Still there was some condition as to residence, was there not?—There was a difference in each state, as to the length of period; in case of the presidential election it was six months residence and being a citizen of the United States. In the state elections the same qualification did not exist; you must then have been a resident citizen of the State of South Carolina for a certain time. The municipal election was a different affair.

9998. Was there in each case a register of authorised voters?—There was no register except once when it was tried by a capitation tax.

10000. And then do they examine him?—Then they examine him; the challengers have a right to put any question to him as to his residence.

10001. Does it rest with the managers to allow a vote or not?—Yes, eventually it does.

10002. When the ballot was over what was done with the ballot box?—The ballot box was opened before they commenced taking the votes, and held up to the persons assembled outside; it was then, in the presence of witnesses, locked and the key handed over to a notary public; and then, after the votes had been received, a slip of paper was taken and placed over the aperture and sealed with the seal of the corporation, or some official seal, and the same process was gone through with the keyhole. Then the ballot boxes were folded up in paper, and those were sealed as well, and were then taken to the vaults of a bank or of the bank of the place, and put in some place of security until the next morning; the next morning all the managers assembled and went in a body and received the ballot boxes from the vaults where they might have been deposited; and they were then taken to the Court House or the City Hall, or the Town Hall, and there, in the presence of all the managers, the manager of each poll counted the votes in his own precinct, and the manager of that precinct made his report to the chairman before the managers, who superintended the whole election of the town or the precinct, and they were all obliged to remain upon the premises and obliged to be there until the counting of all the polls was completed, and as soon as the counting of the votes was completed, whether it was one, two, or three o'clock at night, the election was then announced either from the steps of the Town Hall or the porch, or whatever it might be, of the court-house where the counting took place.

10003. Under that system did any intimidation take place?—Quite as much as takes place in England.

10005. Was there anything in the nature of mob violence at elections?—Occasionally. I have known it on one occasion only in Charleston, but I have known it very frequently in other places.

10006. Would the mob attack the leaders of political parties, or would they attack individual voters?—Only individual voters. The way in which the mob is brought in is by crowding the polls, mobbing the polls, as they call it, or preventing voters from approaching the poll.

10007. Was it known how each voter was likely to vote?—Very thoroughly, I think.

10008. Did personation take place to any extent?—Any quantity, to an unlimited extent.

10009. Was the system of what is called in this country bottling voters known there?—Very frequently, if it was an excited election at all.

10011. Of what kind?—Treating, and bribery in money payments, or in any form in which you may conceive bribery to be carried on.

10012. Were the candidates willing to spend money in bribery, not knowing how voters might vote?—The candidates did not spend so very much money, the money was contributed usually there, and, at most elections throughout the country, by the party.

10013. Still a person taking money for his vote, might go and vote against the candidate, and fold his voting paper up, and keep it secret how he voted?—I do not see how it is possible, if proper care was taken of them.

10014. According to the law, every voter might keep his vote secret, if he liked?—Undoubtedly he might.

10016. In point of fact, there was very little secrecy about the voting?—Very little, unless by such persons as clergymen. I will cite my own father, who is a clergyman. The candidate might be from his own congregation, and therefore being in such a position, a clergyman would be unwilling that it should be known that he had any particular preference; but I think that secrecy was observed generally by those in the better and higher walks of life.

10018. Or on the ground of any kind of undue influence?—I am not able to recall one. I inquired yesterday of a much older gentleman than myself, and he cannot recall an instance in which there was a petition.

10019. Do you know as a fact that persons often voted over and over again at the same election?—I think there is not the slightest doubt of it. The term "early and often" is quite a common term at all elections, north, south, east, and west.

10020. Have you been present at contested elections in England?—Yes; several of them; and I have served on committees as well.

10021. Do you think that the evils which are complained of at English elections are as rife in the State of South Carolina?—South Carolina is one of the best States, and the least liable to tumult or disturbance at elections. Their elections were notorious throughout the country as being the most perfectly conducted; it was pre-eminently notorious throughout the country for quietness and the manner in which the elections were conducted in that state, but that was quite exceptional in the country.

10022. Mr. Bright.] But they would be generally orderly elections?—They have been usually very orderly in South Carolina. I know of no disturbance.

10023. Mr. Hunt.] Where have you seen elections

tions in England?—In Liverpool I saw one, and also in Oxford and Croydon.

10024. Which, in your opinion, comparing the elections that you have witnessed in this country and in the United States, is the preferable mode of conducting an election?—I think that to an impartial mind or to any person who has had experience of the American system, there is no comparison that the English system is very far superior to it, both as securing purity of election and the facility with which any corruption is detected.

10025. Is there great difficulty in America in detecting corruption?—It is almost impossible.

10026. How so?—You have nothing to begin with to trace it, unless you get the individual to come and perjure himself, because all evidence is passed off as soon as the voting paper passes into the ballot box; all evidence as to the manner in which his vote has been given ceases. You have nothing to begin to trace out bribery with. I have served upon committees in Liverpool, and the difficulties of bribing men in England struck me very forcibly as compared with the system on the other side, because, inasmuch as a man's name is upon the register, he can be thoroughly canvassed some time before the election, and he must necessarily express an opinion, and it is very much more difficult to bribe a man who has previously expressed an opinion to his friends and relations and those by whom he is surrounded, than it is for a man who may take a bribe and be perfectly secure as to how he is going to vote, as they secure him on the other side, and yet retain his self-respect among his fellows.

10027. Mr. Bright.] How long have you been away from South Carolina?—I have been now absent about six or seven years.

10028. Did you leave before the beginning of the war?—I was there during a part of the war; I was in the army for some time.

10029. Did you live entirely or chiefly in South Carolina?—Altogether so.

10030. Half the population of the State were negroes, I believe?—I forget the exact proportion, but I can easily see by the returns.

10032. Can you tell the Committee what was the franchise in the State?—Universal suffrage; there was no qualification whatsoever.

10033. Except colour?—Except colour.

10034. You did not allow any black man to vote?—No.

10035. Did all the white men vote?—All the white men. Of course they must be 21 years of age; that is the only qualification.

10037. I understood you to say that the franchise was different in voting for President from that which prevailed in voting for a State election?—I think not; the difference was this, that in voting for the President, a man might be in a different State entirely, therefore for the election of the Electoral College we had no legislative qualifications. A man was entitled to his vote wherever he might be. For instance, he might find himself in Charleston, or he might find himself somewhere else, and he could vote.

10038. Whilst you were there were there generally strong contests for your Congressional elections?—Some of them very strong.

10039. Did the subject of slavery ever enter into the question?—Not at all.

10040. The population were all of one opinion upon the question of slavery?—Yes; all of one opinion entirely.

10041. You stated. did you not, that there was no register of voters?—Except once it was attempted.

10042. But as a rule there was no register of voters?—None at all.

10043. Therefore anybody could come up to the place to vote, and there was no mode of striking him off upon any register upon which his name appeared?—None at all.

10044. Therefore the plan of voting early, and voting often, was quite practicable in that State?—Quite practicable, and also the same system prevailed in all the other States. I do not think that registration is required in any of the States, and I think I am borne out in that by a pamphlet which is now upon the table, written by an American in New York.

10045. When you are speaking about the ballot, you mean rather a different thing from what we mean here; we speak of the ballot as a shield for the voter for his secret vote; you speak of the actual voting as the ballot in America?—I understand by the ballot, his writing a name upon a paper, and placing it without anyone's knowing it in a ballot-box.

10048. You say that parties conducting the election, try by imitating each other's tickets to deceive the electors as to the manner in which they shall vote?—Very frequently it is done, I think almost universally, if there is a contested election.

10049. On the whole then, looking at your description of the South Carolina system, it does not appear that any special machinery was in force to ensure secrecy or to procure a free election?—Every precaution that was possible under the constitution of the country was used, and more so in that State than in any other.

10050. I am not speaking about the constitution of the country, but you say distinctly that there was no register?—There was no register, it was once attempted by introducing a capitation tax, compelling a person to take out a capitation tax, and to pay 4*s.*

10051. You stated there was no register except once, that of itself involved a great liability to fraud, did it not, as regards personation?—Undoubtedly.

10052. And with regard to the ballot, there was no precaution taken, by which the secrecy

22 June 1869.

10053. The people voted with any colour ticket?—Any coloured ticket they pleased or on a piece of blank paper, a person could resort to whatever secrecy he pleased, and if he did not choose, there was no possibility of getting out how that man had voted.

10054. You said also that meetings generally were not disturbed, is not that rather a common feature in America?—I think it is universal; I never heard of a public meeting in America being disturbed by the opposite party.

10055. The general feeling is, that everybody has a right to be heard, and tumult to prevent an opponent being heard is very uncommon?—It is considered most unwarrantable the slightest disturbance by the opposite party of any public meeting whatever, and I think never occurs.

10056. You stated, did you not, that you thought there was intimidation in America, very much the same as there is in England?—Quite so.

10057. In South Carolina the classes of society were even more separated than they are here, even omitting the blacks, were they not?—I think very much less so.

10058. Surely the class of persons who have gone by the name of mean whites were, apart from blacks, in a very abject condition?—Very far from it; they approached very much more near the upper classes than any working class that I know of in this country, and they exercised very considerable power in the country through their vote.

10059. And they were appealed to by the superior class?—By both parties; you are probably not aware that the term "poor whites" is applied to a class of people who live in deserted portions of the State on poor lands, squatters; and so far from being subject to anybody, a neighbourhood is very often brought into subjection to their influence.

10060. Did you say that the polls were often obstructed by mobs in South Carolina?—In that way I have never known it in South Carolina; but, I have known it in other States.

10061. Where?—Both in Georgia, New York, New Orleans, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

10062. It is a very strange thing that in the American newspapers there is nothing about disturbances at the elections, and in my long experience of them, it is very rare to find any interruption of that kind?—I do not remember a single election in which I have not known that to occur, not in one but in many cases.

10064. That is not the question; I was not asking about gentlemen, or about the genteel people who will not go to the poll, but I asked whether there was mob violence, so as to obstruct the polling?—The mob violence is this, that parties introduce their friends, and put them in the face of the poll, so that persons to enter the polling place, except they have the sympathy of those present, are obliged to penetrate and work their way with difficulty up to the mouth of the poll.

10065. Are there riots in the streets?—No riots. You asked me about the obstruction of the poll; obstruction is different from violence; that is what I was trying to explain. I have known very violent riots in Baltimore and Philadelphia, in which buildings, churches, and things of that kind set on fire.

10066. Was that election upon the great slavery question in Philadelphia, or what year was it in?—It was in the year 1845 or 1846, I think, in which the Philadelphia riots were frightful.

10067. Were they riots that arose upon the slavery discussion?—I think not; I think it had more to do with something connected with the firemen's department, as well as I can remember at this distant period. The firemen wished to accomplish some change in their favour, and then there was a riot originating with the Know-Nothings; there were very serious riots between the Irish and the American population; the Know-Nothings were a combination of native Americans as against the foreign population, and those two elements were brought into violent collision; it was on those occasions that several of those riots occurred.

10068. Have you been in South Carolina during the last five years?—No, not since the war; I only know from the public press; I get the daily Charleston papers.

10069. Mr. Graves.] Will you explain that which you once or twice attempted to do, as to the capitation tax which you spoke of, which was put on to prevent this indiscriminate voting?—It has often been a subject of discussion in the country amongst the better people, to try and put an end to this corruption which everybody regretted, and a capitation tax was introduced at the municipal elections, compelling a person to pay a tax six or nine months previous, and receiving a receipt for the payment of this capitation tax, which receipt he was required to produce at the election, and in that way they wished to supply the place of a register.

10070. Does that not apply to voting for Congress?—No; only for municipal purposes that capitation tax was introduced.

10071. Has that been given up?—It was given up after several years; it was found also to be corrupted; that people went and paid the capitation tax of persons who had long been dead, and supplied them with names on the day of the election, and the certificate of the capitation tax, and such people voted.

10072. Is it within your knowledge that for some length of time the mind of statesmen in America has been turned to devising some means of stopping this corruption and bribery which exist in America?—There has been very great and anxious inquiry into the matter for many years.

10073. Is it within your knowledge that there has been and now is a committee in the State of New York, formed for the purpose of investigating the corruption and bribery which took place at the last election?—I have seen that in print.

10074. Do you know whether the committee has made its report or not?—I do not know that; I have not seen it stated.

10075. Have you heard that in the last election for the State of New York, 25,000 illegal votes were cast?—I have seen it stated in the public papers, but it is not within my knowledge in any way.

10076. Have you got a nomination in America?—None at all.

10077. No hustings?—No; anybody can vote for anybody; you may throw away your vote. I should mention possibly one thing, that, for instance, in voting for the House of Representatives or the Legislature of the State, there are two boxes, one for the Senate and one for the House of Representatives; if by any mistake a senator's vote gets into the House of Representatives' box, that vote is lost; it is considered fraudulent in itself; or if two votes are found folded together in such a way as to indicate that they had been put in by the same person, that vote is also rejected.

10078. You heard the evidence given by the two previous witnesses with regard to the practice in Australia, can you say that in any part of the United States any similar system to that is adopted?—I know of none; I am quite sure; I may say there is none

10079. Have there been any improvements of that kind suggested in America?—I never heard of any suggestion of that sort.

10080. Has it never been suggested that registration would be a great improvement upon the present system in America?—Frequently; but it has never been attempted to be carried out, because the great difficulty in altering the system is, that the masses of the people, who are interested in the benefits of the election, or the results of the election, are the very people that would oppose the change. All the office-seekers, all the people engaged in conducting the election, all the people who are willing to be bribed, which is a very numerous class, would necessarily have always opposed any such measure that might be introduced.

10082. Do you think that that corrupt feeling is increasing or decreasing in the United States?—I think it increases. As emigration increases in the country, I think that the corruption increases, because you introduce a class of people who know very little about the politics of the country, and, therefore, to whom probably a 1 l. note or a 5 l. note is of vast importance; they can scarcely speak the language.

10083. Mr. Bright.] Who are those that you refer to?—They are Swedes, Germans, French, Italian, and every nationality, and vast numbers of Irish.

10084. The O'Conor Don.] I understood you to state that there was no qualification at all required for an election in South Carolina?—Except age.

10085. Is not citizenship required?—Yes, citizenship, undoubtedly.

10086. If citizenship is required, how can it be ascertained if there be no list of citizens kept in the State?—It is exceedingly difficult.

10087. But is there any means at all of detecting it, if a man comes up to vote who is not entitled to vote?—He can be sworn; if he is a foreign subject he can be made to produce his naturalization papers.

10088. Chairman.] If he belongs to another State, what is done?—If he belongs to another State, he requires a residence of six months.

10089. How is it ascertained whether he belongs to that particular State that he alleges, or not?—It is very difficult to ascertain it at all, and it is not ascertained.

10090. Any visitor, in fact, might vote?—Yes, any visitor might vote, unless he has his vote challenged and it is disallowed. For instance, it is well known that during the last election a vast number of people went from one State and voted in another State, for the express purpose of influencing the election in that State.

10091. The O'Conor Don.] Are you aware whether that is the system that is carried on in other States?—I am quite aware of it.

10092. Do you state from your own knowledge that in New York they have no list of voters?—I have a general knowledge.

10093. How long is it since you have been in New York?—I have not been in New York for about eight years.

10094. You state that at the municipal elections in New York respectable people would be afraid to go to the poll?—I have always understood so; I have heard many northern men say so.

10095. Have you ever witnessed any such rioting?—I have gone and watched the polls at a distance.

10096. But you have not gone near the poll?—I should be very sorry to go near the poll at the municipal elections.

10097. When you say that that is the general rule, are you certain of it?—I have always understood so; I have been told so. I have held conversations with many northern men, and many men from New York, and they have invariably told me that it was with great difficulty that they could get to the poll. I have spoken to bishops and clergymen, and people of that stamp from the north, and from New York, and I have spoken to bishops of different States in the country simply from the connection of my father with the Church; and I have heard discussions amongst such people, and I have always been led to believe that very few of the classes who were better off in life have attended the elections.

10098. Mr. Bright.] You would probably be very much astonished to find that a score or two of American gentlemen went from Liverpool to New York on purpose to vote at the last election for President?—I can easily understand such a thing.

10099. You think then that, although many might go from here 3,000 miles to vote, yet gentlemen living on the spot will not vote?—I can easily understand that sort of thing, particularly in a municipal election in New York.

10100. The O'Conor Don.] Are you not aware that in New York there are an enormous number of polling places, and that they occur almost in every third street?—I believe they have been very much increased recently.

10101. Perhaps, as the polling places have increased, the difficulty that you speak of has been done away with?—That is very possible. I am speaking now personally of the difficulty previous to my absence from the country, and what took place at those elections; anyone can, by referring back to the New York papers at that period, see the description given of them.

10102. I understand you to say that you much prefer the English system to the American; do you believe that that is the general feeling of the State of South Carolina?—I think it is universal; so with anyone who has had personal experience of elections in the two countries.

10103. Do you think it would be popular in South Carolina to propose that the ballot should be abolished?—I do.

10104. And to have open voting?—I do; there happen to be on this side at present, I know, 10 or 15 gentlemen of my personal acquaintance who are of that opinion.

10105. Has that proposal ever been mooted in the State?—Never.

10106. Or in any State of America that you know of?—Not that I have ever heard.

10107. Do you think that if the majority of the people in those States preferred a different system of voting it would not have been at least mooted?—It has been mooted very frequently.

10108. But it has not been taken up and supported by any large body?—No, it has not been supported by any large body, except the Know-Nothing party.

10109. Were they in favour of open voting?—No, not of open voting, but of a change.

10110. I am speaking of open voting, as compared with the ballot; has the question of open voting actually ever been mooted in America?—I have never heard it mooted.

10111. Do you think that if there was a general feeling, as you state, in favour of open voting, it would not have been mooted?—I do not know that there is a general feeling.

10112. You stated that there was a general feeling?—All those who have had experience of the English system, as compared with the American system, are of that opinion.

10113. But you have never heard in the States the question of open voting mooted?—Never.

10114. Mr. Leatham.] You spoke of the number of mean whites in South Carolina, and you also spoke of a certain amount of intimidation which they exercised in the elections there; will you explain what class is intimidated?—It is the mechanics.

10115. Those you do not call mean whites?—Undoubtedly not.

10117. How do they know how they vote?—By sending them to the poll under the charge of persons who see them deposit their vote. A ticket is placed in their hands, and they are watched until their vote is deposited in the box.

10118. How long has the ballot been introduced into South Carolina?—From the time of the original Government; I think after the Colonial Government ceased, after the Revolution, it was introduced immediately; that is my impression. I cannot recall any time in which it did not exist.

10120. Chairman.] Is it not the case that in an election in America a large number of candidates are voted for at the same time; that is to say, different offices are voted for at the same time?—Yes, in some States; judges, sheriffs, and tax-collectors, are all voted for at the same time in many cases.

10121. At the same time as the election of members of Congress?—Very often the election takes place at the same time; it may, or may not. It depends upon accidents.

10122. Can you recollect how many offices you have ever known put up at the same time for election?—In our own State the electors of the President and Vice President were not voted for by the people, but they were elected by the Legislature; they were elected as Senators of the United States; they were elected as electors of the President and Vice President by the joint Legislature.

10123. How many offices have you known voted for at the same election?—We had very few elections comparatively in our own State, because our judges were elected for life; most of our officers were so elected. I have known a tax-collector, a sheriff, a member of Congress, and a Senator of the State elected at the same time.

10125. Is there not ever a general election for Congress?—There is a general election for members of the House of Representatives, but not for senators, who are elected by the State Legislatures.

10126. How many vacancies have you ever known elected for at an election at the same time; half-a-dozen?—No, I cannot say half-a-dozen; I have known four or five different offices.

10127. Were there four vacancies to be filled? Four different and distinct purposes. I have known 18 representatives to be voted for on a single ticket.

10128. Could one voter give 18 votes?—Yes, he could vote for 18 persons; for instance, the districts were represented in proportion to their population and their taxes; 18 is the largest number I have known.

10129. Is it not the case that under such a system as that it is very little use for any individual member of a party to prepare his own ballot; his votes are almost thrown away, are they not, unless the party agree together for what whole ticket they will vote?—Where the votes are so numerous, and a single person can cast in equivalent to 18 votes, many plump for a single individual individual. The influence of a single vote as applied to any single individual candidate, is greater than where the candidates are few.

10130. Is not that system of voting for a large number of vacancies all at one time, one of the reasons why the attempts at preserving secrecy has been altogether abandoned?—There has been no effort ever made by law to compel secrecy; perfect secrecy voluntarily is perfectly possible, simply because a man can write his own vote in his own house, before he proceeds to the poll.

10131. But it is never practised, or very rarely, I believe?—It is very frequently practised.

10132. The O'Conor Don.] Are the ballot-boxes in South Carolina made of glass or of wood?—They are made of wood usually.

10133. Mr. Brand.] Are there several polling places in each electoral district in South Carolina?—Always.

10134. Is there any reason why a voter should not present himself at each polling place and vote over again?—It is possible, and has been done.

10135. Do you believe it to be done commonly in other States, as far as you know?—As far as my personal experience goes I know nothing, but I speak from what I have seen in the reports upon the corruption at the elections, and I have heard of as many as 10 or 15 times that a voter has voted at different polling places.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir CHARLES WENTWORTH DILKE, Bart., a Member of the House; Examined.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Bart., M.P.
25 June 1869.

10136. Chairman.] CAN you give the Committee any information with regard to the mode of election in any foreign countries or colonies?—I can speak from my own knowledge as to the mode of conducting elections in France, in the State of New York, and in the State of Massachusetts; also in the colony of Tasmania, and in the colony of South Australia; and I can speak from hearsay as to the elections in Victoria and in New South Wales.

10137. The Committee have not had any evidence as to the mode of election in France; perhaps you could shortly describe what it is?—Before explaining the French system, if the Committee will permit me, I would say that there are two classes of systems: first, the French, belonging to the same class as most, if not all of the American States' systems; this being the ballot, which is, by law, supposed to be secret; but which, as a matter of fact, is not in all cases necessarily secret; and, secondly, the necessarily secret or colonial ballot system. The French procès verbal, which is drawn up at the close of the election, is itself the best account of their system. There is drawn up a procès verbal for each section; that is, each polling district in the borough. The president of the "section" is the deputy returning officer, and is appointed by the mayor, who is the returning officer, and who is appointed by the Government. In the procès verbal he states exactly what occurred at the election lately held in that section. He states that in accordance with directions received by law, and so on, the election having been ordered to be held, he called to assist him a commission consisting of four electors, two chosen from among the oldest electors upon the register, and two chosen from among the youngest; he gives in the names and addresses, and the dates of their birth. This commission of five then proceeded to choose a secretary. They took their places in a room, which the city had chosen as being a polling place for that section. He states what papers they had before them (the register and all the electoral laws), and also that the ballot box was opened in the presence of the electors, in order that it might be seen that nothing was in it, and then closed also in their presence, and the key handed to the oldest of the assessors present. This is all before the voting begins. He then states that the first day's voting began; I should say that the voting in Paris, as the Committee knows, lasts two days.

10138. Sir George Grey.] Does he announce the candidates?—He reads over a list of the candidates who have prêté serment, or taken the oath. I must then state that the French do not carry out their law strictly; their law is made for small places rather than for large boroughs, and it states and assumes throughout that the list or register of electors is read over, and that the electors then come up in the order in which they are upon the register and deliver their votes. As a matter of fact, of course the Committee will see that that is an impossible process, and therefore a process which resembles that which obtains here is followed as a matter of fact, but the other is assumed throughout by the law. The procès verbal uses the terms of the law. It says, when his name was called, each elector came up in turn and presented his polling card. Those polling cards are an essential part of the French system, and they form also a part of most of the colonial systems. To the French system they appear to be necessary; to the colonial systems they are not strictly necessary. The French polling card is in character much the same thing as a polling card in this country, with this difference, that it is a governmental matter and not a matter for the candidates or for the committees. In France it may be said to be practically necessary that each voter should have his polling card; in England, of course, it is unnecessary. The polling card, like the English polling card, states the name of the elector, and it also states the date of his birth, which, of course, answers to his qualification, under manhood suffrage. It states his profession and then his address, and it also bears his signature. The Committee have had evidence that in Victoria and South Australia the signature is also used as a mode for testing the identity of the voter, and preventing personation.

registration system is conducted; the cards upon which in fact their register is made; those cards, which have been filled up in the office of each mairie, or what may be called the town hall of each borough, may be obtained by the voters on their personal application, or upon their written application during three days, shortly before, and ending, I think, the day before the opening of the election. On the day of the election itself they cannot always be obtained. As a matter of fact, it is found that about two-thirds of the voters upon the register in Paris go through the process of obtaining their cards during the three days, and that most of them obtain them by personal attendance. They bring their polling cards with them to the polling booth, and they are allowed to poll without their polling cards if the deputy returning officer permits it; that is, simply at his discretion; but as a rule 99-100ths, I may say, would bring their polling cards. Having brought their cards, in passing into the room they are met by the touts of the various candidates, who press them on all sides with the bulletins of the candidates. The bulletins are supposed to be identical as far as their exterior goes; they are illegal if they bear names in coloured ink, but as a matter of fact they are of different sizes, and of different thicknesses, and can be detected from the exterior; and that is one reason why in practice the French ballot is not secret. The bulletins are handed to the voters by the agents of the various candidates. I will put these two in (delivering in the same, vide Appendix). They bear the candidates' names, one of them bearing the name of Monsieur Garnier-Pagès, and it bears the designation of Député Sortant, stating that he is the late member, and the other, that of Monsieur Raspail, says that he is the candidate of the Radical Democracy, so that the law permits them to say something upon their bulletin. I believe there is no limit to what they may say, provided they do not use coloured inks.

10140. Sir George Grey.] That constitutes, in fact, canvassing?—Yes; it constitutes canvassing. Almost every elector takes all the bulletins and tears up, or puts in his pocket, or throws away those that he does not intend to use, preserving in his hand that which he does intend to use. This I may state is not recognised by law; an elector is supposed by the law to write his own bulletin himself, and to bring it in his hand; but as a matter of fact, almost all the electors use these printed bulletins. I may state at this point that in the country districts, where the electors are much afraid of the power of the Government, and where they desire not only to keep their votes secret, but actually to go beyond that, and to make the Government believe that they have voted for the Government candidate, whereas, as a matter of fact, they have voted for the opposition candidate, they take the Government bulletin, which they take from the Government agent, who is commonly the Garde Champêtre, they carry that off, and they find some opportunity of leaving the queue, or string of voters, for a moment, and they scratch out the name of the Government candidate upon the Government bulletin, and write in ink the name of the opposition candidate upon it, and then they vote with the Government bulletin, leaving it to be seen, by the size and thickness of the paper, that they are using the Government bulletin, whereas, as a matter of fact, they are voting for the opposition candidate.

10141. What is the use of the card?—The card is exactly a polling card and not a voting paper. The voter passes in, having in his hand both the bulletin which he intends to use, either printed or written, and his polling card, the bulletin being his own affair, and the polling card being the Government affair. He passes up to the president of the section, that is the deputy returning officer, or to any one of the assessors, who are all sitting in a row; if many are voting at once, all of them would be occupied at once, and each of them has a copy of the register; he then hands to them, without speaking, his polling card; they look at it and look at him, and so do the friends and representatives of the candidates, generally two to each candidate, but sometimes more, varying according to the size of the room, but all beyond one each being admitted at the discretion of the deputy returning officer. They look at the man to detect personation; they are, in fact, what we style in this country the agents or representatives of the candidates to detect personation. The assessor or returning officer calls the name out; this one which I hold in my hand, for instance, is the voting card of Alfred Auguste Tresca, and when the assessor or returning officer reads out the name, if it is not M. Tresca, but a case of personation, somebody would probably know him. The sections contain an average of about 700 to 1,000 voters, and most of the voters are known to some one of the inhabitants, who would be present in the room; of course that is the same in this country, and the liability to personation is the same as in this country. The voter's name is then ticked off upon the register as having come up to vote, and a pair of scissors are taken, and one corner of the card is cut off. The Committee will see that this card has been used once for voting. The corner is clipped off, and the card is returned to the voter, who then, in his turn, hands his bulletin to the assessor or to the deputy returning officer; if it is handed to the assessor, the assessor hands it to the deputy returning officer, always folded, and the deputy returning officer puts it into the ballot box, which is in front of him, the ballot box remaining covered on the top, and the cover being slipped off for the voter to put the bulletin in, and then slipped back again.

25 June 1869.

10142. Mr. Villiers.] Is it folded so as to conceal it from the assessor?—It must be, otherwise the vote is lost. Mr. Verdon informed the Committee at their last meeting that in Victoria a vote is not lost even if the voter through design or through mistake allows the name of the person for whom he votes to be seen; but of course it will be evident to the Committee that the French plan of having the vote lost on those occasions is absolutely necessary to the secrecy of the ballot.

10143. Sir George Grey.] What is written upon the voting card?—It states the name, the date of birth, the qualification or profession, and residence of the elector, and it bears his signature.

personation, in those cases the elector is asked to write his name, and if he is a man who cannot write, he is sent back and told to produce evidence of identity; that is to say, to bring up somebody who knows him.

10145. Mr. Cross.] Who provides the polling card?—The polling card is provided not by the candidates, as in this country, but by the Government.

10146. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know in practice whether each voter goes to the mairie for a card or whether the agents get cards for a certain number of voters?—As a rule each voter goes; I am giving only an opinion now, but I believe, as a matter of opinion, that I may say that they would look with great suspicion upon a considerable number being asked for by one person, judging from conversations which I have had with maires. As the Committee know, by the French law, a candidate not having obtained a sufficient majority is sent back for another election, and in those cases the same polling card is again used; that is to say, if the voter has not lost it. This is a card (producing the same) which has two corners cut off; that is because it has been used twice; but in cases where the voter between two elections has lost his card he is allowed to go and get another card, so that it is not important. There are the same facilities for getting fresh cards. I may state that when a voter comes up and gives a particular name upon the register and asks for his polling card, and another voter has already taken out a polling card for that name, that is to say, where personation has been committed, there is machinery provided by law for at once instituting an inquiry by the maire, the court consisting of the maire and two assessors. It is an offence at law, and I believe about two years' imprisonment is given for it, much the same as here. I may state that, in the voting by ballot which took place in Manchester between Mr. Milner Gibson and the late Mr. Ernest Jones for the candidature in case of a vacancy at Manchester on a late occasion, a polling card of the same character as the French polling card was made use of, as the Committee will see. I will put one in (handing in the same).—It was required of each voter that he should produce his polling card which he had previously obtained; but the committees were allowed to obtain them for the voters on that occasion, and to fill them up.

10147. Sir George Grey.] Printed voting papers, if I understand you rightly, are not in France recognised by law?—No, not by law; each voter is supposed by law to take a slip of paper and write whom he votes for upon it.

10148. Mr. Raikes.] Was this signed by the voter?—Yes; if it was signed the signature was a piece of evidence of identity; if it was not signed in Manchester, and the person voting did not know how to read and write, evidence of identity was taken if any question was asked, but not if no question was asked; that is to say, the signature was not obligatory, and it is not obligatory in France, because there are many voters in France who cannot write, and in those cases they call a witness, who signs it for the voter. The voter makes his mark, in fact.

10149. Sir George Grey.] Is the name of the voter put to the bulletin?—No; if he puts his name to the bulletin, when they open the box, that one is destroyed.

10150. Mr. Villiers.] We do not understand that the public officer takes any notice of the bulletin?—He takes no notice of the printed bulletin any more than any other, except that he takes this negative notice, that if it bears a name in colours he destroys it in case the colour might have been seen through the paper in consequence of its thinness.

10151. But the evidence of the right of the man to vote is by his signature to the paper which is given by the Government officer?—Entirely so, except that it may be contradicted on occasions by the evidence of persons in the room. I will now continue the procès-verbal. The procès-verbal states that after the voting for the day had gone on, the box was sealed up with many seals; every voter present who choose, impressing his own personal seal upon the sealing-wax. That is an important provision, because the number of seals makes it perfectly impossible that the box should be opened, as has been stated. I may say, in passing, that there is a feeling growing up in France that it is unnecessary to have the voting continued for two days, which would again obviate the difficulty of the supposed opening of the box. The next day the voting again proceeded in the same manner as is stated by the procès-verbal, and then comes an account of the counting of the numbers of the votes. The procès-verbal states that the box being opened, the bureau (those five persons assisted by a secretary) count the numbers. They count first the total number, 2,204. That was a very large polling district, I may state, in passing. In counting they used those forms, which I will hand round, but not put in unless the Committee desire it (producing the same). They first count the number of good votes for each candidate, and there is a special column at the end which they call bulletins nuls, or votes which are lost; bad votes, in fact. The procès-verbal states the names of the voters who besides the committee assisted in behalf of each candidate at the scrutiny; and it states the names of each of the four for each candidate. That is a matter of practice. It then states that one of the scrutateurs, or, as I will call them, the representatives, read out aloud each bulletin, and passed it to another, who looked at it. The two others, sitting on each side of these two, simultaneously counted one vote to that particular candidate on this paper, the one checking the other. Having finished going right through the bulletins, they put aside as bad votes, votes falling under certain classes. Those classes are given by law, so that the procès-verbal stating the fact is obliged to follow the classification given by the décret.

10152. Chairman.] Is the whole of that procès-verbal printed?—Yes. It is just filled up with the statement of the president; it is all printed, ready for filling up. There are five classes of bad votes. In this case there were bad votes in two classes, and in three classes there were none bad. The five classes are as follow: First, votes that are entirely blank; that is to say, blank pieces of paper. The second class are voting papers which cannot be read, or in which the name of the candidate cannot be read. The third class are those which do not contain a sufficient designation of the candidate; that is, where nobody can make out what the candidate's name is, although it is legible; for instance, if a man votes for a particular Christian name without any surname.

10153. Sir George Grey.] In the case of Monsieur Garnier Pagès, supposing it was only M. Garnier,

M. Garnier, would it be thrown aside?—I cannot answer that as a matter of fact. The fourth class are voting papers, on which the voters have made themselves known; that is to say, those they have signed; and the fifth class are those which contain the name of a person who has not taken the oath which is required from the candidates. The oath now, since the Emperor has been on the throne, is required from persons before they become candidates, instead of after they are elected, as it used to be.

10154. Mr. Villiers.] Are votes sometimes given for persons who have not taken the oath?—Yes; and in that case they are lost. It was found, as appears by the procès-verbal, that there were 10 bad votes of the first class, and six of the third. On this occasion there were none of the second, fourth, and fifth; that is to say, there were 10 voting papers which bore no name at all, and there were six voting papers which did not bear a sufficient designation of the individual; therefore, in all, there were 16 bad votes out of 2,204.

10155. Mr. Cross.] Do you know how many marksmen there are?—No; you will see that there is no statement of how many marksmen there are; and there could be no statement of how many marksmen, because they do not sign those bulletins. They have nothing whatever to write, for they use a printed bulletin.

10156. Mr. Villiers.] Did I rightly understand you to say that they are allowed to make their votes known, if they choose it, by signing their name?—No; that is one of the cases in which the vote is lost. The law throughout assumes that the vote is secret; but I am going to state presently that, as a matter of fact, it is not. In counting the votes, the committee counting them, have, in their position, five little covers, with names printed on them, one cover for each kind of bad votes; and therefore as they come to a bad vote, they throw it into the particular cover which holds the bad votes of that kind. (1.) Bulletins blancs. (2.) Bulletins illisibles. (3.) Bulletins ne contenant pas une designation suffisante. (4.) Bulletins sur lesquels les votants se sont fait connaître. (5.) Bulletins contenant le nom d'une personne n'ayant pas prêté le serment prescrit. The five descriptions which I have just now named.

10157. Sir George Grey.] Who decides upon the illegibility of the vote?—The committee by a majority of voices. The secretary does not vote, but the committee of five decide upon any questions that arise; they are absolute, in fact. The president then states that he had proceeded to burn, in the presence of the electors, the whole of the voting papers, with the exception of the 16 bad votes; and having done that (he does not state it here, but, as a matter of fact, I think that I can state it positively), he sends the 16 bad votes to the mairie, in order that they may be filed and kept. There is no provision of the law that those 16 bad votes shall be kept; but they are kept for a few days, in order that if the friends of the candidates state that there has been some mistake about them, they may be examined, if that mistake were expected to affect the election. Supposing there were a few supposed bad votes in a very close election which might affect it, and which, as a matter of fact, were not bad, the affair would then come before a committee of the Chamber upon Elections; that is, a permanent committee, as in America, and as in most of the colonies, and it would come before them during the short Session which is always held in France immediately after a general election, called the Session pour Verification de pouvoirs, which will be held during this month. Copies of this procès-verbal are sent to certain persons, and it bears on its back a statement of the names of the whole of the candidates, and the number of votes polled for each candidate in that particular section. I may state to the Committee that a very large number of votes were polled in that section for two of the candidates; but there were five other candidates, besides the two popular ones, who polled a very small number of votes indeed; one polled 20, two polled three, and two polled only one vote each. That was at the first election, and at the second election those men retired in favour of the others.

25 June 1869.

10158. Supposing that a vote is given for a person who has not been nominated for a candidate, what becomes of it?—There is no nomination in France, except the nomination by the man himself taking the oath. It was a common joke in France at the time of the last election that a man going out for a walk said, "I am going to my café, and I am going to take the oath as a candidate;" so many took it that it was a sort of matter of course. A man may vote for any person who takes the oath, provided he has taken the oath in that district.

10159. Mr. Raikes.] How was that in the case of M. Rochefort?—He took the oath through representatives; he sent a letter stating that he would take the oath.

10160. Mr. Villiers.] Why did he send a letter?—He would have received the two years' imprisonment to which he had been sentenced if he had returned to the country.

10162. Chairman.] What prevents a voter putting in more than one bulletin?—The president, that is to say, the deputy returning officer, in putting in the bulletin can feel by the motion of his finger whether more than one is contained there; if it were, he would probably, I should say, destroy both, having called the attention of the other members of the committee to the fact.

10164. You have also seen the operation of the ballot in some States of America, have you not?—Yes, in New York and Massachusetts. The system which prevails in New York is identical with the French system, and it is known in New York as the shanty system, because the touts of the candidates deliver the voting papers to their friends in little shanties, which are temporarily erected in the streets for that purpose; it is identical in principle with the French system, but but conducted with less care; and it is notorious that personation is carried on in New York to an enormous extent, but as far as it is a system at all, it is identical with the French system.

10165. Mr. Brand.] Is there a register of voters in New York?—Yes, there is now, but till very lately there has not been. In Massachusetts at the time of the Know-Nothing movement, what was called the secret ballot was adopted. The Know-Nothing party, as the Committee knows, were the Anti-Irish party; and, as in the elections, frauds were committed by the Irish in the big towns, the Know-Nothing party made it one of the planks of their platform to put down personation; and at the same time they took up the plan of the secret ballot. At the time that they came into power in the State of Massachusetts they carried a secret ballot law; I cannot remember the date exactly, but speaking roughly, it was somewhere about 1851 or 1852.

10166. Mr. Villiers.] Had they not the ballot system before?—Yes; the same system which prevails now, because I was going to explain to the Committee that they repealed the other. With regard to the secret ballot (and I state this in order that it may not be wrongly stated upon the other side possibly), the secret ballot which was adopted in Massachusetts, was a system liable to fraud. It was the same system as was adopted in the ballot at Manchester, to which I have already referred. It was a system in which the voting paper of the Australian form, that is to say, one bearing the names of all the candidates was enclosed in an envelope. That system is liable to fraud in every way; and although it was not proved that fraud was committed at Manchester on the late occasion, because perhaps the inducement to fraud was not so large as it might have been in other cases, yet the system is evidently liable to fraud in a high degree. It was discovered that it did not prevent fraud in Massachusetts, and the consequence of that discovery was that the secret ballot law was repealed, and the present law in Massachusetts is identical with the French, as it is in most of the States in the Union at this moment.

10167. Mr. Cross.] What was the fraud?—What the Committee knows as the Tasmanian Dodge; that would be the general form of the whole of the frauds. I will now come to the point which the Right honourable Member for Morpeth raised just now. The American and the French systems, as the Committee will see, are so far secret as this, that they may be secret, but that they need not in all cases necessarily be secret, and in that they differ entirely from the Australian system if properly carried out, because the Australian system, if properly carried out, is, and must necessarily be, secret. By that I mean this, that in Paris if you follow a voter along the queue, along the string of voters, you can see him take the voting paper of a particular candidate. He takes it open, and you can see which he takes, There is no power to prevent it if he wishes you to see it in his hand from the time that he takes it to the time that the deputy returning officer puts it into the box; so that under the French or American system, if the voter wishes that other persons should know how he votes, he can ensure that they shall know; under the Australian system the voter cannot make known for certainty, as the Committee are aware, the way in which he votes, because if he tells you how he votes he may be telling a lie. In the French system and in the American system he can prove to a certainty how he has voted; so that all through I should wish, with the permission of the Committee, to keep the notions distinct of the ballot which must in all cases be secret, and the ballot which is only secret if the voter wishes it to be secret himself.

10168. Mr. Villiers.] Will you explain the process by which somebody is watching the voter, and the voter is disclosing to him how he is going to vote; there must have been some previous arrangement, must there not?—There need not have been a previous arrangement, but of course there might have been. I will state to the Committee that I followed a voter in Paris, and I requested him by previous arrangement in that case to do what I told him. He was a friend of mine, and I did it with a view of proving to him what he denied, as most Frenchmen deny, namely, that the ballot with them is not secret. I told him that if he did what I asked him to do, I should know, as a matter of fact, for whom he voted. He did so, and I do know, as a matter of certainty, which way he voted. He took the bulletin of M. Raspail in the street, and he folded it, and kept it in his hand without putting it in his pocket. I followed him in the queue past the gendarmes into the room, as if I had been a voter myself, and we came round to where he delivered in his polling card. I stood behind him as he kept his bulletin in his hand, and he then, having established his right to vote, handed that bulletin, which I had never taken my eyes off, to the deputy returning officer, who put it into the box; so that I could swear in a court of justice for whom he voted. That is the process by which I could observe how he voted.

10170. Are you able to state what proportion of voters make their votes known in the way you have described?—I doubt whether any voters ever make their votes known in Paris purposely. There is a general feeling in Paris that the vote is a thing which should not be asked about, and that if it comes out which way a voter's sympathy is, it should come out as it were by chance, and not in answer to a direct question.

10171. Did you not state some time ago that the ballot was not secret in France?—Not in point of fact. I am looking to the proposed application of the French system to England, where this method of fraud would immediately be practised.

10172. You mean by which the vote might be ascertained?—Yes.

10174. Mr. Villiers.] Will you proceed to tell us how the Know-Nothing party determined to put down this system of fraud?—I say that they attempted to put it down by a secret ballot, and in so doing they established a ballot, which was a very bad system of secret ballot, not the same as in Paris, but their secret ballot was the same as that practised at Manchester, the envelope system; and they have now gone back to the Paris system, which was their system before.

10175. It was under that system that those frauds were practised?—It was under both ways that the frauds were practised; but there were special frauds peculiar to the envelope system which were practised under what they call their secret ballot; and there were other general frauds which were practised before, and which, in the city of Boston, are occasionally practised now, where they have reverted to the old system. That reverting to the old system was chiefly owing to local causes, namely, the general discredit into which the Know-Nothing party ultimately fell.

10176. Sir George Grey.] Is it the case that they have failed to establish a system in America which ensures absolutely secret voting?—They have done so; but I think chiefly because they never have really had, except in the city of New York and the city of Boston, any cause to establish such a system.

10177. They did try in Massachusetts, but they failed?—Yes; they established a bad system, and it failed.

10179. Chairman.] In France, I believe, a voter can never give more than one vote, as there is only one vacancy to be filled?—A voter can in no case give more than one vote.

10180. Whereas, in America, he frequently has to give several?—Yes, several; I think a very common number of votes to be given in America at one time, is three, at all events that is so in the Western States; I believe that in New York he would seldom be called upon to give three at one time. I would explain to the Committee that when they see a long list, called a "ticket," in the American papers, all those persons upon that ticket are not always to be voted for by any one individual, because that is a ticket for the whole State, and includes many divisions of the State; at all events a voter may be called upon to vote at one time for the governor of the State, and for a Congress man.

10182. Have you any idea what is the expense of conducting an election in Paris?—No, I cannot tell; I know that the expenses of registration are very heavy in Paris, for it is conducted with enormous care; the expense of an election is perfectly trifling, because they always take rooms without any fitting whatever; they merely require a table; they do not hire rooms, they use public rooms of all kinds; in America they almost always use the engine-room or the school-room.

10183. So that in America the expense is extremely small?—I should say that it would be extremely small.

10185. But that was considered an almost unprecedentedly large amount?—Yes; such a thing had never been known before; there were gigantic bills stuck upon every part of Paris at the last election.

10187. Can you tell me what is the expense to a commune of an election?—I cannot give an estimate which would be worth giving; but I can state that from the fact that they hire no rooms, but always use what may be called quasi public rooms, school-rooms, and so on, which are lent to the commune for the occasion, or which actually belong to them, and from the fact that no apparatus is required, but merely a table, a box, and a few chairs, I should say that the expense might be looked upon as nil.

10189. Mr. Villiers.] Can you detail to the Committee the manner in which they take the ballot in the other States of America?—With regard to the variations in the different States in America, I speak with great reserve, because there being now 37 States, it is hard to sweep all into one net; but the ballot in the various States differs only in being more or less good, more or less complete. It is always now upon one system, that being the French system, and it is only more or less well done upon that one outline.

10190. Are they all open to the observation you made that a man may disclose the way in which he votes, if he pleases?—Yes; there is no State in America now where the ballot is absolutely secret.

10191. Chairman.] In America is there any restriction as to the colour of the ticket?—In the State of Massachusetts there certainly is; in the State of New York the tickets that I saw used were not coloured, but I know, as a matter of fact, that in Ohio, and, I believe, in most of the States, the tickets may be of any colour.

10192. The O'Conor Don.] Is it not true, as a matter of fact, in the State of New York, that the

25 June 1869.

the tickets are not coloured outside, but the names are printed in different characters?—Yes, that is the fact.

10193. So that by looking at the exterior you know to which party the ticket belongs?—Yes, certainly; but in America nobody much cares about that, because intimidation is unknown.

10194. You stated that in the State of New York they did not generally speaking vote in one ticket for more than three officers?—Not as a rule.

10195. Would you just look at that State ticket for New York (handing a paper to the Witness); there are eight upon it?—Yes, that is perfectly true; I was contemplating at the time what may be called elections of a larger character. These are for very small offices. comparatively speaking. As the Committee will remember, I mentioned the election of governor, and the election of Congress men, which are more important things. This is a ticket bearing the title, Secretary of State, but that is Secretary of State only for the State; it is the Secretary to the State of New York, which is a very small affair, and it also bears the Controller of the State, the Attorney General of the State, the Treasurer of the State, the engineer, the canal commissioner, and the prison inspector.

10196. That is called a State ticket, is it not? Yes, it is a State ticket.

10197. In the State of New York, the ballot boxes are made of glass, are they not?—I have heard that stated, but at the election which I saw, and which was an election for a Congress man, the ballot boxes were not made of glass.

10198. Is it long since you saw an election there?—Yes, it was nearly three years ago.

10199. At some of the elections are the ballot boxes of glass?—Yes, I have heard of it, but never seen it.

10201. Cannot any person in this room ask a voter to show him the ticket which he is going to hand to the person receiving the votes?—It is so as a fact, and I may add that, though the French law is as stringent as anything can be against that being done, still, as I stated to the Committee just now, it can practically be done in Paris, but although in New York if it were detected nobody would say anything, in Paris if it were detected the vote would be rejected.

10202. Is it not the fact that in New York it is not necessary to follow the voter from outside, but actually in the booth when he is going to hand in his ticket any person may ask to look at it?—That is so.

10203. Mr. Leatham.] It is quite possible in Paris, is it not, to vote secretly if the law is carried out?—Hardly so, because the law could not detect my following that man as I did; there was nothing to detect; I merely followed him, and the law could not detect that I was watching him.

10205. The O'Conor Don.] What was the difficulty that arose in Massachusetts in consequence of which they changed the ballot, and adopted what they call the secret ballot; was it personation?—No; the voters were bought and sold at so much a hundred; they were brought by what were called ward managers at so much a hundred. The city of New York and the city of Boston, but especially the former, in all discussions about American politics are looked upon as being perfectly unknown quantities.

10206. Then when those voters who are purchased come in the managers no doubt took good care to go and see that the voters placed their tickets in the ballot-box or handed them to the person taking the vote?—Yes.

10208. Mr. Hunt.] In the French system are the number of polling cards brought counted and compared with the number of voting tickets that are afterwards taken out of the urn?—I believe not.

10209. Is there no check in any way to prevent more tickets being put into the urn than the voters that come up to vote?—I cannot speak for certain; I believe not.

10210. Do you know whether any accusation is ever made there against a returning officer on the score of putting himself or allowing others to put tickets into the urn improperly?—Never, I believe, since the vote taken at the time of the election of the Emperor by universal suffrage throughout the empire. On that occasion the accusation was very widely made.

10211. And generally believed?—And generally believed, I think; I believe that it was done as a matter of fact upon that occasion, but then I must call the attention of the Committee to the fact that the present existing electoral law had not then been established, and the present décret is a décret of the Empire. There was another, but it was neglected at that time entirely.

10212. Then the electoral system which you have now been describing is conducted by means of voting papers or tickets?—Yes.

10213. Have you ever seen or been where voting was conducted by balls?—I have never seen that; I may state that I am informed that it is the case in Greece; but I know nothing about it. With the permission of the Committee I may state in answer also to that, that I have seen two forms of machine for voting by balls, which appear to me to be absolutely perfect.

10214. Is one of them a machine which has a self-registering index?—They are both self-registering. There is one which has been more or less puffed and advertised, which appears to me to be a good one; but there is another which I think a Member of the Committee has seen, and which was made by a man named Vassie.

10215. Is that the one which you described as having been puffed?—No; the other is the one that has been puffed; but the one by Vassie appears to me to be perfect if it were to be worked out by a competent mechanician.

10216. You do not know any country in which the ballot exists where secrecy is preserved as to the the vote?—Yes; in the Australian colonies, with the addition of one provision, I am of opinion that secrecy would be absolutely preserved.

10217. Mr. Cross.] With regard to those men when they come up with their polling card, and the corner of the card is cut off; is there any register in which the particular man's name is ticked off as well?—Yes; he is ticked off on the register just as he is here, and in every system that I know of.

10218. You state that there is bribery in Boston, and one or two other places; can you account for the difference between those places and the rest of America?—It is owing to the very large Irish vote; people, most of them, unable to read or write, who are a very ignorant class indeed; and who, although they are naturalised American citizens, are not American citizens in the sense in which native-born Americans are; that is to say, they are not trained to free government, and probably have never had a vote before in their lives; and they are a very uneducated body.

10219. So that in that case the ballot does not prevent their being bribed?—No, not the American ballot; but the Australian system would prevent it. I will mention presently, with regard to bribery under the ballot, if the Committee will permit me, my opinion upon that point.

10220. Then the only distinction that you can draw between Boston and those other places where bribery does exist is the fact of the people being so uneducated, and being bribable?—Yes, their being bribable.

10221. That is to say, under the American system at all events, if there was a bribable population the ballot would not stop them?—Yes, that is the case; and I may add that at a single election which I saw at Toulon in November last, a certain amount of small bribery was committed; but I believe it was bribery on speculation, that the men were given so much as a small gift, and that they went and voted for the man who gave it to them or not, just as they pleased, but there was no security that they voted as they were bribed to vote.

10222. You state, do you not, that the money which is spent is not spent by the candidates, but by the party?—Yes, in America. In France there is no bribery, except in very exceptional cases. This case at Toulon was spoken of as a thing which had hardly ever been heard of before.

10223. Can you give any estimate as to the expense of a contested election in Boston?—No, I would not venture to say, and I doubt whether it would be possible to find out. The money that was spent in a New York election by Tammany Hall was a thing that you could not discover in any way.

10225. Mr. Fawcett.] Is there any personal canvassing in France?—No, not at all in the big towns; in the rural districts there is. They go round to all the small proprietors.

10226. There is no system of paid agency, is there?—None whatever; in the rural districts it is a system of personal calls upon the leading electors; and they go round and chat with them.

10227. Mr. Cross.] Do they allow travelling expenses to the voters in France, or in America?—Certainly not in either country. I may state that the polling places are numerous in France and in America.

10228. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You stated that the expenses of the late Paris elections have been higher than usual; in fact, a sum of about 400*l.*; have you not very much understated it; have you not heard that Monsieur Thiers spent nearly 1,000 l.?—I was told 400 l. by a member of his committee; he was my informant as to both their accounts, and he told me that he believed that Monsieur Devinck had spent about the same. I stated just now that the only source of expense in Paris at the late election was bill-sticking and printing, but I must correct that slightly. Public meetings were allowed in Paris for the first time since the coup d'état on the last occasion, and the candidates did in some circonscriptions pay the cost of the hire of rooms.

10229. Did the candidates pay those expenses?—Not everywhere. I believe that in the Quartier Latin, in Rochefort's election, the expenses were paid by the committee.

10231. But it is well known, is it not, in the country districts exactly how a man votes?—No, I think not at all; because I would call the attention of the Committee to this fact, that if you apply beforehand to the authorities in a French village they will tell you of any particular man that he will vote for the Emperor, that is to say, for the government candidate; and yet you find that in the rural districts on the last occasion the opposition candidates polled nearly one-third of the constituencies, and you would never hear of any man who was going to vote for the opposition candidate. Every man, if you believed the common report, was going to vote for the Government.

10232. Had they all been canvassed?—All canvassed in the rural districts; not nominally, but practically; not by the candidate but by the garde champêtre, who is a rural tyrant.

10233. Mr. Leatham.] I think you have not explained to the Committee under what circumstances a second ballot is taken in France?—It is necessary to obtain an absolute majority of the electors.

10234. The card is available a second time, is it not?—Yes, it is clipped on the other corner at the second election.

10235. And that is why it is retained by the voter?—Yes, but it need not be retained, because he can get a fresh one.

10236. Sir George Grey.] Does any part of the expense incurred by the candidates, either in France or America, consist of entertainment given to voters, drinking-houses being kept open?—I never heard of such a case in either country, neither in France nor America.

10237. Is there not much drinking going on at the time of the election; on the polling day, for instance?—In France, certainly in Paris, and certainly in Toulon there is nothing of the kind; in America there is a good deal of drinking, but it is the drinking of the people themselves; they pay for their own drinks.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Bart., M.P.

25 June 1869.

10238. Are the elections conducted in a peaceable and quiet way, and is there much crowding about the polling booths?—In a very quiet way in both countries, but there is a very considerable crowd about the polling booths, but it is a quiet crowd, it goes there to watch. There are a large number of persons in France who attend an election in order to see that nothing goes wrong, to watch the boxes, and so on.

10245. Sir George Grey.] Are any military employed in connection with those elections in any way?—In America, of course not; there are no soldiers in the towns in America; but in France the election is entirely watched, as it were, at a distance, and guarded by the Garde Nationale, who are, by the theory of the French Constitution, the people themselves armed. The troops are commonly confined within barracks on the day of the polling.

10246. Have you ever known an instance in which the military have been called in to suppress any disturbance at an election?—I have never heard of such a case in France.

10247. Chairman.] Have the soldiers votes?—Soldiers have not votes when they are living in barracks; but if they are home upon leave they have. That, I believe, is the state of the French law upon the subject. I believe that the law is that they have votes, but that the commanding officers are allowed to prevent their voting if they are actually in barracks. Gend'armes have votes, 10248. Mr. Leatham.] Do you know whether in any of the Northern States of America a system of registration has been introduced?—I cannot say. I believe that it has been introduced since the war in almost all the States, but before the war it did not exist in the Southern States.

10249. But did it exist in any of the Northern States before the war?—I think there were some where it did not. I think it existed in all the New England and North-Western States.

10250. Chairman.] The Committee have had described to them the voting systems of South Australia and Victoria; have you also seen those of New South Wales and Tasmania?—Yes; I have seen an election in Tasmania, and I know the system in New South Wales. Perhaps it will be most convenient for the Committee that I should state certain points of difference, rather than go through the whole story.

10251. Do they differ in any essential respects?—Very slightly. The two groups of the Australian systems are South Australia on the one side, and the three other old colonies on the other. Tasmania and New South Wales very closely resemble Victoria. One point of difference between the various systems in Australia is, with regard to the mark upon the voting paper. The Committee know that in all the Australian systems the paper bears the name of all the candidates; but in South Australia the voter puts a mark against the names of those whom he votes for; whereas in the whole of the other colonies he scratches out the names of those whom he votes against. The latter system is simpler, and was preferred at Manchester. I may state, in reference to that, that at Manchester, where a third of the voters are a very ignorant class indeed; I believe only 12 or 13 papers were bad votes. It is possible that some of the people may have voted improperly, without knowing for whom they were voting; that is possible, but there were only 12 votes that were lost from the blotting, or from the non-scratching out of the names, or from the scratch being between the two names.

10252. Mr. Hunt.] How many voted out of those who might have voted?—I think between one-half and two-thirds.

10254. Sir George Grey.] Did the upper class of the inhabitants of Manchester generally take a part in that ballot?—No, it was almost entirely confined to what may be called the lower class.

10255. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What was the proportion of those who voted?—Between one-half and two-thirds of those who were allowed to vote on that particular occasion.

10256. Chairman.] Do not those Australian systems systems differ upon the point of the paper being deposited by the voter, or by the returning officer?—They do differ upon that point. In South Australia the voter, as in France, hands the paper to the deputy returning officer, who puts it in; in all the other colonies the voter puts it in himself. If my opinion were asked, I would prefer the French system as a check to putting in more papers than one.

10257. Sir George Grey.] As to its operation upon the secrecy of the ballot, which do you prefer?—I think it has no operation upon the secrecy whatever, provided there be a clause in the Act directing that it shall be the duty of the deputy returning officer that if he shall see the name within the ballot himself, by the way in which it is folded, or if he shall observe anyone else in the room that saw it, he shall destroy that paper.

10259. Chairman.] Is there any other distinction between the systems which you wish to mention?—I would wish to say a word or two upon what has been called to the Committee, and what is always known in Australia as the Tasmanian Dodge. The Committee are well aware what that is. A gentleman who wrote a letter to "The Times" after the Manchester ballot, and who was in the room on a late occasion, but whom I do not see in the room now, Mr. Foster Fitzgerald, stated in that letter, which he has allowed me to say is his, that no watermarks or initials could prevent the Tasmanian Dodge, as all the voting papers are genuine except the first; but that is not the fact, at all events in my opinion. There are two ways of preventing the Tasmanian Dodge; one is by watching the voter to see that he does not put his hand in his pocket and pull out a paper from his pocket, which might be done without seeing for whom he votes, and which we managed to see perfectly at Manchester; we could tell in the case of every voter whether he put his hand in his pocket or not, and we could have arrested him if he had done so; but the other plan, which I much prefer to the former, would be the deputy returning officer initialling each paper in the corner. And an additional check may be provided by a seal upon the back, or any mark of that kind upon the back of the paper; these seals or marks being changed upon several occasions during the day, say, being changed every quarter of an hour. A combination of those plans would work thus, that a voter on coming up and handing his voting paper to the deputy returning officer would, when passing it before him, allow of this, that the officer would recognise both the seal and his own initial before he dropped it into the box. I think I may say, although, of course, the Committee will know it as well as I do, that it has been found in auditing accounts that persons recognise their own initials with very great facility. Initials are a thing which it is extremely difficult to forge upon the moment.

10261. Is it necessary for every person who goes into the room that he should deliver his vote?—Yes; if not he must be called upon to account for the paper; he must not be allowed to pass out until he has delivered it.

10264. If you admit the voters into the room how do you ensure that each voter should vote?—Because the policeman at the bar would not let him pass out until he had done so. The policeman standing at the bar, or at the box, the voter would hand his ticket to the deputy returning officer standing behind the bar at a table. The table at which he stands and upon which the box is, is, in fact, a continuation of the bar, and I would not let the voter out until he had in some way accounted for his paper. Even if he had torn it up he must show the pieces. Of course the burden of the proof would be upon him to show what he had done with it.

10265. Mr. Bright.] He should not take it out?—No, certainly not.

10266. Chairman.] Would not the system of putting consecutive numbers on the voting papers check the Tasmanian Dodge?—Yes; only that that would seem to require one of two things; either that the voting should be very slow, or that the polling districts should be very numerous. If nobody cared about that, if on the one hand the expense of numerous polling districts were not minded, or on the other hand slowness of voting, which comes to the same thing, of course that would prevent it, but it would require a system of queue voting, which of itself is certainly a slow thing unless the district be very small.

10267. Mr. Cross.] Then you would know, would you not, what the name of each man was who voted?—I do not see why you necessarily should know. The numbers would be merely consecutive on the papers, and you would see that you had got the consecutive numbers. By remembering the numbers of course you would.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Bart., M.P.

25 June 1869.

10268. Mr. Hunt.] This supposes the returning officer to wish to prevent the Dodge?—Yes.

10269. But it might be that the returning officer might not?—That might be so; but I think that you must in any system of voting, whether secret or open, repose a great deal of confidence in the person who is at the head of each polling booth. Of course, we repose a great deal of confidence in that person in this country at this moment.

10270. But all his acts now, when everything is done openly, are liable to be challenged?—Yes; but I think that he could hardly allow his initials to pass without its being notorious that he did so. You see that he would have no object unless he did it in confederacy with some other people, and your returning officer must be a man of character to prevent this confederacy.

10271. Sir George Grey.] The scrutineers would check any practice of that kind, would they not?—No, they could not check that particular thing without certain loss of time, because the initials would have to be shown to them as well; but the man knowing his own initials would not be so slow about it. A man knows his own, but not other people's.

10272. Chairman.] Do you know whether an attempt has been made to stop the practice called the Tasmanian Dodge, in Tasmania?—I may state that a man was sentenced to a long term of imprisonment for having been concerned in it.

10273. Have they altered their form of voting?—They have adopted the plan of the water-mark of the paper which does not prevent that dodge at all; but they altered that at the same time that they introduced the plan of seals. They were talking, when I was there, of introducing the plan of initialling; but only talking of it; they had not actually done it. I think they probably have done it by this time; but they have introduced the plan of seals, occasionally changed. I may state that the great difficulty at any time of working the Tasmanian Dodge, coupled or not coupled with the institution of those seals, was supposed to have entirely checked it, and that it was only known to have been practised at one election.

10274. It would, under any circumstance, be very difficult to keep up, without detection, for any length of time, would it not?—Very difficult.

10275. As I understand it, in each case the voter must use a ticket, which has been given to him previously, and bring out his own ticket with him?—Yes. The first voter must put in a blank paper, or what is practically a blank paper.

10277. Mr. Hunt.] Any person who could cheat at cards, I suppose, could cheat at that?—Yes; as far as that first action goes it is difficult, but not very difficult. I should like to state in addition that I should be sorry, if any difficulty were found in working the initial plan which I have suggested, that it should be supposed that that were the only plan of preventing the dodge, because there are many seals or stamps which cannot be manufactured in less than a week; and if the seal were kept a secret in the hands of one person until the morning of the election, and then used, it would be impossible to imitate that seal during the day, and that seal would be a thing easily recognised. I merely suggest initials as one of the many courses of the same kind. I may say in this as in many things, even although it were conceivably possible that the one bad vote might pass, still, if it were known that the precautions against its passing, and the penalty on its being detected were very large, it would deter people from even attempting it.

10278. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion about those different modes of voting as affecting the case of blind or ignorant voters?—Yes, I have. I may state that with regard to the ignorant voters, or voters who cannot read the plan adopted in Victoria is, that the deputy returning officer is sworn to secrecy, and directed, in the case of a voter stating that he cannot read, to ask the voter how he votes, and to strike out as that voter directs him. On the other hand, in South Australia, there is no provision for the case of voters who cannot read. At Manchester colours were adopted. The colours I do not like myself even in the case where there are only two candidates; but obviously in the case where there are four or five candidates, and still more in the case where, as in the City of London, there were seven on the late occasion, the practice of colours could not be worked. And therefore I would prefer as a choice of evils the Victoria plan of swearing the deputy returning officer to secrecy, and directing him to strike out as the voter, not being able to read, should state to him; and I would provide that if that statement were made so loud as to be overheard by the assessors, the vote should be rejected.

10279. In Victoria does the returning officer go into the recess with the voter?—Yes; the returning officer has also a deputy in each booth, and the deputy returning officer has himself a deputy in each booth; there are two of them, and he generally sends his colleague into the place where the voter ought to strike out the name.

10280. Have you anything to add as to the effect of those different systems with regard to secrecy?—I may just add that there is one good point in favour of the French plan, that of course there the difficulty of the voter who cannot read does not occur, because any one in whose secrecy the voter has confidence, and chosen by himself, can give him the bulletin.

10281. As to scrutiny, have you any opinion to offer?—I wish to give an opinion as to scrutiny. I will first state the various colonial rules.

10282. Sir George Grey.] You did not state whether a scrutiny takes place in France?—I stated that the votes were burnt at the close of the election. I would add that in Victoria and in all the colonies, I believe the voting papers are kept, not by the chief secretary, as Mr. Verdon stated, but by the clerk of the house, or by the speaker of the house. In New South Wales (and I have that statement from Sir Daniel Cooper, the late speaker,) they are kept by the speaker, and are kept for ever. In Tasmania they are kept for five years, in Victoria for two years, and in South Australia not at all, the same as is the case in France, where they are not kept at all, but are destroyed immediately on the the conclusion of the election. That is the practice. For my own part, I am of opinion that with due means of detecting personation, by the smallness of the district and by the presence of proper representatives, a scrutiny is wholly unnecessary. In this country we have a practice of punishing personation upon evidence which shows that a bad vote has actually been given; but it is obviously not necessary to wait for the vote having been given. The attempt to personate would really be complete when the voter had said that he was such-and-such a person, and it is not necessary to wait until he has actually cast the vote. With proper security against personation in that way, I doubt whether it is necessary to keep the papers. It obviates many difficulties which have been raised against the secrecy of the ballot if they be not kept.

10283. Mr. Villiers.] What is the reason assigned for keeping the papers?—In order that an election petition may be possible.

10284. With what view would a petition or an inquiry be instituted, if the votes were secret?—Aliens, for instance, having voted, or people who were dead having been personated, or where persons are aware of having been personated.

10285. But that could not be proved by secret voting; you do not identify the paper with the man who put it into the urn?—In some colonies they have instituted the system of numbering on purpose to be able to do it; in Victoria, for instance.

10286. Sir George Grey.] The number on the paper corresponding with the number on the register?—Yes.

10287. Mr. Bright.] Therefore, if it was discovered that at an election 20 persons had been bribed, you could have recourse to the voting papers in the urn to ascertain whether those 20 persons had voted for the sitting Member, and if they had, you could unseat the Member?—That is the object of it; but it would only be even so far as that necessary where the election was close enough to make a scrutiny worth having, because of course, as far as the punishment goes for bribery or personation, it is not necessary that the voter should have voted for the person who bribed him.

10288. For the purpose of unseating a Member for bribery you would require to show not only that certain persons had been bribed, but that they had been bribed to vote for him and had voted for him?—Certainly.

10289. Mr. Villiers.] I take it that it would be sufficient to prove that a certain number of persons had voted who had been bribed?—Yes, in order to have a scrutiny. I may state to the Committee the French practice, which is a pretty good one; they have no scrutiny, no scrutiny is possible, but in a case where general bribery is shown by a sort of primâ facie evidence alleged in the petition to have existed, which is a case, I believe, which has never occurred, but which is provided for by law, in that case the Committee pour Verification des Pouvoirs, or the Elections Committee would take the case into consideration, and would consider whether the election had been voided by the amount of bribery which had been prevalent; and if so, they would recommend that a fresh writ should be issued, and the whole election voided; a scrutiny is impossible, but that is possible, just as an election is voided here in law by a general riot.

10290. You say that you cannot identify afterwards certain pieces of paper, with the persons who put them in the box?—As a fact, you can in Victoria; but I think it is unadvisable that it should be so; I would have no scrutiny myself.

10291. The O'Conor Don.] Do you know whether there is a scrutiny in America at all?—I think not, from what I heard; I am not certain.

10292. Are you not aware that they unseated their representatives for New York?—Yes, but I believe it was on the ground of the general bribery which I stated just now; however, I am not certain of that.

10293. Mr. Villiers.] Have you ever known an instance where voters were deterred from voting, that is, induced not to vote for a corrupt purpose, where you have been observing the secret vote in operation?—I have not heard of that being the case, but obviously of course it might be the case.

10294. Chairman.] I think you said that you have not seen in operation any system of ball voting?—I have never seen it.

10296. From what you have seen of the paper system, and from the knowledge you have of the ball system, should you be inclined to prefer the one to the other?—If I could decide myself which was to be adopted, I should decidedly prefer the ball system; but I feel very strongly that without there being really the slightest liability to error in the self-registering part of the machinery, it might be said that there was that liability to error. It would be of course a matter for the Committee and for others to consider whether that would be a real danger.

10298. Sir George Grey.] Could you give a general description of the system of ball voting?—A plan which is not worked in any country, but which has been suggested, is this: there is a box in which there are several apertures, all of which, however, lead down into one tunnel, to the bottom of which the ball falls, so that the person at the back has no knowledge whatever for whom a voter has voted, but merely the fact that he has voted, each aperture representing a candidate. You may have as many apertures as you like, but they all lead to one place, and they are all close together, so that you cannot see from the direction of the man's hand for whom he has voted. Then there is a device by a little stop, which absolutely prevents more than one ball being put in for any one candidate. I stated that the ball voting economised time in voting, and that it economised time in counting. It also prevents the Tasmanian Dodge of itself, and it also gets over the difficulty about ignorant voters, and about blind voters, because the voters can be told before they go up to vote what are the positions of the holes into which the ball is to be put for each candidate. I may state, before entirely leaving that branch of the subject, that the question of blind voters occurred at Manchester, and that I was called upon to devise some mode of meeting it at a moment's notice. I cut slits in a card to cover the voting paper, and then informed the voter the order in which the candidates names stood, and he voted successfully.

10299. Mr. Brand.] Would not the ball system that you have described be a costly system of voting?—Those machines certainly would be somewhat costly, but I should say that they would last many years. I cannot estimate what the first cost might be, but I should think, roughly speaking, 10 s. a piece would cover it. It need not be a very delicate machine, and there is an ample system of checks provided by the registering machinery.

10300. I do not think that you have specified the system precisely which you are referring to at this moment?—The one that I have particularly in my mind at this moment was the invention of a very humble man, a shoemaker named Vassie, and it has been worked out by him and his son, who is a watchmaker, and I believe has made the machine.

10301. Mr. Bright.] Many contrivances of that kind have been made, have there not?—Yes, there have been many. I stated that one has been advertised a good deal.

10302. Sir George Grey.] Have you gone through all the facts you wish to state with regard to the Australian mode of voting?—There is only one thing which bears upon the Australian mode in particular. I do not know whether the Committee would like to know it, what would be the general result of the changes which I have proposed as far as the Victoria system is concerned, taking that as a standard; the tendency of what I have been giving as my opinion would be, that supposing ball voting were not adopted, and supposing that one of the paper plans, generally speaking, of the Australian kind were adopted, if the Victoria system were taken as the standard three changes would be proposed by me; first, that the deputy returning officer should recognise his initial on the back of the card, and should himself put it into the box; secondly, that if the voter allowed the inside of his paper to be seen his vote should be lost; and thirdly, that, as in South Australia, there should be no scrutiny.

10304. Are you aware whether there is any provision, if that be the case, to prevent what in England is called fictitious candidatures?—I am not aware of the provisions upon that point. There is a provision in Victoria, as was stated here the other day by Mr. Verdon, but its exact character I have not in my mind. I believe that there is a provision in each of the colonies to that effect.

10305. I suppose the expense of conducting an election is very small?—In Victoria, what you would call the necessary expenses are very small. I may state, with regard to the ballot, that it is so advisable as to be almost necessary that the ballot should be conducted in rooms; and those rooms, of course, may be obtained almost everywhere; school-rooms can always be borrowed for the purpose.

10306. Then one of the incidental advantages which you attribute to the ballot would be the great diminution which it would cause in election expenses?—That is purely incidental; but it would be so.

10307. Mr. Locke.] Have you yourself seen the French mode of voting?—Yes; and I have explained it to the Committee.

10309. Is it not the system in France that before a man can vote by ballot, it is necessary for him to obtain a ticket from the mairie?—Yes, I put in the polling carte, which he must obtain.

10310. Chairman.] Have you any further suggestion to make to the Committee?—I would like to say one or two words with regard to afternoon bribery under the ballot. I have a strong impression, being a strong partisan of the ballot, that it is a pity that certain advantages should be ascribed to the ballot which it does not possess, as contrasted with other modes of voting. It has been largely stated that the ballot would stop afternoon bribery, and that also it would stop all bribery. I would call the attention of the Committee to the fact that afternoon bribery, so far as it depends upon the knowledge of the state of the poll, might perfectly be checked without the ballot, I think it is advisable that that should be at all events borne in mind.

10311. Mr. Leatham.] How would you effect that?—I have often stated that one of the incidental results of the carrying of the Bill which was before the House of Commons this year, the Election Expenses Bill, would have been, although I believe it was not known to the authors of that Bill, to have prevented the state of the poll being known. The knowledge of the state of the poll depends upon the institution of check clerks, which persons are appointed by the candidates or the committees, and they are people, as the Committee knows, who do the poll clerks' work over again, the poll clerk being the official person, and the check clerk the candidate's person. There is no authority in the poll clerks or in the deputy returning officer in charge of the booth to make the state of the poll known, or to let the poll sheets be seen, or his certificate of them, and it would be improper conduct on his part if he did so; therefore the knowledge of the state of the poll depends entirely upon the check clerks, and upon the candidate's representatives. Now, there is no provision in any Act of Parliament which which recognises their existence, and it is only by the candidate's paying the expenses, and consequently agreeing, as it were, either tacitly or not, among themselves to have such persons, and to have booths big enough to contain such persons, that they are allowed to be there; and if the expenses of the election had been thrown upon the rates, the parishes, having no interest in increasing, but having an interest in decreasing those expenses, would undoubtedly have made the booths of the size provided by Act of Parliament, and would consequently have excluded the check clerks.

10313. Mr. Cross.] He might put down when they came up to vote who they voted for, might he not?—If he could see all the compartments of the booth at once he might, but as only one is recognised at each booth, and as the number of compartments in this country commonly varies from one to 12, it is impossible, when people are voting at all quickly, that he should see them all, because he can only watch one at a time.

10315. But whether they are known to the law or not, the law would not forbid them?—I might say that if a parish built a booth with no room for check clerks, that parish would be supported in so doing by a court of law. Of course that is merely a matter of opinion.

10316. Sir George Grey.] Will you proceed with what you were going on to state as to what effect the ballot would have upon afternoon bribery?—I was merely going to state that it is perfectly possible without the ballot, in my opinion, to exactly meet the case, because it is possible by concealing the state of the poll to prevent afternoon bribery without the ballot. The other point is, that in small boroughs, if small boroughs are to be preserved with the corruption which has grown up in some of them, of course the ballot would not prevent bribery in the form of gifts conditional on a man's return, which of course is the most certain kind of bribery that there is, and it is only the stupidity of bribers which prevents their resorting to it under the present law. The form of bribery which prevails now is a stupid form of bribery, namely, giving a man 10 l. to go and vote for a particular individual, because he may go and vote for somebody else, or he may take bribes from both sides. But a candidate saying, "If I am returned I will give you 10 l.," gives the voter a distinct interest in performing his implied promise. It is the best form of bribery, and if bribers were not stupid, it is in that form that they would bribe now; and the whole of that would remain untouched by the ballot, because whether a man's vote were secret or not, it would still be his interest to vote for the candidate who would pay him if returned.

10318. I think that never used to be the case in the former state of things?—That has come out before Election Committees on the present occasion.

10320. Chairman.] Certain questions have been asked by Members of this Committee with the view of showing that that sort of bribery to which you have referred, a conditional promise of payment, would be increased by the ballot; is it your opinion that that would so?—It would be increased compared with other forms of bribery, because it would then become nearly the only form possible, and therefore unless bribery is to cease altogether it would probably be increased; all bribery that was committed would take that shape.

10322. Mr. Bright.] You, I believe, have a very strong opinion against small constituencies?—Very strong indeed.

10323. Then the size of the constituency should be taken into consideration with regard to the very strong opinion which you hold?—That colours my evidence upon that point undoubtedly.

10324. Even with the smaller constituencies, there would remain some uncertainty which, with open voting, does not remain, would there not; that is to say, corrupt contracts might be made with both sides somewhat more easily than at present?—Yes; I think that would be the case.

10325. And if that were the case, it would so far tend to prevent any contract at all?—Yes, that would be the case; and also, of course, the intimidation which exists in many small boroughs would be prevented.

10326. Mr. Cross.] You say that by the system of open voting the poll need not be made public; I presume you mean in this sort of way, that even if you allowed check clerks, provided that there should be the mayor or sheriff's poll clerk, and the two check clerks were allowed so far from the parties who are there seated to prevent personations that they could not see how a man voted, that would do it perfectly?—You might easily forbid the representatives to send off sheets during the day.

10327. You might place them in such a position that it would be impossible for them to know how a man voted?—Yes, it would be perfectly possible; but it would be sufficient to forbid that.

10328. It is perfectly practicable, is it not, to ensure that the poll shall not be known till it is closed under the system of open voting?—Yes, perfectly.

Sir C. W. Dilke, Bart., M.P.

25 June 1869.

10329. Sir George Grey.] Would not you then exclude every other person except those officially employed, and the check clerks from the polling-booths?—You do that now in all places where the election law is properly carried out. The practice may not be observed in all boroughs; but it is strictly observed in London where a large number of persons crowded round the booths. The candidates even are not allowed to enter the polling-booths unless they enter as authorised persons to take the place of their own representatives. That was carried out very strictly in London at the last election.

10330. Mr. Cross.] In fact, in the actual place where the men voted, if you confined it to the mayor's clerk and the representatives of each party, and did not allow the public to come in and see how they voted, it is perfectly clear that you would be able to keep the poll secret?—Yes; I am perfectly aware that in many boroughs the interior of the booth is not preserved in that way, but it was so in London; certainly it was so in my own borough at the last election.

10331. Mr. Locke.] What part of the interior do you speak of?—I am speaking only of the interior of the booth immediately behind the check clerks.

10332. But anybody may stand behind the voters?—Yes, certainly; but that is not the interior of the booth.

10333. Still it is all under the same cover?—Yes, certainly; and they would be able to estimate how the voting was going on; but if they were excluded it would be merely a general impression, they would not know perfectly; but you might keep them out certainly; even now, when there is any fear of a riot, the police do commonly keep them off.

Mr. Arthur Arnold, called in; and Examined

10334. Mr. Villiers.] I believe you have given some attention to the proceedings at public elections?—Yes.

10335. Have you had an opportunity of observing the mode in which they are conducted in foreign countries, or in any particular country?—In Greece last year I had an opportunity.

10336. Were you there when there was an election?—I was there for some months during which there occurred an election.

10337. Did you give particular attention while there to the mode in which the election was conducted?—I did.

10338. How are the votes taken there?—By a ball ballot.

10339. Did you examine the system particularly yourself?—Very closely indeed.

10340. Will you just describe to the Committee the mode in which the vote is given, and what is the machine for making it secret?—At each of the polling places, which are always public buildings, each candidate has a ballot-box with his name above it. The ballot-boxes are precisely similar in form to those used at the clubs in the West End, with this exception, that projecting from the hole into which the hand is placed, there is a funnel long enough to conceal the arm to the elbow. Upon the voter coming into the polling place (and by the way the churches are generally the polling places in Greece), he advances to a table, and there his claim to vote having been verified, a clerk attends him with a small wooden bowl containing so many small balls (they were bullets in this case) as there were candidates, and in front of each ballot-box offers him a bullet, pronouncing at the same time the name of the candidates. The ballot-boxes are arranged immediately behind the table, at which the voter is identified. They are coloured one half black, and the other white; the black half bearing "No" upon it, and the white half bearing "Yes." Upon the ball being given to the voter, he puts his arm up the funnel concealed to the elbow, and gives his vote to the right or left, as he wishes "No" or "Yes" for the candidate.

10341. Is that explained to him by any person standing near?—The clerk in attendance pronounces the name of the candidate, and gives him at the same time one bullet.

10342. How does he indicate to him what precisely he is to do?—If the man cannot read, he would say, "That is the 'No' side, and that is the 'Yes' side of the ballot-box."

10343. Does he only take one ball and put it into this funnel?—He has one ball given to him and he puts his hand into the funnel, and deposits it to the right or to the left, as he wishes to vote for or against the candidate.

10344. That is precisely the way in which they vote at a club, with this difference, that the arm is inserted up the funnel as far as the elbow?—Precisely.

10345. So that no person could judge which way he put the ball in from the motion of his arm?—It is so. I believe that this scheme was imported from England; it was first used in Corfu, and subsequently all over the kingdom of Greece.

10346. How many members are there in the Chamber?—One hundred and eighty.

10347. Do they choose them altogether when there is an election?—I was present at a general election when they were all chosen.

10348. But it is not a portion of the chamber, some having gone out, but a fresh house elected?—It was the entire chamber that was chosen on that occasion.

10349. Was Athens one of the places where they voted?—Greece is divided into electoral eparchies, returning one membor for each 10,000 inhabitants; the district of Attica, in which Athens is included, returns five members in respect of 50,000 population.

10350. And you saw the election for five members?—Yes.

10351. Did each person take five balls in his hand when going to vote in five boxes?—For the five vacant seats there were 30 candidates, and therefore there were 30 ballot boxes arranged behind the table at which the claim to vote was verified; out of those 30 candidates five were to be chosen for the vacant seats.

10352. Then the voter is apprised of the names of the candidates, and is left to act independently when he has got the 30 boxes before him?—In precisely the same manner as at the Reform Club

Club, the name of each candidate being inscribed above each box.

10353. Did you observe any confusion arising from the ignorance of the voter, or his not knowing precisely what he was to do?—There were some voters who, from their manner, I should judge could not read the name of the candidate, but it was loudly pronounced to them by the attendant, and a watchful scrutiny over the election is observed by a friend of each candidate at each polling place, accepted by and answerable to the authorities.

10354. Is he allowed, if he sees a man in a difficulty to know which was the box of the candidate for whom he intended to vote, to point it out to him?—No observation is permitted in the polling-place by anyone except the appointed officer, but the friends of the candidates most jealously watch the countenance and the intentions, if they can infer them, of every voter, but they are not allowed to make any observation whatever.

10355. I understand from this system that there is no kind of writing on the part of the voter, or reading anything put into his hands?—Nothing whatever; the most illiterate man could perform it in the most satisfactory manner.

10356. Then it is the simplest form in which a vote can be taken by ballot?—The simplest form possible.

10357. Mr. Bright.] If there were 30 candidates, were there 30 of those boxes with funnels?—Yes.

10358. If a voter comes in, and he is only going to vote for six, or any smaller number, does he go and deposit a ball in each of the 30?—Every voter votes for or against every candidate, so that the attendant clerk, whom I have described as bearing the wooden bowl with a ball in it for each candidate, has always at first the same number of bullets in his bowl. He started on that occasion with 30 for each voter, and followed him round the ballot-boxes, which were arranged on a table, pronouncing the name of a candidate at each one of the boxes.

10359. Then he puts his hand in the funnel and votes for or against?—Yes, with the great advantage that the votes given for and against in each ballot-box must balance.

10360. He might put in a ball in favour of each of the candidates of the 30 might he not?—Probably such mistakes have occurred on the part of very illiterate persons, but there is no want of confidence felt in the system of election on that account, because it is as fair for one as for another candidate.

10361. Mr. Cross.] Has each voter a ball put into his hand as he comes opposite the ballot-box?—Yes.

10362. Mr. Villiers.] And he ought to vote against 25 and for five if that was the number to be selected?—Precisely.

10363. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Is there no distinction between the balls; are the affirmative and the negative balls of exactly the same character?—Yes; and in preparation for the election I believe the Government of Greece had 2,000,000 small bullets cast.

10364. Mr. Cross.] Are those ordinary leaden bullets?—Common leaden bullets.

10365. What security is there against a man taking bullets of his own and putting in half a dozen?—The very sharp eyes of the candidates' friends.

10367. Supposing he puts in six in each ballot-box instead of one?—He must be an excessively clever man who could carry 180 bullets up his sleeve; to deliver six bullets at each of the 30 ballot-boxes, I think it would be impossible.

10368. Mr. Villiers.] By this system nobody can know how he votes, no friend of his can be certain how he will vote?—Absolutely impossible.

10369. What did you observe with respect to the security taken that there should be no foul play afterwards by the persons examining the contents of the boxes?—The boxes are carefully watched by appointed friends of the candidates, and after the election has terminated the bullets are counted in their presence.

10371. This being all done in the presence of the friends of the candidates, there cannot be any fraud practised?—Independently of that, the total number in each box should be the same, and that renders fraud excessively difficult.

10372. Do you know anything about the practice before they adopted the ballot, or have they always had it?—I am not aware of the previous practice.

10373. Did you observe anything of the state of Athens itself during the election?—The order of the city was surprising; there was not the slightest appearance of commotion, not the slightest interruption to the business of the city, and I may be permitted to say, that political excitement there runs to a height quite unknown in England.

10374. They are very excitable; do they take a deep interest in politics?—I have been some time in Ireland, and I should say that the Greeks are more excitable than any people in the United Kingdom, and take a far greater interest, down to the lowest of the population, in all political questions.

10375. In point of fact, they are at times aroused to acts of violence more readily than other people?—Yes; in 1863 there was fighting in the streets; many persons were killed in the then state of excitement upon political questions.

10376. But, owing to the system of taking the vote by ballot, just at a critical moment of an election, they are most quiet and peaceable?—Yes; and, in my opinion, entirely owing to that system of taking the ballot, because although the questions at issue in Greece at that time were the most exciting that could possibly arouse the feeling of the nation, there was perfect calm and quiet in the streets.

10377. But there is not, I believe, the most perfect purity prevailing in general upon the subject of the elections?—Certainly not; but the faults that are so very plainly observable in the political system of Greece are, in my judgment, ment, testimonies to the excellence of this system of voting.

10378. Owing to the peculiar character at present of the people?—Owing to the excitable character of the people, to the rapacity of some of the politicians, and to the excessive warmth with which they press their interests.

10379. Are the members paid?—About 70*l.* a year.

10380. When they get into the Chamber, do they profit by it in any way, by patronage, for instance?—So it is said.

10381. And by occupying places in the Government?—The offices in the Government are salaried.

10382. But there is a great desire, is there not, to obtain places in the Government?—Quite so, for the emoluments that are legitimately obtained.

10383. And, therefore, the contests are very eager?—Excessively so.

10384. But is it the ordinary proportion of candidates, where there are five to be elected, that 30 men appear?—I think that in excess of the average.

10385. Did you speak then merely of the district of Attica, or were you speaking of the whole country?—With regard to the 30 candidates, I was speaking of the district of Attica.

10386. Did you observe, or did you hear, of any mischief that followed upon this system?—No mischief could follow from the system, but I heard of excesses having been committed in some parts of the country, which arise solely from the disordered condition of Greece, and would be quite impossible in a State where the predominance of law was asserted in every part of the country.

10387. Therefore, in those respects, they were at a disadvantage, which would not apply to a country like this?—Certainly. The only cases to which I can refer of the ball ballot having been tampered with in Greece, are such as this; a man may keep voters from the ballot with a band of brigands, but such a barefaced act would, of course, be quite impossible in any better ordered country than Greece.

10388. Have you ever had any opportunity of observing the card ballot in operation?—No.

10390. Do you know anything about the system at New York?—Yes. But it seems to me, that no one will have confidence where they have to use pen and ink, and that secrecy cannot be secured where the use of pen and ink is necessary.

10391. Do you mean that it could not be secured, or that people would still be suspicious of it?—That people will still be suspicious of it, and that it could not be in fact secured.

10392. In this case, with the ball ballot, you think it not only would be safe, but nobody would suspect it, and people would have the greatest confidence in its being secret?—Certainly.

10393. Was there much canvassing in Greece at the time of the election?—There were no placards in the streets, but I believe there was solicitation.

10394. They were not afraid of canvassing, because the vote was secret?—Not the least.

10395. A person did not give up all hope of securing a voter because his vote would be given in secret?—It was impossible for him to discover how the vote was given.

10396. But still he puts himself forward and solicits the votes, as far as he can, by proclaiming his opinions and prepossessing the voters?—Yes.

10397. Do they seem to be very intelligent people?—Very highly so.

10398. Although you have been speaking of people who could neither read nor write, still you believe that they are people of great intelligence?—Very great natural intelligence.

10399. And you think that it would be rather difficult to practice any fraud upon those occasions with such people?—Very dangerous.

10400. Did you attend the chamber after it was elected?—No.

10401. Do you know what class of persons are generally chosen?—The majority are landed proprietors, with a few soldiers, and one or two journalists.

10402. But there was nothing in the condition of the people so chosen that would lead you to suppose that their choice was worse in consequence of the ballot?—By no means.

10403. Did persons of great literary acquirements, or persons of learning, put themselves forward as candidates?—There were two professors, I think, candidates at Athens; but at Athens, as there are 40 ex-ministers, they generally compose the candidature, and as the cabinet only contains eight, the process is rather warm.

10404. Did you happen to hear what was the average duration of governments there?—There have been 16 since King George's accession; therefore I should imagine it was exceedingly brief.

10405. I suppose that gives every man a chance?—I presume so.

10406. Are they looked upon with respect by the public?—I think the influence of the chamber is very useful.

10407. Do you think that it fairly represents the public?—Yes, very fairly.

10408. Has there been any canvassing allowed, or any nomination of candidates at Athens?—The system of nomination, so far as I understand it, is one to which I should particularly like to draw the attention of the Committee; for I think it most admirable and available in better regulated communities. The candidature is arranged by a compulsory requisition; and each person, in order to qualify himself to become a candidate at the ballot, has to present to an official, answering to our returning officer, a requisition signed by a limited proportion of the electors of the particular district, say, where there was one seat vacant, the requisition should be signed by 1-20th part of the electoral body; that requisition qualifies the person receiving it to become a candidate at the ballot, and without it he would not be admitted to the ballot.

10409. Then he is a candidate, and there is no further nomination?—No further nomination.

10410. What steps does he take to declare himself as a candidate; does he make it known in any public address, or by any other public means?—He may use any means, within the law, he pleases to make his desire to be a candidate known to the electors, by the publication of addresses, by speeches, or by personal solicitation.

10411. But that is the form of nomination there, which corresponds with what takes place here, where a man is formally proposed at the hustings?—It answers precisely to our system of nomination election at the hustings prior to the poll.

10412. Without any riot, disturbance, or expense?—Yes; without either.

10413. Sir George Grey.] Do those 1-20th electors sign their names to the requisition?—They must sign their names, and the requisition with their names attached would be made public and posted.

10414. Then it is no secret as to how those 1-20th will vote afterwards?—Not the slightest.

10415. Mr. Villiers.] That is if they vote as they profess to do?—Yes.

10417. Would you have the same number of electors for every constituency?—I would propose here that in place of our present system of nomination and election at the hustings, there should be substituted a compulsory requisition, to be presented to the returning officer as a qualification for the candidate to proceed to the poll; then if the number of requisitions presented only equalled the number of seats vacant, there would be no ballot.

10418. But what proportion of the constituents would you fix upon as proper to sign the requisition?—I think in respect of one seat 1-20th portion of the electors would be a fair amount; 1-40th in a constituency returning two members; and so on.

10422. Have you heard of such things as this having occurred in this country, that a man will put forward his address, and give notice to the returning officer that he intends to contest the seat, and put the sitting Member to enormous expense in retaining agents, and constructing polling places, and then that he will either retire, or satisfy himself with making a speech?—I have heard of such things as that.

10423. You consider that that is a great abuse?—Yes.

10424. And it is open, is it not, to this further abuse, that a man would say that he would do it if he did not receive a sum of money?—Yes.

10425. You think the plan which you now suggest would entirely preclude that?—Yes; I think so.

10426. Sir George Grey.] Would not it also involve this, that 1-20th portion of a constituency like Liverpool would have to affix their names to a requisition, which would be tantamount to open voting, and would, as to them, entirely supersede the secret ballot?—I do not think so; but I did not intend to say that the number of voters signing the requisition in Greece was 1-20th part of the constituency.

10427. You recommended, as I understood, that 1-20th of the existing constituency should sign a requisition to qualify a man to be elected?—The number signing the requisition might be determined, of course, subject to what was thought the best number, but whatever figure was fixed upon it would limit the number of possible candidates.

10429. Mr. Villiers.] Have you any suggestion to make as to the adoption of the ballot in this country from anything that you have seen or heard?—I wish to observe, with reference to the machine for ball voting, which I think Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke spoke of, that I have also myself inspected that machine, invented by a very intelligent man, a Mr. Vassie, a shoemaker. I have inspected that machine, and I am of opinion that it is far too complicated, and that no system of ball voting which returns the ball, and does not deposit and retain the ball in respect of each voter, is of any value. That machine appears to me to be constructed on the principle of a gasmeter, and it registers the units, tens, hundreds, thousands, and so on, precisely upon the same principle, and the objection to it appears to me to be that people would have no faith in a complicated, and possibly derangeable, machinery.

10430. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] On the matter of requisitions, on which you have spoken, is there any canvass for signatures to those requisitions in Greece?—I presume there is.

10431. Then persons who might be unwilling to sign the requisition in favour of a particular candidate might be compelled to do so, might they not?—Certainly.

10432. And might afterwards feel unwilling to act a practical lie by voting against their signature?—That would rest with themselves.

10433. Still the compulsion under this system of requistion remains?—The power of compulsion and intimidation to sign the requisition would remain, but as to the proportion, it might be found desirable to adopt a still smaller proportion, which would obviate objection to a very considerable extent.

10434. Is there not a moral compulsion on a man after he had signed a requisition to vote in accordance with his signature?—Yes, I think so.

10435. Then there still exists of course a proportion of requisitionists, and if you diminish that proportion you make it of less value as regards the nomination of the candidate?—The whole whole process of election would be very much simplified by the adoption of the requisition.

10436. I think you say that in Greece the proportion is 1-20th of the total constituency?—I am not aware of the precise figure; possibly as in Athens there were 30 candidates it was 1-30th; it might have been so.

10437. Am I to understand that the requisitionists must be in proportion to the number of candidates?—It must be obvious that the number of candidates could not exceed the number of requisitions. If 1-30th part of the electors must sign the requisition to qualify a man to be a candidate there cannot be more than 30 candidates.

10438. But there might be fewer?—Yes, there might be fewer.

10439. Supposing there to be only 20 candidates, what is the actual number that qualifies a candidate?—I suggested that it should be in respect of one seat 1-20th.

10440. Is that the fact in Greece?—I am not aware of the precise figure.

10441. What is the qualification of a voter?—He must be 20 years of age.

10442. Is there any regulation as to residence or property?—I believe that the candidates and the voters must all be resident in the eparchy, in respect of which they vote.

10443. For how long?—I am not aware of the time.

10444. Is there any property qualification?—None whatever, I believe, except citizenship.

10445. Is there any registration of voters made beforehand?—I saw each voter advance and submit his claim to examination in the books, so I presume there must be.

10446. At the polling-booth before putting the balls in the box he is identified?—Certainly.

10447. Is there any possibility of his vote being subjected to a scrutiny after he has given it?—None, except that the total number of balls in each box should be equal, and therefore if it were found that they were not so upon a scrutiny, the election might be declared void.

10448. Do you mean that if more were found, or less were found than the proper number, the election would be declared void?—It would be quite evident that some voter had not voted in accordance with his duty.

10449. As to particular votes, of course no scrutiny is possible?—None.

10450. Does any corruption prevail in the elections in Greece?—I am not aware of any. As it is absolutely impossible to know how a man has voted, I should presume that there was very little opening for corruption.

10451. Are no corrupt inducements held out to men to sign requisitions?—I am not aware. I do not know. I have not heard of anything of the sort.

10452. Sir George Grey.] Do you know whether there was a general impression that there was corruption at elections, and that bribery did take place?—I heard of cases as so gross as would be impossible to occur in this community; for instance, the one which I have recently mentioned to the Committee, but only of such.

10454. Sir George Grey.] Is there a general impression that elections are pure as between the candidate and the voters, or that recourse is had to corrupt practices?—Undoubtedly; at Missolonghi the candidate was carried in the teeth of opposition, such as was thought insuperable by politicians in Athens, and it was attributed to that system.

10455. Is there an impression in Attica that the electors generally are pure, or that any corrupt practices are had recourse to by the candidates to obtain their election?—The general impression in the country, in my opinion is, that the elections are pure.

10456. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] But the returning officers in the state of society which prevails in Greece, are liable to corruption, are they not?—On the remote island of which I speak, to which access from Athens is impossible under two days, although the distance to be traversed is not as far as from London to Birmingham, it is obviously difficult for the Government to control the actions of their petty officers.

10457. But is not the state of society in Greece generally very corrupt?—I think it is more lawless than corrupt.

10459. Do not you think it possible that under such a state of things, it might be easy for a candidate to corrupt the returning officer in that corrupt constituency?—The returning officer is so closely watched by the friends of the candidates that it would be useless.

10460. In spite of all the natural cleverness of which you have told the Committee, the returning officer would find it impossible you think to avoid observation?—I cannot see how it would be possible for him to falsify the ballot.

10461. Have you known any other instance besides those of which you have spoken?—None.

10462. Mr. James.] What is the largest number of the constituency you have seen vote with this for and against system?—The population was about 50,000, but I am not aware of the number of adult males in the population.

10463. Being manhood suffrage, you would of course have a considerable proportion of electors; did they all vote at one set of ballot-boxes, or were there different receptacles?—In Athens there were four polling places, and a ballot-box for each candidate in each polling place.

10464. Suppose a case where there were only two candidates, as there were in many constituencies in England, if a person went to ballot box A, and chose to put five balls for one candidate, and five against another, the number would correspond?—He would only be offered one ball; and if there were only two candidates, he would only have two balls.

10465. In the case that you put, in Athens, the balls being only ordinary bullets, what is there to prevent a man putting his hand in the funnel, and putting in two in one side of the box?—To affect the election he must put precisely the same number into each of the boxes. If there were two candidates, he would have one ball ball given him for the box of each candidate. Do I understand the honourable Member to suggest, that if he were a conjuror he could carry two balls up each sleeve, and would be able to deposit two balls in each box?

10466. Conjuror or not, a person might put two balls up his sleeve; he might put two in the affirmative for A, and two in the negative for B, which would correspond?—I do not think, from the excessive watchfulness of the candidates, that such a conjuring trick would be possible.

10467. Supposing that were done, and the votes did not correspond, what would happen?—The election might then be declared void.

10469. You are not aware that if any irregularity is found, the whole proceeding is done through again?—I am not aware that that is so, but I think it might be so.

10470. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Is it possible that a large constituency could be polled so as to ensure the result that every one of those balls should be put in the right place?—Yes, of course.

10471. Mr. Villiers.] I suppose that if people were discovered generally to be carrying balls in their sleeve, they might be required to pull up their sleeve before they voted, and to put in their arm without their coat?—I should think so.

10472. Chairman.] The check, as I understand it, is that the total number of the balls in each box must be the same?—Yes.

10474. Do not you think it possible to suggest to people who know a little of legerdemain to get rid of a single bullet?—I think it is more easy to suggest than to carry it out.

10475. Mr. Locke.] Supposing that there are two candidates for one seat, you say you vote for both?—You put a ball into each box, giving a "No" to one, and a "Yes" to the other, if you vote fairly.

10476. Is there any expense attending elections in Greece?—I asked three candidates in Athens what was their expenditure, and they told me that it varied from about 50 l. to a few hundreds in the most extreme extravagant cases.

10477. How many voters were there?—The population was 50,000, but the adult males only vote.

10478. Do the voters live at any distance from the polling place?—In Greece the poll is kept open for four days, owing to the difficulty of access to the polling place; that of course would be quite unnecessary here.

10479. Must they pay their own expenses to come up?—I am not aware.

10480. Do not you know whether the candidates pay the expenses of the elections?—As there is no public means of conveyance, I should imagine that they do not; and there is no convenience of approach by private conveyance.

10481. Mr. Leatham.] A great number of the population of Greece carry arms, do they not?—Yes.

10482. They have no very great hesitation in using them?—According to common report, that is so.

10483. Is it your opinion, therefore, that, if they had not the ballot, in so inflammable a population they probably would have bloodshed at elections?—If the election that I witnessed had been conducted on the English system, I have no question of a doubt there would have been bloodshed in the streets.

10484. Mr. Villiers.] It is peculiarly on politics that they are so exciteable?—Peculiarly; I believe that the number of journals in Athens, where the papers are generally of a peculiarly exciteable character, exceeds the number of daily papers in this metropolis.

10485. Generally speaking, they are commercial in their character?—I think more political; the commerce of Athens is politics.

10486. Sir George Grey.] Is the Government of the day supposed to exercise any influence upon elections?—It seems to me that it cannot, except by opinion.

10487. Are candidates anxious to obtain the support of the Government, with a view to their election?—Not generally, I think.

10488. Sometimes they do?—That depends upon the popularity of the ministry.

10489. But supposing that a minister is popular, and that a candidate stands as a supporter of his Government, does he derive any benefit from the influence of the minister upon his election?—I think he would in that case.

10490. What is the nature of the influence?—The popular feeling against Turkey would be the strongest influence that a candidate could have.

10491. But have the Government no power of exercising any other influence, in your opinion, upon the election?—None whatever.

10493. Although he has only got to elect 10, and ought only to give 10 affirmative votes, why should he not give 20 to all the candidates of the Government?—If I understand you to mean that he should give 30 affirmative votes, that would of course neutralise it altogether.

10494. Say there are 10 to be elected, and there are 20 Conservative candidates and 10 Liberals, he says, "I will give 20 Conservative votes, although I ought only to give 10;" and he goes into the ballot room, and he gives 20 Conservative votes affirmatively, and 10 Liberal votes negatively; he does not care which of the 20 Conservatives are elected, so that some Conservatives are elected, and if he puts 20 balls for the Conservatives, and each elector does the same, he must get all the Conservatives elected?—But, if I understand you, you seem to intend to limit the action of the voter; it is left entirely with him; such an election would be perfectly fair.

10495. Being left with him, what is there to prevent every voter from voting for the whole of the 20 Conservative candidates on the one side, and voting against the 10 Liberals?—Nothing, I should presume.

10497. Sir George Grey.] What security is there

there in this system against the voter voting for more candidates than there are vacancies?—None whatever, except the intelligence of the voter.

10498. Mr. James.] And the purity of intention?—I presume that that is included in intelligence.

10499. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] What was the proportion of the number of voters to the electors that you have spoken of in Athens who actually voted?—I am not aware.

10500. Do you know whether it was large or small?—My impression is that it was very large.

10501. Have you anything to say about afternoon bribery?—There appears to me to be no possibility of check against what is called afternoon bribery under the present system of election as conducted in England. I heard the last witness make some observations upon that matter, and it appears to me that nothing would repress the ardour of volunteers anxious to publish the state of the poll in the interests of the candidate to whom they are friendly. Under the system of open voting, it is practically impossible to prevent a knowledge of the state of the poll from transpiring during the afternoon.

10503. Mr. Cross.] No more they might under the ballot?—But no one would have security for the redemption of their pledge.

10504. Chairman.] I understood you to say that the polling in Greece continued four days; in whose custody are the ballot-boxes during this time?—They were sealed every night in the presence of the friends of the candidates, and deposited in their custody, and those whom they chose to appoint under the supervision of the returning officer.

10505. Practically, where were they kept?—Practically, they were kept in the churches, which were used as polling places, carefully sealed, and all bound together with an iron rod, which confined the whole of the 30 boxes.

10506. Mr. Villiers.] Do the priests interfere at all with the voting, seeing that it takes place in the churches?—Not at all.

10507. Do they not use any political influence over the people?—The priests have not the slightest apparent influence in the elections in Greece.

10508. Have they any influence?—I should imagine, from their position in society and their general reputation, none whatever.

10509. Sir George Grey.] Can you state by whom the returning officer is appointed?—I believe by the commune; there is an eparch appointed by the Government over the electoral divisions; and demarch over the municipal divisions.

10510. Does that eparch act as returning officer?—I believe he does.

10511. Is he removable by the Government also?—I am not aware.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir SAMUEL MARTIN, Knight, called in; and Examined.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

29 June 1869.

10512. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you were one of the Judges occupied in the trial of election petitions under the Corrupt Practices Act of last year?—I was.

10514. Have you formed any opinion as to the amount of corrupt practices which existed at the late election?—I have formed a very decided opinion that the general impression with regard to bribery is exaggerated, judging from the cases that I tried. I believe that bribery only existed to any considerable extent in two places. It was supposed that there was a great deal of bribery at a third, but that was not gone into, because there was a very clear case of bribery proved at the commencement of the trial; and thereupon the counsel for the sitting Member abandoned the seat; but with the exception of those three places, I believe bribery did not exist to any great extent, at least, on behalf of those persons whose conduct was impugned. I cannot tell what it was with regard to the other side, but with regard to the cases where the seats were impeached, I think there was very little bribery indeed.

10515. Was bribery imputed in every case?—I think it was in every case, but in a very great number of cases the charge was perfectly ridiculous.

10516. Could you mention in how many cases out of the 13 the Member was seated or unseated?—The Member was unseated at Norwich, and at Bradford, and at Brecon, and the two Members were unseated at Beverley.

10517. Sir George Grey.] Then the petitions succeeded in five cases out of 13?—Yes.

10518. Chairman.] To go on to the prevalence of corrupt practices, did much treating appear to have prevailed?—At some places to a great extent; I am satisfied that at Norwich, from half-past 12 or 1 o'clock, to the close of the poll, there was a great deal of treating and of drink supplied, but whether by the keepers of the public-houses themselves in the expectation of being paid out of the bribes, or by others, I cannot tell; I had no means of telling where the money came from that was used in corrupt practices at Norwich. With respect to Bradford the treating was enormous. A statement handed to me by Mr. Littler, who was one of the counsel for Mr. Ripley, was that there were 158 public-houses opened by that party; that at 43 of them there were no refreshments supplied, but that there were 115 at which refreshments were supplied.

10519. Was that on the election, or the polling-day, or had it been going on previously?—It had been going on for a considerable time, and of the expenses of that election no accounts were sent in at all. They were all kept back, but the admitted expense of Mr. Ripley's election was 7,200 l. odd.

10520. Did it appear how much of that 7,000 l. had been expended in drinking?—No, but I had no reason to suppose that the expenditure was in bribery. There was no attempt to impeach Mr. Ripley's seat upon the ground of bribery. By bribery, I mean paying for the votes. There was an attempt to impeach Mr. Forster's seat upon the ground that he had bribed, but the alleged bribery was absurd. There had been a man, who was a voter, and who had been out of work for months, and some gentlemen went to his house to canvass him on behalf of Mr. Forster, and there saw a wretched, miserable woman, in a state of starvation, with a family of children, and the alleged bribery was that a gentleman gave a child 2 s. 6 d. as he was going out of the room. Another case was that of a man who had gone to live at Leeds, and some friend of his saw him after he had come to Bradford for the purpose of voting, and it seems that he had paid 2 s. for a third-class ticket; and the man, thinking that he had come by a second-class train, gave him 2 s. 6 d. That was the second case, and the third failed utterly, which was with respect to a man who was supposed to have been bribed with money to pay his rent.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

rent. There were only these three cases brought forward against Mr. Forster, and if there had been any case that could possibly have been established against him, neither pains nor expense would have been spared to have brought it forward.

10521. Did it appear that drinking to anything like the same extent had prevailed in any other borough?—There was a great deal of drinking, as I have said, at Norwich. I think that the Salford election was conducted upon the principle of spending a good deal of money, and I think that there was a good deal of drinking at Salford upon the polling day; I mean public-house drinking. In many cases it was alleged that the money to pay for the drink was the elector's own. There was one case which I ought to mention, and that was Wigan. The petition there was against the successful candidates, who were Liberals, and I can only speak with regard to the charges brought against them; but that seemed to be a singularly pure election, so pure that they would not have any committee sitting in a public-house. Upon the day of the polling it was found necessary to have one in the immediate vicinity of some of the polling places; they could get no other place except a public-house, and they paid 10*l.* to shut up the supply of beer altogether and stop it. They paid for having no beer supplied to any one at the house.

10522. In the cases where you found that such treating had prevailed as to induce you to void the election, did it appear to you to have gone on on both sides?—At Norwich it certainly had not. I think that Norwich was a particularly pure election on behalf of the candidate who was defeated. I apprehend that he was a man of not very great means, but he was examined, and stated that he had not in any way, either directly or indirectly, given drink to any one. The Norwich election was, up to 12 o'clock, a perfectly pure election; and I believe that the electors voted upon as honourable and pure principles as people could vote, but that at that time the Liberal party were in a great majority, and the bribery and the treating commenced then. The candidate declared, and so did the chairman of his committee, and the attorney who managed the election, that they were utterly ignorant of it, and I have no doubt they were telling the truth. They said that they knew nothing whatever of it, and that they did not know where the money came from which supplied it. It was proved that there was a considerable quantity of bribing in small sums of 7*s.* 6*d.*, 15*s.*, and, in a very few instances, 1*l.*, to labouring men who had been hanging about the whole morning, I have no doubt, in order to be bribed.

10524. Did those expenses in general agree with the official returns which had been made?—I have misunderstood the question; I merely ascertained, as far as the information was given me, but I had no means of ascertaining what money was paid beyond that which was returned to the returning officer. I think I may as well explain to the Committee how the cases were conducted. There are two modes of attacking a seat: one is, that the election was conducted contrary to the principles of common law; that was the Beverley case, general corruption pervading a large number of electors. At Beverley many, professedly, were bribed for the purpose of the municipal election, but in reality for the Parliamentary election as well; that was the only case of the kind which came before me where an election was alleged to be void upon the principles of the common law; that the elective body was so corrupt that no election made by them could be valid, this has always been held an objection to an election from the earliest time. At Salford a matter arose, upon which if it had been sufficiently proved, I would have raised a question for the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas; that is to say, where candidates who avoided doing acts which the Legislature had declared to avoid the seat, did other things which were contrary to law, although the Act of Parliament did not enact that these things forfeited the seat; whether or not a person systematically disobeying the law, and acting not merely in one instance, but in a variety of instances, against the provisions of the Acts of Parliament, did not thereby forfeit the seat; but it did not seem to me that the facts were sufficiently established. With regard to all the other cases, the question was, whether the Member or any person for whom he was responsible, had done an act which the three sections of the Act of Parliament declared to avoid the election; whether he had committed an act contrary to the 2nd section of the 17th & 18th of Victoria with respect to bribery, or under the 4th section he had corruptly treated, or within the 5th section he had used undue influence; in the great majority of cases it was simply whether or not the candidate, or a person for whom he was responsible, had transgressed one or other of these sections of this Act of Parliament.

10526. Do you mean that the judge could take no notice of it?—Yes, he might take notice of it, upon a scrutiny, so as to strike off the vote; but he could not legally declare a man not legally elected by reason of it. I apprehend that to do that there must be an express enactment of the Legislature, and the judge could not, by reason of a candidate committing an act upon which the Legislature had merely imposed a penalty, say that the doing of that act shall also impose the forfeiture of the seat; it would be contrary to law, I think.

10527. Chairman.] Did any cases come under your notice in which it appeared that illegal acts had been committed, but where they could not be brought home to the Member through the want of proof of agency?—Not to any extent. The only case that I remember where that arose, was in the Westminster case. In Westminster there was a body called the Working Men's Constitutional Association, and they came forward to aid Mr. Smith in the election; but they had a distinct set of canvassers for themselves, wholly distinct from Mr. Smith's, and it was there proved, at least there was evidence given, that an individual vidual had bribed in three instances. He contradicted it; but it seemed to me that there was a failure to make this man an agent of Mr. Smith's, so as to affect Mr. Smith by his conduct.

10528. Mr. Villiers.] He was a supporter of Mr. Smith, was he not?—Yes, he was a supporter; he was a supporter, but not an agent.

10529. But he acted for Mr. Smith in this illegal way with a view to promote his election?—He acted for him with a view to support his interest, but in my judgment he was not an agent of Mr. Smith's to affect Mr. Smith's seat.

10530. Chairman.] The expenditure at that election was very large, was it not?—Yes, the expense of the election was enormous, very nearly 9,000 l. I think it was most extravagant.

10531. And yet the petitioners were unable to prove any corrupt practice?—I believe myself that my judgment was right, and I retain the same opinion, although I know that others have formed a different opinion. The expenses of that election were nearly 9,000 l. The expenses which Mr. Smith knew of upon the day of the election were about 4,500 l., and an additional 4,500 l. was an after expense upon Mr. Smith. I believe that Mr. Smith was desirous that no illegal expense should be incurred in the way either of bribery or treating, or any undue influence used; but I think he was a man who was esteemed to be a rich man; and very ready to supply money. Whether or not he would spend the same sum of money over again may be doubtful; but I believe that it was not an intended illegal expenditure; my own opinion is that he was robbed, to a considerable extent in that election, by agents.

10532. Mr. Villiers.] He paid the whole sum, did he not?—Yes, he paid the whole without objection.

10533. Was it proved before you that he met the whole expense?—Yes, there was no doubt about it that he paid the whole of it himself out of his own funds. I do not believe that he had any aid whatever, but I suspect he was much dissatisfied when such a large sum as 4,500 l. was sent in for him to pay after the election was over.

10534. He therefore admitted his liability?—Yes, he paid it.

10535. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion of whether the fact of so large an expenditure as took place, for instance, in Westminster, might be made a ground for unseating a Member independently of any particular act?—Mr. Justice Willes and I have been talking over that matter this morning, and he has a strong opinion, as he stated to me, and which he probably will himself explain more fully to the Committee. I think it well worthy of consideration whether or not there should be an enactment that extravagant general expenditure, and I will limit it to that, should void the seat: whether 7,000 l. at Bradford, or 9,000 l. at Westminster should not of itself void the seat.

10536. Are the judges to decide whether the expenditure was or was not extravagant?—I have not considered that sufficiently. My Brother Willes suggests that the words should be reasonably and necessary, and not extravagant; but I would rather that you should take it from him than from me.

10537. You do not express an opinion upon that point?—I think that if I had had absolute despotic authority, and not merely the carrying out of the law, I would have unseated both Mr. Ripley and Mr. Smith for extravagant expenditure, although I do not believe either of those gentlemen was cognisant at the time that he was spending such an enormous sum of money.

10539. Chairman.] Did any cases of intimidation or undue influence come under your notice?—Very few indeed, and I think they all failed. There was an attempt to prove undue influence, that is to say, that an employer endeavoured to influence workmen at King's Lynn, but it failed, and it scarcely occurred anywhere else, or in a very small degree.

10541. Would it be a charge which there would be any special difficulty in proving?—I think there would be considerable difficulty in a judge making up his mind upon it. The case that came before me was that of a man who was a workman, and he stated that his employer came to him upon the polling day, and said to him, "Well, I hope you are going to vote for so and so," and he said, "No; I should rather vote on the other side," and then something to this effect was said, "You know you get your employment from me, you get your bread from me, and I think you ought to vote as I wish"; and then something would be said to him, "Well, if you do not it will be the worse for you," or something of that kind. I have no doubt that any judge who was called upon to unseat a Member by reason of intimidation of that sort would be very careful indeed before he would act upon it; it is so easy to misunderstand and misrepresent such a transaction, possibly it was misunderstood by the man, and very likely misrepresented by him. One can conceive of intimidation of a very gross kind, but nothing of that sort came before me.

being exhibited at different houses in one division of Westminster, that next to Hyde Park. It was said that there were no buildings erecting and no old ones where they could put up placards. It was considered that the keeping of Mr. Smith's name before the electors of Westminster was essential, and thereupon they paid a number of persons for allowing boards to be put up at their shops, stating, "Smith for Westminster," or something of that kind. There was a payment of 7 s. 6 d. a week for the exhibition of those boards, and it was alleged that it was not a bonâ fide payment for exhibiting boards, but a colour for bribing the persons who were electors. That was the case which Mr. Fitzjames Stephen who was the counsel against Mr. Smith most strongly urged. It was proved by more than one person, but principally by Mr. Robert Grimstone, who was chairman there, and he stated in the most positive terms that a man could state, that he had no object whatever in bribing those persons; that it was an honest payment, and he believed that it was a proper sum. There was a great deal of evidence given that it was more than was usually paid, but if I had unseated Mr. Smith for it, I must have arrived at the conclusion that Mr. Grimstone was swearing what was false. It may have been an indiscreet thing his doing it; but I believe he was telling the truth as much as any gentleman in the room would tell it. He did a very indiscreet thing in the employment of a man named Edwards who was a tenant of his brother's at St. Albans, and who had been most deeply connected with the bribery at St. Albans, and that was very strongly commented upon. It certainly was a very indiscreet thing to do, but Mr. Grimstone doing this indiscreet thing with regard to Mr. Edwards, could not affect Mr. Smith's seat.

10543. Chairman.] Did there appear to be any general desire in the places which you visited, to put down the practices of bribery and corrupt practices in general?—I think there was a very general desire to do so. In a very great number of places it seemed to me that the candidates did their very utmost to prevent anything wrong. My impression is, that it was sincere in most cases. I had no reason to believe to the contrary; they declared, that they were utterly ignorant of the existence of illegal practices, and that it was their sincere desire that they should not take place.

10544. Did you hear of any cases, except the one which you have mentioned of bribery at municipal elections?—No; the only case where bribery at the municipal election was brought to bear upon the Parliamentary election was at Beverley. The municipal election was upon a Monday, and the nomination-day was that Monday fortnight; and upon the Monday of the municipal election, in two or three public-houses, there were persons openly sitting at a table with money before them, in bags, bribing persons to vote; and it was proved in many instances the men were told that they were bribed for the double event It was a very gross case. There was 800 l. borrowed from a bank by a man who was candidate for the municipal election. The money was borrowed on the Saturday, and used for bribery on the Monday; there was no concealment about it; any person might have gone in and got it.

10545. Mr. Villiers.] Who were the persons that paid the money; were they direct agents of the candidate?—They were persons who were connected with the candidate in the municipal election, and who were canvassers afterwards for the Parliamentary election.

10546. Were they distinct agents of the candidate?—The Committee probably know that there was a great agricultural implement maker, named Croskill, at Beverley, whose business went wrong, and it was converted into a limited company. Sir Henry Edwards was the chairman of this company, and the man who borrowed the money was a clerk in the concern.

10548. Mr. Hunt.] I understand that in that case the Member was unseated upon a common law principle, that the whole election was corrupt?—Yes; that the whole election was corrupt.

10549. Therefore, it did not depend upon tracing the bribery to the agents?—Not at all; I unseated the Members there upon the general common law principle, which is, that if you have very general corruption among the electors, the law declares that an election made by those persons is void, and cannot stand.

10551. Mr. Hunt.] Was that put in the shape of a memorandum, or was it merely vivâ voce?—No; there was no record kept. It was a meeting amongst ourselves, where we agreed upon what we deemed to be the law, and determined, as far as we could, to act consistently upon it. I believe that we were perfectly agreed. There is the relation of master and servant, which is a perfectly well-known legal relation, and a master is responsible for the act of a servant done in the course of his employment. There is the well-known relation of principal and agent, and the ordinary rule with regard to that is, that the principal is only responsible for an act which the agent does by his authority. The Parliamentary law as to agency seems to me to treat the agent as a servant, and to make the principal responsible as a master would be for the act of his servant; and the word agency, as we use it in our courts, is not applicable to the relation which exists between a candidate and the persons whom he employs. Their acts were treated as acts of a workman or any other person for whom you were responsible, though you forbade him to do the very thing which he did do. If a master told his servant to drive in the most careful possible manner, and inculcated it upon him in the strongest possible way, and the man drove carelessly two minutes afterwards, the master is responsible, because of the relation of master and servant; but if it was a mere agency, the principal would not be responsible, unless the principal authorised the act which the agent did.

10552. Mr. Villiers.] That is the law, is it, in electioneering electioneering matters?—In electioneering matters we held that the candidate was responsible for the act of the agent, in the same manner as he would be responsible for the act of a servant.

10553. It comes to this, that there was no difficulty in the case of agency; that you had agreed upon the law yourselves before you adjudicated upon those cases, and the question was not argued upon each occasion?—Not upon each occasion. I am rather sorry that instead of the judgments being printed alphabetically they had not been printed in the order in which they were delivered by each judge. If any person desired to ascertain our views with regard to the law they would find it pretty well set out in those judgments. If any person thought it worth while to see the view which I have taken, if they would begin by reading the Norwich election, and then proceed in the order in which I tried them, they would find my view. So far as I am aware, I have been consistent throughout; I have acted upon the same principle from beginning to end, and I am not aware of any departure in one case from what I have laid down in another. I know, from what took place in Parliament, that it was thought that I had acted inconsistently with respect to the Bradford case and the Westminster case, but I do not believe that if any person reads the judgments he will find any inconsistency; he will find that the two cases were substantially distinct.

10555. Mr. Edward Egerton.] But that is not a uniform principle?—It is contrary to our view in the courts of common law.

10556. But it is not uniform in Parliamentary Committees, is it?—Mr. Justice Willes examined it with great care. I dare say he would not find it universal in all Parliamentary Committees.

10557. Sir George Grey.] If a candidate employs an agent for a limited purpose, and that agent acts in his interest or on his behalf for other purposes, is the principal responsible?—I should think not, certainly.

10558. Therefore a candidate may protect himself by appointing an agent to do some particular work?—I have no doubt he can. My Brother Willes suggests to me that he would be responsible for what he did in the course of that employment, whether it was contrary to the orders of his principal or not, but the principal would not be responsible for what he did in another employment or another matter wholly distinct from that in which he was employed.

10559. Suppose an agent were appointed to make arrangements as to polling-booths, and the agent was guilty of bribery, would the candidate be responsible for an act of bribery by that agent?—I think not, if he simply retained him to make arrangements with respect to polling-booths; he would have employed the man for that duty, and with respect to bribery, the principal would have nothing to do with it.

10560. Mr. Edward Egerton.] If he gave him general orders to conduct the election, at the same time telling him not to do anything illegal, surely the principal would not be held liable in that case?—According to our view, he certainly would; we hold him liable.

10561. Chairman.] Did you find any general opinion on the subject of nominations?—Yes. I think the universal opinion is that nominations are worthless, or probably do harm; as far as I can judge, that was the universal opinion of everyone.

10562. Had you any facts proved before you, which led you to trace the disorder at elections to the public nomination?—I cannot say that I had. I think in two of the cases tried before me there were hired men. At Cheltenham there were people hired from Birmingham, coming over for the professed purpose of enabling the persons who employed them to get their voters up to the poll, but I did not find anything of that kind; there did not appear, if I recollect rightly, any rioting at nominations.

10563. In what way did this general opinion come before you?—Generally from the mayors, who usually sat beside me during the inquiries, and I learnt from them what was the general opinion in the boroughs with regard to several things, and amongst others, with respect to the nomination, and it seemed to me that the universal opinion was that the nomination was utterly useless.

10564. Sir George Grey.] What were the grounds of that opinion?—That it was a means of giving drink, and of exercising undue influence upon that day, by getting people into public-houses; they all stated that they saw no good whatever from it, and that if two or three days before the election the persons who were to be the candidates issued a statement, and I suppose deposited the necessary sum of money for the purpose of meeting the expense of the poll, that would answer every purpose and avoid a great deal of inconvenience, but I think the principal objection was to the opening of the public-houses, and the quantity of drinking that went on upon the nomination day in them.

10567. Then you would be in favour of closing the public-houses on the day of the poll?—Yes.

10568. Would you extend the prohibition any further?—No, I would not; I would close the public-houses from the morning of the polling day till four o'clock.

10569. Mr. Hunt.] Do you mean in boroughs simply, or in county elections also?—My only experience experience of county elections was in the southern division of the West Riding, and that was settled.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

29 June 1869.

10570. Does your recommendation extend only to boroughs?—I am only speaking of boroughs; my experience in counties was merely in the southern division of the West Riding, and my inquiry there was confined to a very small compass; therefore I can say very little about it.

10571. Mr. Edward Egerton.] But in that case the petition was for treating, was it not?—It was for everything; for bribery, and treating, and undue influence.

10574. Chairman.] Is it your opinion that it is legal?—I am not prepared to answer this question: simple bribery, the giving of money for a vote, of itself is illegal, and affects the seat; but for the purpose of making treating illegal it must be corrupt, and the judge that has to determine upon it must determine that it was not merely meat and drink, and entertainment given, but corruptly given; I suppose corruptly means an act knowingly done contrary to law; and if that be the meaning of the word corrupt it would probably be illegal; but I dare say the Committee are aware that there is some difference of opinion as to what is the meaning of the word corrupt. I believe my Brother Willes has a very strong opinion upon the meaning of it, which you will find in his judgment in the case of Cooper v. Slade; but whether you agree with him, I do not know.

10575. Mr. Hunt.] That was a question relating to the conveyance of voters, was it not?—Yes, it was a question relating to the conveyance of voters to the poll; it went to the House of Lords upon the direction of Lord Wensleydale, and the House of Lords upheld his direction as being a proper direction. But you will find that one of the Judges who gave their opinion in that case was Mr. Justice Willes, and he gives a definition of what the word corrupt means in his opinion.

10576. Sir George Grey.] Were those breakfasts given in order to induce men to vote, or merely because they had already promised to vote, and had to go some distance to the poll?—I should think they were given not at all to induce them to vote.

10577. Then you think it would not fall within the fourth section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102?—I am not prepared to say. If my Brother Willes's definition of the word corrupt is correct, then it probably would be within it, because it would be a thing knowingly done, contrary to the Act of Parliament.

10578. Does not the 23rd section expressly meet that case, because any refreshment to voters on the day of nomination with a corrupt motive is illegal, and subjects the offender to a penalty, but without avoiding the seat?—That is so; there is a section to that effect.

10579. Still, your opinion is that giving breakfasts to persons who have already promised their vote, when they go to the poll, is not illegal?—I would rather not express a positive opinion. The words of the fourth clause are, that any person who shall "directly or indirectly give or provide, or pay wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person to give or refrain from giving his vote at such election, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or being about to vote, or refrain from voting at such election, shall be deemed guilty of the offence of treating."

10580. What was the use of the 23rd section if you think that clause four comprises the case which you put?—It was to remove a doubt arising upon an expression of one of the Judges in Cooper v. Slade. The section is, "And whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the giving of refreshment to voters on the day of nomination or the day of polling, be or be not according to law, and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed: be it declared and enacted, that the giving or causing to be given to any voter on the day of nomination or day of polling, on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll, any meat, drink, or entertainment by way of refreshment, or any money or ticket to enable such voter to obtain refreshment, shall be deemed an illegal act, and the person so offending shall forfeit the sum of 40 s. for each offence." I do not know that that carries it much further, for it must be on account of such voter having polled or being about to poll.

10581. Did not those breakfasts appear to you to fall within that section, because if I understand you right, the person who had promised to vote for the one or the other candidate, and who were going together to the poll, had breakfast before they set out to go to the poll?—Very likely it would be given to persons on account of their being being about to poll; but I only considered the matter with a view to whether or not I should give costs, and I should rather not express a positive opinion.

10582. But without the motive of corruptly influencing them?—I believe that they did it in the West Riding, because it had been the universal practice. It was said to have always been done.

10583. Do you think that breakfasts so given would vacate the seat, both in point of being given, and that those breakfasts were given for the purpose of corruptly influencing voters to give their votes for a particular candidate?—The evidence simply was this, that men were going, say, 10 miles, into Huddersfield to vote, and at a public-house, the keeper of which was known to be friendly to the cause, there was some meat and beer provided, and people went there and took it. I am not prepared to say whether or not this was corrupt treating within the Act of Parliament so as to vacate the seat. The point did not arise before me. They were persons who were pledged to vote, and were going to vote.

10584. You do not think that it would be an illegal act within the 23rd section?—I doubt it.

10585. Mr. Villiers.] The people know beforehand that they are to have breakfast gratis, and, perhaps, some of them would not go without it?—That may be so.

10586. Sir George Grey.] Did you feel any difficulty in defining what treating was, as applicable to the cases brought before you in evidence?—No; in any case brought before me, I do not remember that there was any difficulty.

10587. Chairman.] Did you form any opinion as to the holding of committee-rooms at public-houses?—Certainly; I think that ought to be stopped. I am satisfied that it is made a pretence for treating.

10588. And do you think that it might be stopped without interfering with the canvass?—I think so; in several cases it was stopped. At Wigan, I believe, not a single committee was held at a public-house except on the day of the election, and in some other cases there were no committee-rooms at public-houses at all.

10589. Are there any points upon which you think that the Corrupt Practices Act might be amended?—I think it is a matter for your consideration whether or not there should be any paid canvassing, and whether you would not recommend it to be prohibited.

10590. Sir George Grey.] Why do you think so?—A great many canvassers are persons who are, I expect, not the honestest people in the world, and that they are not honest to the people that employ them, and I am satisfied that there are many persons employed as canvassers who would readily bribe.

10591. Do you think that the employment of paid canvassers is colourable, and that it is merely a mode of paying men to give their vote?—I am satisfied that it is so in some instances; but I am also satisfied that paid canvassers are people not to be trusted.

10592. Chairman.] Are there any suggestions which you would make as to the form of proceeding under the Act?—No; I myself went down under the idea that there would be a great deal of trouble, and that we would have a difficulty with the witnesses, and that altogether there might have been a difficulty in enforcing the jurisdiction; but I found the direct contrary; there was no difficulty with the witnesses at all, and my belief is that there was before me very little perjury.

10593. I believe that cases of prosecution in the ordinary courts, under the Act, have been very uncommon?—Yes, they have failed; and I believe it would be found practically impossible to get juries to convict for offences contrary to this election law.

10594. And you think that no good end would be answered by imposing more severe penalties?—Not the slightest. If you give it to juries you will get no convictions. I tried the cases which arose out of the Wakefield election; and there was the utmost difficulty in getting a conviction upon the clearest evidence.

10595. Mr. Villiers.] Is that owing to a general sympathy, on the part of juries, with those practices?—I think it is a sort of feeling that all do it; that one is as bad as the other.

10596. Chairman.] The motive which sets the law at work is the hope of getting the seat?—I suppose so.

10597. And you think that that is the only motive which Parliament can trust to?—I should say that Parliament cannot trust enforcing penalties through juries. If they choose to give the power to the magistrates in the same way as you have entrusted to us the trial of those election petitions, you may get it done, but you will never effect the levying of penalties through juries for breaches of the election law.

10598. We have had it in evidence, before this Committee, that in many places very gross bribery has prevailed at municipal elections, and that there are provisions of the law which would reach these cases, but it appears that they never have been put into operation?—I believe you have stated correctly that that is generally the case. I believe there are some instances where there have been penalties enforced for breaches of the enactments, with regard to municipal elections. I have seen them mentioned in the papers, but I never tried them; none have come before me.

10599. It appears that if a municipal election is objected to, there is no machinery by which the seat can be claimed for the defeated candidate?—I believe not.

10600. Do you think that some provision by which the seat could be claimed, would tend to put the law into operation?—I have not formed any opinion upon that; I have not thought of it. My Brother Willes suggests that you could by a quo warranto, remove a man from office if he obtained it by bribery; that could be done by a proceeding in the Court of Queen's Bench.

10601. You could not claim the seat for the unsuccessful candidate?—No, the unsuccessful candidate would get nothing by it; you would merely remove the man who was guilty of an illegal act.

10602. Mr. Villiers.] I think you stated that there was no evidence adduced before you of undue influence?—There was not to any extent.

10603. Therefore you are not in a position to state to what extent it had been used?—No, not at all, but my Brother Willes will be able to give you information upon that, because he unseated three Members for undue influence.

10604. You have no opinion as to whether there was intimidation or undue influence exercised?—I have not; I have formed no judgment. In those 13 cases which I tried, there certainly was no undue influence to any extent proved or sought to be proved.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

29 June 1869.

10605. If it had been proved before you, would that have been a ground for unseating a Member?—Yes, certainly, by the direct enactment of the Act of Parliament.

10606. Does the Act define what is undue influence?—Yes; it is the 5th section of the 17th and 18th of Victoria, chapter 102: "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict, or threaten the infliction, by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practice intimidation upon or against any person, in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted or refrained from voting, or who shall, by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede, prevent, or otherwise interfere with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter, either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence."

10607. Therefore, if you had evidence of any person being threatened to be turned out of his holding, if he did not vote for a landlord or a customer, the person who so threatened him would have been guilty of undue influence, and it would have come within that provision?—Yes; that was the ground of endeavouring to unseat Sir Robert Peel, at Tamworth.

10608. In all the cases that you tried you had no evidence of a case of that kind?—I had nothing that I recollect, except in one case at King's Lynn, and that failed.

10609. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to undue influence, do you consider that threatening a person with harm in another world would come under the 5th section?—I think it might. My Brother Willes is a much more learned man than I am; and he refers me to the Council of Trent.

10610. If a person having spiritual authority over a member of his congregation, were to tell him that if he voted in a certain way he would incur harm in a future state, do you consider that that would come under the fifth section?—I have never thought of it, and it is too important a question to give an opinion upon without great consideration.

10611. Sir George Grey.] The words are very large, "or in any other manner practice intimidation upon or against any person"?—My present impression is that this is rather directed to temporal harm. I do not wish to be considered bound by that opinion; nothing of that kind occurred during the election trials in which I was engaged. There was no suggestion from beginning to end in any case of any clergyman interfering in that way.

10612. Chairman.] You have told the Committee that the experience which you gained at those 13 inquiries induced you to think that the notion of bribery extensively prevailing was very much exaggerated?—That is my impression certainly, but I merely judge from the cases that I tried.

10613. Should you be able to offer an opinion whether the absence of bribery which you found from the most part arose from the apprehension that persons were under, that the inquiries by the judges were much more stringent than inquiries by Committees?—My own impression is that that was so. I think they were very much afraid of this Act of Parliament.

10614. Do you think that candidates and their agents were much more cautious in consequence of expecting such inquiries as you carried on?—That is my impression certainly.

10615. You have made a suggestion that it might be desirable to enact, that if a candidate's expenditure was unreasonable and unnecessary, the seat should be avoided, even though the expenditure was not necessarily a corrupting expenditure. In that case I presume you would leave it to the judge to say what was unreasonable and unnecessary?—I am really not prepared to answer that question. It was a suggestion made this morning; Mr. Justice Willes and myself thought it desirable that we should meet an hour before we came here for the purpose of talking the matter over; it was a suggestion of his, and I would rather that the Committee should take it from him. He has thought of it a good deal, and will be able to give you much better information than I can upon the subject.

10616. You made another suggestion, which has been made before, that no committee rooms should be held at public-houses; have you been able to ascertain whether it would be possible to obtain committee rooms in boroughs like Westbury, for instance, if they did not take rooms in public-houses?—I can only tell you that that was done in several instances. That committee rooms were held at private houses, or at houses where they only rented the rooms; a vacant house, or something of that sort, which they fitted up temporarily and occupied for the purpose. But I found that this constantly occurred, that there was a committee room at a public-house, and people went there, and that the candidates and influential agents were there; and then that beer was brought in and placed before each person; that the witnesses saw no one pay. They said, "We did not pay, and we saw no one pay;" and then it was sought to raise the inference, that this beer was supplied by the candidate. At present, my impression is that it would be a good thing to put a stop to it altogether, and that there should be no means of supplying drink to persons who assembled in those committee rooms.

10617. It would be a question whether the committee rooms were taken colourably for the purpose of transacting business, but really for the purpose of supplying drink?—Yes; and with respect to taking those rooms colourably, in the Bradford election, as I have told you, upwards of 150 public-houses were employed as committee rooms; there were a great number of public-houses also taken by Mr. Forster and Mr. Miall, but they proved very distinctly that, in their case, it was merely the hiring of a room for the occasion, and that the candidates, or the persons connected with them, had nothing whatever to do with the room, except at the period when the committee was there. On the other side, the committee rooms were kept open continuously for voters to go in as they pleased, and where they got drink free from payment. A committee room where voters can go in and get drink supplied to them free is one thing, but a committee room which is merely used as such for the occasion of speaking, or the meeting of the electors, and which is only made use of and paid for on the occasion of the room being used.

used is quite a different thing; that they were both committee rooms in public-houses was the only similarity that they had to each other. But, as I have said, I would stop that altogether, and would prohibit it.

10618. Supposing that a candidate goes down to a borough and takes up his quarters at a hotel there, and the members of his committee come there to see him in the room that he occupied in the hotel, would that in your view be considered a committee-room?—No, that is not my idea of a committee-room; that would be nothing more than that a man would have in his private house persons who were engaged with him in promoting his interest in the election. That is a perfectly innocent act. What I understand by a committee-room is a place paid for where a body of persons meet for the alleged purpose of conference.

10619. Supposing a candidate had a room at a hotel, and that the whole of his committee came there to see him one morning, will it be a committee-room in that case?—I think not.

10620. You would not wish to prevent that?—No; it would be impossible to prevent it. Unless you would compel a man to take a private house as a residence during the election.

10621. You have called attention to the fact that there is a difference of opinion as to whether an election is avoided by law by reason of the candidate performing certain illegal acts; do you suggest that the law ought to be so declared that a candidate committing those illegal acts ought to have his election voided?—I discussed the matter this morning with Mr. Justice Willes, and I attach much greater importance to and confidence in his opinion than in my own. He is of opinion, as he stated to me to-day, that he thought that to whatever extent the provisions of an Act of Parliament were wilfully violated, which did not enact that the consequences of those acts avoided the seat, a person sitting judicially could not avoid the seat.

10622. But do you suggest that the law should be declared to be this, that committing those illegal acts which are not declared expressly to avoid the seat, should in future avoid the seat?—I do not know what to say upon that matter, it would extend to every enactment which prohibits certain things being done, the same consequence which is now provided by the 17th & 18th of Victoria, upon bribery, treating, and undue influence. I think it would be almost impossible to hold a seat if you enact that.

10623. Sir George Grey.] Take the conveyance of voters as an instance; the providing of conveyance for voters does not now avoid the seat, but it is a misdemeanour, and subjects the person offending against the law to a penalty?—That is so.

10624. Would you make that act avoid the seat?—I am not prepared to answer that question. You are much more competent to form a judgment upon that than I am. What has occurred in the election trials has not enabled me to form any judgment upon it.

10625. Was it proved before you in any of those cases that that practice was resorted to extensively, so as to suggest to you the necessity of some alteration in the law?—No. The only case where the conveyance of voters had any appearance of illegality was at Salford.

10626. Mr. Villiers.] But it is illegal, is it not, to convey voters in boroughs?—Yes, to pay for the conveyance of them. The 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 36, enacts that "It shall not be lawful for any candidate, or any one on his behalf, at any election for any borough, to pay any money on account of the conveyance of any voter to the poll, either to the voter himself or to any other person." In the Salford case it was alleged that the money was paid, not on account of the conveyance of voters to the poll, but on account of the conveyance of messengers from polling booth to polling booth, for the purpose of announcing there and at the central committee-room the state of the poll.

10627. Would the proof of the violation of the provision which you have read involve the loss of the seat, or only a penalty?—Only a penalty. That is one of the matters in which, as I have already said, if I could have stated half-a-dozen breaches of enactments which did not involve, by the enactments themselves, the loss of the seat, I should have sent a case for the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas whether, in analogy to general corruption avoiding an election, they would hold that wilful violations of the provisions of Acts of Parliament, which of themselves did not enact that the seat should be lost, nevertheless, was such illegal conduct as, like general corruption, would avoid the seat.

10629. I wish to draw your attention to the enactment of the 45th section of the Act of last year, which is to this effect: "Any person, other than a candidate, found guilty of bribery in any proceeding in which, after notice of the charge, he has had an opportunity of being heard, shall, during the seven years next after the time at which he is so found guilty, be incapable of being elected to and sitting in Parliament; and also be incapable of being registered as a voter and voting at any election in the United Kingdom," and so forth; do you consider that a voter found by a judge, upon such an inquiry as you have been carrying on under the Act, to have been guilty of bribery, is disqualified from being registed as a voter under that section?—I have very great doubt about it. It strikes me that the expression, "Has had an opportunity of being heard," applies to a case where a man has been charged with it, and has been put in some way upon his trial for it. In the case of a man being called as a witness, and saying that he received a bribe, I have very great doubt indeed whether he would come under this 45th section. I had occasion to report several persons as being guilty of bribery, as expressly directed by this Act; but I have very great doubt whether a person who himself stated that he had been bribed, was a person who could be held within the meaning of this section; that is a matter which must be decided, after much consideration as to what is the real meaning of the Legislature. Mr. Justice Willes suggests to me, that if you will refer to the section immediately before, that is section 44, it will show the meaning of this 45th section.

10630. The 44th section is as follows: "If on the trial of any election petition under this Act, any candidate is proved to have personally engaged at the election to which such petition relates, as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election, any person knowing that such person has, within seven years previous to such engagement, been found guilty of any corrupt practice by any competent legal tribunal, or been reported guilty of any corrupt practice by a Committee of the House of Commons, or by the report of the judge, upon an election petition under this Act, or by the report of Commissioners appointed in pursuance of the Act of the Session of the 15th and 16th years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter 57, the election of such candidate shall be void." Do you consider that the tribunals being set out there, and not being set out in the 45th section, shows that the Legislature intended a distinction between the two cases.—My Brother Willes says that that is his impression; he thinks that "an opportunity of being heard" means upon a trial in some way where the party had an opportunity of defending himself.

10631. Should you consider that it would be any injustice to a voter to be disqualified from voting by reason of being found guilty by a judge on the trial of an election petition?—Not the slightest; I am sure that no judge would report that a man was guilty of bribery unless it was proved to such an extent that there could exist no doubt about it; I know that was the rule which I laid down myself, unless the man had an opportunity of being heard, it would not be fair upon the mere statement of a witness, when he could neither cross-examine, nor give any explanation, to report him to be so guilty.

10632. You consider that upon the trial of an election petition, even if the voter had admitted his own guilt, and been scheduled by the judge as having been bribed, still he would not come within the meaning of the 45th section?—It seems not.

10633. Are you acquainted with the particulars of the second Bewdley Petition?—Not at all; Mr. Justice Blackburn tried that.

10635. Mr. Gathorne Hardy] With respect to the candidates, in your judgment have candidates sufficient protection at present from charges which are made through agents whom they really did not personally employ?—I have no reason to suppose that they have not; I should have thought that they were sufficiently protected. If I recollect, the only evidence of traitors coming to give evidence against the persons who employed them was in the Westminster case, where two brothers who had attempted to extort money after the election, came forward to give evidence against Mr. Smith; I do not recollect any other case. By-the-bye there was a person at Dover who, it was said, was a man of that kind, who came forward to give his evidence, pretending to be a friend, but being really an enemy.

10636. Can you suggest any mode by which a candidate can protect himself further than he is able to do at present, against such liabilities as you have said are imposed upon him now?—If he takes care to avoid doing any illegal acts and employs respectable people, that is all he has to do.

10639. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did you find any other case besides Beverley where bribery was committed at the municipal election to influence the Parliamentary election?—None; that was the only case where it was done.

10640. And I think you decided that case with reference to the old principle of common law?—Yes, entirely so. The agency was distinctly denied on the part of the two candidates; they swore that they knew nothing whatever of it.

10641. I understood you to say that the distinction which you made in the Bradford case was that in the one case public-houses were used for the general purposes of the election, and in the other merely for the purpose of holding committees?—Yes, that is so. You will find that distinction laid down as clearly as I could lay it down in my judgment.

10642. When you say that you think a good thing would be obtained by getting rid of nominations, do you think that that applies equally to county elections?—Yes, I should say so. I see no reason why there should not be communication made to the returning officer a day or two before, to announce that A. B. intended to be a candidate. It seems to me that a nomination is worth nothing at all.

10643. Did you find, as a general rule, that there was more treating and bribery on the day of the nomination than there was on the polling-day?—No.

10644. Is there any trial pending in the Norwich case?—Yes, there will be a commission upon it.

10645. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Do you see as much objection to the public declaration of the poll as to the nomination day?—I think that you must have a declaration of the poll somehow; that is a necessity.

10646. Might it not be done by advertisement in the papers?—Yes; but I do not see any objection to a public declaration of the poll; the election is over, and no man could be corruptly influenced after that. I have always thought that as far as possible proceedings in this country should be public.

10647. You state your strong objection to the great expenses attending upon elections; do not you think that a great deal of that arises from an insufficient number of polling places?—No; I do not think so in England; I heard no complaint whatever about the insufficiency of polling places. I have heard a great deal of complaint in Ireland but not in England.

10649. Mr. Cross.] Is it the case that when counsel are satisfied upon any point, and give it up or leave it alone, the judges have not thought it necessary to pursue that point themselves?—I did not. There was a matter which I should have been exceedingly desirous to have followed up, and that was to have ascertained from whence the money came that was used to bribe at Norwich. There was a very extraordinary thing proved there. At about two o'clock in the afternoon of the polling day an innkeeper went to a bank, and his statement was that he presented a cheque, cheque, and that a clerk gave him 400 half sovereigns; but the clerk was called and he said that that was not so, that he was asked for half sovereigns, and that he had to go to the manager for the purpose of getting the half sovereigns, not having 400 half sovereigns at his command.

10650. Mr. Bright.] He did not receive a cheque, did he?—It was to exchange a cheque at the bank.

10651. Mr. Hunt.] Did not you find out who signed the cheque?—Yes; the innkeeper was the man who signed the cheque, and he was the man who went and got the half-sovereigns.

10652. Mr. Cross.] You did not look upon yourself as a public prosecutor?—No, I did not.

10653. I hold in my hand the petition from Warrington about the Warrington election, a part of which petition I will just read to you; it says, "Having ineffectually applied by our counsel to the learned judge who presided at the hearing of the Warrington Election Petition, for a case to the court above, we are induced to represent our position to your Honourable House in the hope, and praying that some effectual remedy will be found to meet the case of your petitioners, and that some form of voting may be provided by statute, and that returning officers may be compelled by law to take such precautions as will prevent voters from being deprived of their constitutional rights by incapacity or mismanagement on the part of any official"?—I will state to the Committee what the history of that was. At the Warrington election the mayor had appointed a number of polling clerks, and it is clear from the enactments in the Acts of Parliament that the poll clerk is the person to whom the vote is to be tendered. A man who had been appointed poll clerk was taken ill the day before the election, and it became necessary to get a person substituted in his place; and I have no doubt that the selection made was a perfectly honest selection; but it turned out that he was a man not fit for the place, and he was put into a polling booth where they allowed a check clerk for each candidate to be in the same place with the poll clerk. One would suppose that in taking their places the poll clerk would be put in the centre, but he was not; he was at one end. A considerable number of voters were determined to get their names upon the poll very early, and they came in a great crowd up to this polling booth; and instead of giving their votes to the poll clerk by word of mouth, they had tickets, which they handed in as giving their votes; and a gentleman who was there on behalf of Mr. Greenall, instead of permitting them to be given to the poll clerk (which would have been a wrong mode of voting), took them himself and gave them to the poll clerk; and it was stated the poll clerk did not take down a number of those names. I held very clearly that a vote by means of a voter handing to the check clerk of one of the candidates his ticket for him to have the name taken down by the poll clerk was no vote; that it was illegally tendered and void altogether; any ticket that was taken direct from the elector by the poll clerk and entered by him, although there was some doubt about it, I stated that I would hold to be a legal vote.

10655. Would you suggest that the poll clerk appointed by the mayor or the sheriff in counties should have some distinction, so that voters might know where to go?—That might be; but this man, I fancy, lost his head. I may say that the whole of this was done in the first half-hour; the person who had the control of the election came and set it right immediately; and it would have been a monstrous thing to have unseated the gentleman who was returned, who was as innocent of doing wrong as any gentleman in this room, because persons came and offered their votes in an illegal way.

10656. Could you suggest any alteration to prevent such an occurrence as that?—Yes, as I suggested at the time, that the returning officer should take care that no person was in the same compartment with the poll clerks, so that there should be no chance of that being done which was done then.

10657. Chairman.] You think it is not a case which is very likely to happen again?—I think not at all. It arose in consequence of those men coming up altogether, and the desire that the first return should be very favourable to Mr. Greenall. The men came up to vote, but instead of that which you generally see, a sort of lane, so that persons can pass up before the polling booth, they had, for some reason or other, taken down the barrier, so that people were standing in dozens around the poll clerk.

10658. Mr. Cross.] Probably you are aware that in municipal elections they are obliged to have one alderman to preside in the ward, under the Municipal Act; would not you suggest that the sheriff or mayor should appoint some such responsible known person?—In this particular case the Mayor of Warrington appointed a very competent person to be the controller of the polling, and he was sent for, and came and immediately set the matter right. I think that the matter was set right by half-past eight or a quarter to nine.

10659. Mr. James.] You have expressed your opinion of the inutility of criminal prosecutions, and the impossibilty almost of obtaining convictions from juries in the localities; would the same objection apply if the trial were removed to London, and tried by a London or Middlesex jury?—I think so; you would find a Middlesex jury even more unmanageable than a country one.

10661. More than a jury of the locality, who have entered, probably to some extent into the election contest?—The only important instance I have had since I have been upon the Bench, in trying these matters, was a case arising out of the Wakefield election, and in that case there was an abortive trial. The first trial was held before Sir Hugh Hill, when a gentleman from Wakefield refused to give his evidence, and thereupon he discharged the jury, and committed the man to prison for nine months. I went the Northern Circuit following, and I took an opportunity of speaking to one of the counsel on the side on behalf of which this witness was, and I recommended him strongly that this man should be advised to come and give his evidence, and not have the same thing over again, for I had quite made up my mind that if he refused to give evidence I would have subjected him to a fine and to further imprisonment. The consequence was, that the man came forward and told his story, and I believe told it substantially honestly enough; but there was the greatest difficulty in that case. It was as clear a case as well could be, and there was not the slighest reason to suppose that the man was saying a word of untruth, although he was most unwillingly giving his evidence.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

10662. Mr. Villiers.] Then the jury did their duty on that occasion?—Yes.

10663. Mr. James.] Should you see any objection to the judge who tries an election petition having the power of a committing magistrate, to commit a person who had been guilty of gross bribery?—A judge has the power, but I think it objectionable that the judge should interfere in that way, if it can possibly be avoided. It puts the judge in a wrong position. The duty of a judge is to sit judicially, and form a judgment upon the matter which is brought before him. I feel myself a great dislike to take any immediate step with regard to a witness, and I never did so but once, when I sent a little boy to prison for the night and discharged him in the morning; that, in the course of 19 years, is the only occaon which I have interfered.

10664. Do not you think that it would have a salutary effect upon the constituency, if they should see a judge commit a person to prison?—It might.

10665. You have had a case before you, have you not, where the accounts had not been delivered in within the two months prescribed by the statute?—Yes, wilfully, and of purpose kept back.

10666. Do not you think that that ought to be a ground for invalidating a Member's seat, who wilfully disobeys the statute?—I thought so at the time. The statement made by the attorney was that he had consulted the London agent, and that the London agent had advised him not to do it, and had said that that was the proper course to pursue.

10667. The O'Conor Don.] I think you stated that where a defeated candidate prayed for the seat, you think that his own acts and the acts of his agent could be gone into upon the petition?—Yes.

10668. But in case he does not pray for the seat he cannot?—No, the Act of Parliament is precise upon that subject.

10669. Supposing a defeated candidate had been guilty of an improper act at the first election, could that be brought forward if afterwards he should be successful on the second election?—I cannot answer that question. I do not find any express provision in the Act of Parliament. My Brother Willes says that there is, and that it is the same section which has been so often referred to in the Corrupt Practices Act.

10670. Mr. Brand.] I understand you to say that, as far as your experience goes, at the last general election there was not much bribery?—That is so.

10671. You advert, I presume, to coarse form of bribery, by the payment of money from hand to hand?—What I have been calling bribery has been a direct payment in money.

10672. But with respect to other payments, excessive payments for agents, for canvassers, for committee-rooms, and so forth, would you be so good as to give the Committee your opinion upon that point?—The only case that came before me in which I saw anything wrong with regard to agents was at Brecon. There one of the attorneys received 500*l.* as his fee; and there were four others who only received 100*l.* It seemed to me that that looked very much like buying a small borough, and paying a man for the interest which he had probably made with a number of electors; but that is the only case where it occurred.

10673. Mr. Bright.] I presume those attorneys could not vote?—No, they could not vote; no person who receives pay can vote.

10674. Mr. Brand.] Have you not found generally, in the course of your inquiries, that the payments for committee-rooms have been very large?—Sometimes very large.

10675. And, generally speaking, they are at public-houses?—In a great number of instances they are at public-houses, and the payment sometimes is very large. There was a very large sum paid for a public-house at Salford. That was the case of a man named Keane, the rental of whose house was only 19*l.* a-year, and 5*l.* was paid him for the use of a room for one day.

10676. Mr. Villiers.] I think you have given some opinion with respect to a large retaining fee to an agent?—Yes, I thought it was very large. It was a mere observation of mine upon the amount of the agent's fee. I had not to adjudicate upon it, because the counsel for the sitting Member abandoned the seat. A bribe of 5*l.* was proved to have been given to a man, and thereupon the counsel for the sitting Member abandoned the seat.

10677. Was the man tried who was bribed with 5*l.*?—No, he has not been tried. The trial was to have taken place at the last Spring Assize; but upon an application to the Chief Baron, it was postponed to the next assize, upon the ground that it might affect the petition.

10678. Mr. Brand.] I understand you to say that you object to the payment of canvassers; does that observation apply to the payment of agents?—In most cases attornies are employed, and I am afraid they will not work except they are paid. I think that there is much less danger in paying attornies who, generally speaking, are respectable people, than paying canvassers who, I think, sometimes are not at all respectable.

10679. Is it not your opinion that there may be much bribery through the excessive payment of agents and canvassers?—I have no doubt that it may be done.

10680. Have you reason to suppose that it prevails to a considerable extent?—I can only speak of those 13 cases which I have tried. And I do not think that with one or two exceptions it prevailed much in them.

10681. Have you any reason to suppose that corrupt compromises take place between the parties to petitions either before or after the trial?—No, the Act of Parliament directs that it must be withdrawn with the consent of the judge. You will find the provisions with respect to the withdrawal of petitions, beginning with the 35th section of the Act of last year. We agreed that we should require certain affidavits in every case; and we have required affidavits from the candidate, and the persons withdrawing, that there has been no corrupt contract or agreement of any kind. We have always insisted upon that, and the affidavits are filed at the Common Pleas Office.

Office. In every case we have insisted upon the persons applying making such affidavits, and I have no reason to believe that the persons have sworn falsely.

10682. Have there been many cases withdrawn?—Yes, a great number.

10683. Sir George Grey.] In any of those cases have any electors applied under the power given by law to be substituted for the petitioners so as to prosecute the petition?—There has been no instance of that.

10684. Have you no reason to suppose that the withdrawal of a petition has been objected to by any number of electors within the borough?—I think there was one case where it was said there was considerable objection; that was the case of Stockport. I remember hearing that there was some objection made on behalf of the electors of Stockport, but I never heard of any other.

10685. Do you know why they did not avail themselves of the power given them by law to prosecute the petition on their own behalf?—I do not; that case was before Mr. Justice Blackburn.

10686. Mr. Brand.] Have you considered whether it would be desirable to appoint a public prosecutor to watch the proceedings at the trial of those election petitions on behalf of the public?—I have not.

10687. In the Norwich case, I understood you to say that you would have wished to have carried on that inquiry?—I should.

10688. Would not it have been desirable to have had a public prosecutor present on the occasion to have carried on that investigation?—I do not know; it might have been so, but you must consider the immense expense. If you had started a fresh inquiry after the election petition was concluded I know not to what extent it might have gone; but I felt there, as I have already said, that it would have been exceedingly desirable to have followed up those 400 half sovereigns: I never heard of 400 half sovereigns being paid on a check before, nor, I suppose, anyone else.

10689. Sir George Grey.] Did you feel that you had no power by law to follow out that inquiry?—I had no means of doing it. In the first place I would have had to get witnesses, and I had no means of obtaining witnesses. I suppose I could have made an order under the clause of this Act of Parliament for the attendance of anyone, but I should require to know who the persons were, and what were their names, and as I have already said, I think it ought to be well considered before it is put upon a judge to take an active part in prosecuting.

10690. Mr. Bright.] Is it not the case that generally speaking, the public sentiment is not so severe against those offences as to make their prosecution and punishment very easy?—That is true, there is no doubt about it. I think there can be no stronger instance of that than the Wakefield case.

10691. You mentioned a case at Salford where a publican with a house of the value of 19 l. a year, got 5 l. for the use of it for one day; was there any proof that that same publican in that same house had persons drinking, or that he sold drink on that day?—Yes, there were a considerable number of persons drinking.

10692. Then the 5 l. which he got for the rent would not be the whole profit which he got out of the house?—No, it was for nothing except for the use of the room.

10693. Was it proved who paid him the 5 l.?—Yes, it was proved who paid him.

10694. Was it by any person who, under any fair construction, could be held to be an agent for the sitting Member?—Yes, I think it was. I think that man, if I recollect rightly, was paid by a young man who acted immediately under the secretary.

10695. At Brecon there was one case of bribery proved, and the seat was voided; and in the Salford it was what you termed a dishonest payment?—Yes; I thought that the man was paid an exorbitant sum for his room.

10696. Was it for the sake of securing his vote or his influence?—I should think it was his influence.

10698. If a man had called on somebody and given him 10 l. for a kitten or some absurdity of that kind, would you have taken that man's oath and said that it was not a dishonest payment?—I certainly should not; 10 l. for a kitten would not have satisfied me.

10699. But in the case of 5 l. for a single day for a room in a beerhouse, and that the day of election, when publicans are all expecting to make a profit out of it, how could you come to the conclusion that it was not a corrupt payment?—I dare say it was a corrupt payment, but it was not bribery, within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, which was the matter upon which I had to adjudicate.

10700. With regard to the withdrawal of petitions have you heard that a great number of petitions were withdrawn in consequence of the conclusion which the persons came to as to the decisions and judgments of the judges in previous cases?—Yes; I have seen so in the newspapers.

10701. That the judges had, as was stated, so buoyed the channel that corruption was much more safe than before even?—It was said so, but I do not believe it; I believe that that was an incorrect statement, I would be glad if the person who made that statement would take the trouble of reading the judgments, and form his judgment upon them. I have seen many statements in the newspapers upon the subject, but I do not believe that they are well founded.

10702. Nobody doubts that they are honest throughout, but the subject is not one without difficulty?—I do not know. As far as I am concerned, speaking for myself, I have not the slightest reason to believe, after an interval of two months, that any judgment that I gave was wrong; and I would give them all over again if the thing was to occur again. Of course, very often people are dissatisfied with a decision upon their case that they hoped might have gone otherwise.

Sir S. Martin, Knight.

10703. Mr. Whitbread.] I think you said that paid agents could not vote?—There is a provision to that effect.

10704. Is not it the case that they render themselves liable to a penalty if they do vote?—No, it is the 30th and 31st of Victoria, chapter 102, section 11, which enacts, "No elector, who within six months before or during any election for any county or borough shall have been retained, hired, or employed for all or any of the purposes of the election for reward by or on behalf of any candidate at such election as agent, canvasser, clerk, messenger, or in other like employment, shall be entitled to vote at such election, and if he shall so vote, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

10705. There is nothing then to prevent the poll-clerk from taking down the vote of such a person?—There is nothing to prevent the poll-clerk from taking down any vote; but if he takes the vote of a person not entitled to vote, it is a nullity.

10706. That is to say, that vote is struck out on petition?—Yes.

10707. But it is quite clear that the Legislature intends, and as you think rightly intends, that a man who is a paid agent shall not vote?—Yes.

10708. Do not you think it would be an improvement if the returning officer were empowered to ask the question whether the man is a paid agent, and upon his being answered in the affirmative, to refuse the vote altogether?—I do not know. I believe it has been the object of the Legislature to have as few questions as possible asked by the poll-clerk, from a fear, and probably it is a just fear, that it might do more evil than good. I am afraid if you extend the number of questions to be put by the poll-clerk, you would delay the election very much, and very probably not effect much advantage.

10709. Is it not rather a hardship upon a candidate who has reason to believe that 10 or a dozen paid agents on the opposite side intend to record their votes, and after having given clear and specific warning of the penalties to which they are liable, sees those agents going up to the poll against him?—I think it is a great hardship; but at the same time I would not like to give an opinion upon a matter which you have put to me here for the first time; I never thought of it before; it never occurred to me to form any judgment upon it. Mr. Justice Willes suggests that it ought to avoid the election, if the thing was knowingly done.

10712. Sir George Grey.] Does not the 56th section of the 31 and 32 Vict. c. 125, give power quite independent of the candidate to electors to complain of corrupt practices and authorise an inquiry?—Yes, certainly. The section says, "If, upon a petition to the House of Commons, presented within 21 days after the return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England, or to the Clerk of the Crown and Hanaper in Ireland of a Member to serve in Parliament for any borough or county, or within 14 days after the meeting of Parliament, and signed by any two or more electors of such borough or county, and alleging that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the then last election for such borough or county, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have there so prevailed, an address, to be presented by both Houses of Parliament, praying that such allegations may be inquired into, the Crown may appoint commissioners to inquire into the same." It does that certainly.

10713. It does not affect the seat, but there may be an inquiry into corrupt practices quite irrespective of the seat?—Yes, certainly.

Sir James S. Willes, Knight, called in; and Examined.

Sir J. S. Willes, Knight.

10714. Chairman.] You tried a number of election petitions, did you not?—Yes.

10715. Have you a list of the cases which you tried?—I have gone through them in the index of the printed papers, Parts I. and II. of the Judgments, and I find that there are 10.

10716. Do you know in how many cases the seat was avoided?—Two; at Blackburn and Westbury.

10717. In both those cases the seat was voided, was it not, on the ground of undue influence?—Yes.

10718. In the case of Blackburn, did it appear to you that there had been a very great amount of undue influence?—Yes; but the mass of it seemed to me to come from workmen, who must have thought that they were pleasing their employers in what they did. I think there were two distinct instances in which persons occupying the position of overlooker, in one case, and in the other of pay clerk in a mill, did intimidate workmen, but in all the other instances the intimidation came immediately from the body of workmen in the mills themselves.

10719. Why have you formed the opinion that the workmen thought they were pleasing their masters by acting in this way?—I stated my reasons at large in the printed judgment, which occupied a very long time to deliver; and it would be difficult to bring before the Committee all the details without being tedious.

10720. You did not come to the conclusion, did you, that the workmen had entertained any strong political opinions themselves?—I think they did; I think the Lancashire people, as far as I can at all judge, have very strong political feelings; so much so at Blackburn, that the mills adopted colours, blue or yellow, and even a man used used to stick up the colour, blue or yellow, upon the machine that he was working at, according to his politics, which seems carrying matters a long way.

10721. Did the pressure exercised by the workmen invariably go in the same direction as the opinions of the master?—I think so; I think all the intimidation was in Tory mills and was of Whig workmen; I will explain. The mills adopted colours, and I observed that after the decision was given, all the flags hoisted were yellow, and that there was no flag upon several mills which I presume, therefore, to be blue.

10722. Mr. Villiers.] Are you referring to what came out in the course of the evidence which was submitted to you, or to what occurred pending the inquiry?—I refer to the evidence. The two Members returned were Tories; the two gentlemen who petitioned, the candidates, were Whigs, and they complained of intimidation of Whig workmen, which intimidation was proved.

10725. In some position to enable him to threaten the men, and to try and induce them by fear to vote in a particular way?—Yes; and also to bring him within the terms of a circular which attracted a great deal of attention, issued by the Tory committee, and adopted by the Members, and which called upon the persons who were overlookers and so forth in the mills, to use their influence with the workmen, both for the municipal and the Parliamentary elections.

10726. Was it the only charge that was brought, or the only thing alleged in the petition, that undue influence was used?—No; the petition charged corrupt practices of all sorts; bribery, treating, and intimidation; but there was no evidence either of bribery or treating; and I believe that the place was free from what I call vulgar corruption. The corruption proved was the intimidation, either by fellow-workmen or by persons rather above them in position in the mill, under the notion that they were pleasing their employers.

10727. Chairman.] That election, I believe, as in the case of Beverley, was avoided at common law, was it not; it was not on account of any specific acts of bribery or corruption?—No; that election was avoided under the statute, though it would, I believe, also have been void at common law. I believe, by what has been called the common law of Parliament, corruption in an agent has always avoided an election.

10728. Sir George Grey.] Was this intimidation in that case connected with the agents of the sitting Members?—It was; through the circular to which I have referred.

10729. Was it your belief that it clearly came within the statute?—It clearly came within the statute; but I should be very sorry to have it supposed that that statute displaced the common law.

10730. Chairman.] From what you have seen elsewhere, and what you have heard, and what you have read of trials in other cases, do you think that the case of Blackburn was quite an exceptional one, where you decided that an immense amount of intimidation prevailed?—Not an immense amount of intimidation; I made a report to the Speaker, which would give my notion of it. It was a spurt; it was an outburst in certain mills, and it spread to the neighbouring mills, and when it came to the notice of the employers, they put it down as soon as they could, of course, seeing the ruinous effect that such proceedings would have if they were allowed to go on.

10731. Those proceedings being what their overseers were doing on their works?—It must have been done either by the recommendation of the overlookers or the foremen egging on the men against the rival candidate.

10732. The case of Westbury also was decided, was it not, on the ground of undue influence?—Yes.

10733. That was the act of one individual, was it not?—Yes, it was the act of one individual, and it was necessary there to go into the question of what constituted him an agent. I took some trouble to state what would be an agent, and what acts of an agent would bind the Member in that case, and may refer to that without repeating those remarks, and I do so in consequence of the Committee having asked my Brother Martin as to what the law laid down was as to agency. I believe that the law laid down there will be found to be quite consistent with what was laid down by my Brothers Martin and Blackburn in the cases which came before them.

10734. Do you agree on the whole with what Mr. Baron Martin has told us as to the prevalence of the various forms of corrupt practices?—I think there is a great deal of eating and drinking which falls under several heads, because I believe there is a great deal of eating and drinking by people on the same side in politics in the way of feasting people; the northern races have always feasted one another over any work that they have in hand, and they always will do so; that, of course, you do not call treating. It is a rejoicing over a common pursuit, in which people sitting down to supper or whatever it is, may be engaged. It does not alter their opinions; it puts them, as it is supposed, on better terms with one another, but it has no effect upon their political opinions that I can conceive of.

10735. Had you any difficulty in determining what was corrupt treating under the Act?—I had not; I was going to divide the subject. Besides that, and not affecting the Members, this sort of thing takes place. Public-houses are hired for the purpose of Members making speeches. Members who are not known in the place, and who rely upon their oratory, employ persons to go round and hire public-houses, and appoint certain times when they come down and make speeches. That I found was one form of canvassing. A Member prohibits any drinking, and his agents prohibit any drinking; a crowd of persons collect at the public-house, listen to the candidate, and then, when he goes away, order up beer as a matter of course; and the sort of people that go to those meetings will drink, and it has the appearance of being treating; whereas, in fact, the beer is paid for either by the people who order it or by a whip, in many cases the richer people putting in rather more, perhaps, than the poorer people; and it is not proved to come from the agent of the candidate or from the candidate himself. Then there is a third head, that of the landlords, who take advantage of occasions such as I have referred to, and who, without the authority or knowledge of the candidate or his agent, put upon the table, I was going to say, pailsfull of drink for anybody who thinks proper to sup, and the drink is supplied by the landlord under the notion that he may afterwards shame the candidate into paying. In no one of those three cases is there treating which can affect the candidate's seat. You must show that the candidate or his agent has ordered the drink, or connived at the drink being ordered, before you can affect his seat on account of it. There is one other head which I think the law ought to deal with. I do not myself see the way to deal with any of those cases to which I have referred, because they are things which will take place, and will come from people's love of drink which you cannot extinguish. The other case is this; that unquestionably since the Lambeth case and other cases with which you are probably familiar, it has been held that, as before, the 11th section of the Representation of the People Act, a candidate might pay his committee-men or his canvassers, although they were voters, a reasonable sum of money for their services in those capacities; so it was also held and seems to be still the law that a candidate may treat his committee-men or his canvassers to a reasonable extent. He may give them what is called reasonable refreshment, without coming within the law of treating. That question of reasonable refreshment is not dealt with at all; and that question of paying voters on the side of the candidate is only dealt with, and insufficiently dealt with, as it appears to me, by the 11th section of the Representation of the People Act. That is the fourth case. The fifth is, where a man gives drink, either particularly or generally, with a view to gain influence or to get votes, and that is within the Corrupt Practices Act. The sixth case is that which was referred to under the 23rd section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102; and with respect to the distinction between those two sections, I may mention that at Bodmin I went into that matter. I will not repeat what I said there, but I discussed the 23rd and the 4th sections and compared them, and pointed out what I thought was the distinction between giving drink on account of a man being a voter, and giving drink to influence that voter's vote; and in my opinion the 23rd section ought to be extended to a week at least before the election, including the day of polling, instead of being limited to the day of nomination and the day of polling; and that sort of mild treating ought to be brought within the operation of the 36th section, annulling the election; because allowing reasonable refreshment to be given leads to suspicion, which will cause a vast deal of litigation under the Act of 1868; and also to worse than suspicion, because it gives a cloak to corrupt treating.

10736. Sir George Grey.] The third case, I think you said, was that of a landlord supplying drink, in the expectation that he would be paid by the candidate?—Yes; intending after the election to send in his bill. Upon looking at the report of the Coventry case, you will find what took place at Coventry with reference to the election before the last. In March 1868, a gentleman went down who, I believe, intended to contest the election quite fairly. There were committee-rooms in public-houses, and he went round and made speeches, and the landlords after he went used to put upon the table a quantity of drink, of which he knew nothing. He was defeated, and he, to reimburse a friend at Coventry, paid a large sum, I think some 700*l.* or 800*l.*, in discharge of bills of that description. He was appealed to as a matter of honour to pay the bills, and he did so.

10737. Supposing it should be proved that a vague expectation of being repaid by the candidate, or by some person on his behalf, was entertained, and that the candidate had subsequently paid, would not that affect the seat?—I should say that the better opinion, and which I should act upon, would be, that payment made with knowledge of the illegality was a ratification of the act, and an adopting of it from the beginning; that it would make the landlords agents, by adoption, from the beginning, and if it were found out before the trial, so as to be brought to the notice of the election judge, the seat would be void. If it were found out after the election judge had performed his functions, then it would be a question which I believe the House has before it, and upon which it would be very improper for me to offer any opinion, although I entertain one, whether the House has the prerogative, upon discovering that there has been corruption which has escaped the election judge, to interpose, and direct a new writ to issue.

10738. Mr. Whitbread.] Cannot it be the subject of a new petition?—No, I believe it cannot be the subject of a new petition; giving, of course, my opinion upon the construction of the Act of 1868.

10740. Have you formed the same opinion as Mr. Baron Martin as to the existence of very little bribery?—I have not had any case of extensive bribery before me; that is to say, any case of which I could say I really believed that in this case there has been a sum of money to be expended in bribery. I rather suspect that there was a sum in one case supplied by somebody, but I could not get at it.

10741. Was undue influence alleged in other petitions which you tried besides Blackburn and Westbury?—Yes, in several. There was undue influence alleged at Bodmin against Mr. Leveson Gower; but they were very small cases, and were quite groundless. There was also at Southampton a case of one or two workmen being stated to be intimidated by their employers; but it was not proved. It requires to be very cautious, in dealing with the evidence of discharged servants, servants, who are proverbially spiteful against their masters; and it is very necessary to be sure that you have an honest fellow, who has been turned out for no fault of his own, giving evidence, and not a spiteful man, who defends his being sent off for a real fault by a charge against his master.

10742. There has been nothing to make you think that such practices were common?—No. At Northallerton there was a case in which a Baptist minister was said to have been intimidated by his flock. He promised to sit still or engaged to sit still, and he changed his mind and voted for one of the candidates. He also did what I thought was a questionable proceeding on the part of a minister. I may be right or wrong; it is merely a private opinion, but he gave the use of his school to one side in politics, his congregation being divided; and some of his congregation said, "You have not sat still, you have changed your mind;" and in a fury they said, "We will not come here again." I thought that was rather in the nature of a squabble than of intimidation on either side, and I declined to avoid the election on that ground. Besides, by-the-bye, agency was not proved; but I should not have avoided the election, even if agency were proved; I thought it would be overstraining to call that intimidation. The only other case where intimidation was brought before me was at Tamworth, where it was said that Sir Robert Peel turned out several of his tenants, not because they would not vote for him, because I think he had a majority of between 300 and 400, and he was quite sure of his election, but because they would not vote for Sir Henry Bulwer: but I was satisfied, upon the evidence of Sir Robert Peel's agent, that the evidence of intimidation was false, and I did not believe it.

10744. Chairman] There were two points, I think, on which Mr. Baron Martin said that he thought you had formed an opinion that some alteration in the law might be expedient; one was the case of extravagant or unnecessary expenditure, which would not now invalidate an election unless accompanied by certain acts?—I am not sure of that; that is a question upon the construction, as I understand it, of the 3rd clause of the 2nd section of the Corrupt Practices Act, the 17th and 18th of Victoria, chapter 102. The 3rd clause of that section, as I read it, is more immediately directed against such a case as this: I will not refer to names, although I believe it is quite a notorious case; a case in which a gentleman was said to have given or promised to a person of influence 2,000 l., to be returned for an Irish borough. Probably everybody will recollect the case to which I refer; and this 3rd clause of the 2nd section seems, in the first instance, to be pointed against such a case as that: "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make any such gift, loan, offer, promise, procurement or agreement as aforesaid, to or for any person, in order to induce such person to procure, or endeavour to procure, the return of any person to serve in Parliament." That was the purchase of influence, the giving of a couple of thousand pounds to a person who was supposed to have the borough in his pocket. That is the sort of case against which the second section, I believe, was more immediately directed; but it goes on, "The return of any person to serve in Parliament, or the vote of any voter at any election." That is not like the previous clauses which deal with the case of giving the voter the money; this clause deals with giving any person money in order to induce any voter to vote; and if a candidate were to drive through the streets in an open carriage, and to fling about gold amongst the crowd with a view to have the voters, thinking they would make something out of him for the benefit of the place or of themselves, afterwards vote for him because of his wealth, I conceive, putting an extreme case (because I do not want to stop to find a more practical illustration), that that case ought to fall within the latter part of the 3rd section, "or the vote of any voter at any election."

10745. Mr. Villiers.] Whether the money was picked up by voters or not?—Whether it was picked up by voters or not, or whether he meant it to be picked up by voters or not.

10746. Sir George Grey.] It would be an expenditure made with the view of procuring his return or to induce persons to vote for him?—Either to procure his return or to get persons to vote for him; but I must add that I cannot call to mind an instance in which that clause has been so acted upon by a Parliamentary Committee, or that anybody has suggested that it was sufficient to meet even such a case as the second which I have enumerated.

10747. Mr. Villiers.] Has there not been a case of that sort in Ireland?—I am not aware. The first branch is clearly sufficient to meet the case of giving a sum of money to purchase influence.

10748. In the case that I am referring to it was the custom, I believe, for candidates to scatter money in the streets, and that was done on this occasion; but whether the proof was sufficient to unseat the Member I forget?—I am obliged to the Right honourable Member for the information. I thought I was putting a fanciful case, but that shows that it really may happen in a place where the manners are primitive.

10749. Sir George Grey.] I think I understood that you have formed an opinion, that if it should be proved that the gross expenditure of a candidate was of such an amount as in the opinion of the judge to be unreasonable or unnecessary, without any inquiry as to the character of the expenditure, or the manner in which it had been expended, and without any proof that it found its way, or any part of it, into the hands of any voter, the election should be voided on the presumption, I suppose, that it could not have been an honest expenditure?—I think the judge ought to come further to the conclusion that it was done in order to affect voters.

Sir J. S. Wilies. Knight.

10750. Then you would not rely simply upon the excessive amount of expenditure?—I think that would be evidence for the judge that it was done to obtain votes, and with respect to those circumstances I should arrive at the conclusion that it was done to make a glitter and a show, and induce people to vote for a man, because he was thought to have a great deal of money.

10751. You would take it as primâ facie evidence of corrupt expenditure, leaving it to the candidate to rebut that presumption if he was able to do so?—Yes.

10752. Chairman.] There was another point, I think, which Mr. Baron Martin said you had discussed with him this morning?—Perhaps I might now go on to the 23rd section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, about treating. I must mention with respect to treating that I do not believe in a man's vote being influenced,—this again is my private opinion; I have no experience in these election matters in any way except what I have picked up upon this last circuit, —I do not believe that a man's vote is influenced by treating any considerable time before the election. I have a notion, going back to the time when I might have been influenced by a person giving me a good dinner and good wine, that if a man plied me beyond what was hospitable, with a view to get my vote, I might be very much in his favour in the evening, but next morning I should be very much turned against him, and I am satisfied that a month after I might think him a contemptible person for having tried to win me so. I believe that the people who have votes are a great deal shrewder as to these matters than many give them credit for. I do not believe in the effect of treating people a long time before the election; but with respect to numbers of those who have been put upon the register under the Act of 1867, to speak plainly, I do believe in the effect of treating upon them whilst the simmer is on, and I should say with respect to that 4th section, that it seems to me to be too straight-laced, by reason of making corrupt intention essential; and with respect to the 23rd section, it has two defects; first of all, it is limited to the day of the nomination and the day of the poll. I think that is too short; I think a week at least might be allowed for the effect of the treating, and I also think that the 36th section, which at presents annuls an election on account of treating within the 4th section only, ought to be made to include the 23rd section, and that any person who gives voters drink within a short time before the election on account of their being voters, whether with a corrupt intention or not, ought to be held to do a thing which is so suspicious and so likely to lead to ill consequences, that his election ought to be voided.

10753. Mr. Villiers.] It must be more or less, must it not, with a view to influence a voter if you treat him?—Yes; not if you give money more or less. Litigation that can be avoided is a very bad thing; litigation, under this Act of 1868 especially, is to be avoided, and even the occasion of it is to be put down.

10754. Do not you think that the Legislature may have had a two-fold object, reducing the expenditure of the candidate as well as preventing corruption amongst the voters?—Certainly.

10755. Ought not you to discourage as much as possible anything that is unnecessary in the way of expenditure?—Undoubtedly, otherwise you give a rich dullard the advantage over a poor man of intellect.

10758. The effect of that would be to make the law as regards treating much more stringent and comprehensive than it is at present?—Yes. I believe, from what I have heard, rather than from what I have observed, that many candidates have acted upon that more stringent law, as being the true construction of the 4th section, and they may have suffered from it.

10759. You would also provide that an offence against the 23rd section should vacate the seat, as well as subject the offender to a penalty?—That it should vacate the seat as in the 36th section.

10760. Chairman.] Would not the mere prohibition of the use of public-houses for holding committee-rooms, and the closing of public-houses on the polling day, of itself do away with a very great part of the treating which now prevails?—I must say yes, if I am asked my opinion as to how, in fact, it would operate; but if the question means, whether I think it is practicable, that is quite another point.

10761. I want to know whether, from what you have heard, it did not appear that those two measures would do away not only with a large part, but such a large portion of the treating, that it would make it impossible?—The first measure seems to me good, if practicable.

10763. Sir George Grey.] Do you not think that committee-rooms cannot always be held at other places than public-houses?—No; I have in my mind cases in which I am satisfied that candidates did their best to get school-rooms, and other such places, to speak in, and, I think, at the last moment they were driven into public-houses, as being the only places they could get to be heard in; in fact public-houses were forced upon them by necessity.

10764. Mr. Villiers.] Because it is still legal to to hold committee-rooms at public-houses; but if it was forbidden, do not you think that rooms would very soon be provided for such occasions?—I have not sufficient practical knowledge to answer that question, but I would, if it were practicable, prohibit their being held at public-houses.

10765. Chairman.] Could you mention a place at which you were satisfied that they were driven to public-houses for the want of suitable accommodation?—Yes; Tamworth was one of those places; Sir Henry Bulwer went down to a place of the name of Fazeley, and tried to get a school-room, and was unable to get the school-room; it only turned out late in the day that he could not have it; and he then went to a place called the "Red Lion," as to which a vast deal of evidence was given, and then having once gone to a public-house, he went to another public-house, the "White Lion," I think, and went to public-houses and other places generally; at first he seems to have endeavoured to get a school, and I suppose, for some such reason as I have mentioned with respect to Northallerton, he could not get a school-room, and was driven to a public-house. The greater part of the evidence in that case consisted of evidence to show that a vast amount of drinking which took place at that and other public-houses was authorised by the candidate or his agent, and there was evidence on the other hand that it was supplied by the landlord without authority.

10766. Have you formed an opinion as to the present law of agency; would you like to see it altered in any manner?—I think that the present law of agency is quite intelligible, and quite just, and I should think that the Legislature must have had it in mind in framing the Act of 1868; and there is not only a series of decisions by Parliamentary Committees, to show that the law laid down by the judges has been according to the current opinion correct, but there is also an inference to be drawn from the 44th section of the Act of 1868, which, in describing certain persons by whom a Member is to be bound, says, "as a canvasser or agent for the management of the election." The law acted upon by the judges was, that a person employed to canvass is primâ facie an agent, who, if guilty of corruption in the course of the canvass, binds his Member to the forfeiture of his seat. That seems to be very much what the framers of the 44th section had in mind. As to what follows, "For the management of the election:" there would be an agent for the general management of the election as to whom there could be no doubt of agency; and if he were the agent for some particular department, in that department the Member would be answerable for the manner in which the agent conducted the business, or to put it in legal phraseology so long as what he did was an act intended for the benefit of the Member and in the course of his employment, the Member is bound by it, even although it should be done wrongfully as far as the general law is concerned, and even wrongfully as being against the authority of the Member, not in order to punish the Member, but in order that there may be a pure election, to hold terror over people who might be disposed to play tricks for the benefit of their employer, and to make candidates careful whom they employ.

10767. Sir George Grey.] Had you any difficulty in applying the law of agency to the evidence which was brought before you on the petitions which you tried?—No; at first, not being accustomed to try questions of fact, I had considerable qualms as to decisions upon questions of fact, and I may say that I acted upon the rule in dubiis quod minimum to begin with; but after having gained more experience in deciding questions of fact, I felt no difficulty in applying the law of agency.

10768. Do you think that the law of agency, as applied to Parliamentary elections, is substantially just?—I think it is just.

10769. Mr. Villiers.] Do you think that it affords sufficient protection to the candidate?—I think that it affords as much protection to the candidate as is consistent with having a pure election.

10771. If it were proved to you that a man actually had been employed as an agent, and that he had deliberately communicated with the other side, and committed some act of bribery to void the seat; if that had been brought before you should you have decided against the seat, or should you have deemed it insufficient to void it?—I should say that I certainly would not avoid the seat, for this reason, that fraud avoids all acts as against the fraudulent party. What he does must be within the general scope of his authority, and must be done for the benefit of his principal; but immediately he sells himself to the other side, he does some act in pursuance of a design of his own and for his own benefit, and then the principal is rid of him.

10772. But the evidence would be good, supposing some illegal act had been done to which he was a party, and he sells himself, or at least he conveys the information to the other side, that evidence being submitted to you would be sufficient, would it not; you would not look to the motive?—If confirmed, because I should say, "Here is a person who sells his evidence, and I will not act upon his evidence unless it is confirmed." I should probably say so. In a civil case you would not be bound to say so, but in a criminal case the jury would say so; it would be very difficult to give a universal answer, but, as a general answer, I should not rely upon the evidence of such a person, simply because I should account him unworthy of credit.

10773. It would be bad evidence, from the fact of his having been the guilty party himself?—No.

10774. It is assumed that he was an agent?—No; we admit that evidence, even in criminal cases, only the jury require it to be confirmed.

10775. Supposing a man, who is not an agent, commits any number of illegal acts on behalf of some friend, or on behalf of the candidate who is his friend, would that, in your view, invalidate the seat?—Yes, if his acts were so numerous as that you could say that there had been general corruption.

10776. Supposing a stranger enters a borough during the contest, and professes great interest in one of the candidates, and begins to expend his money freely, and to do sundry illegal illegal acts, and it is shown that this man has no recognised connection with the candidate, and there is no evidence of agency, but yet that illegal acts had been performed by him, would that invalidate the seat?—You must divide it into two heads: as matter of law, it would invalidate the election, if what he did amounted to general corruption. I will take an instance: take a small place; I wish to favour one of the candidates, and I go there with 2,000 l. in my pocket; I go through the streets at night, when the people are returning from their work, and I have somebody to nudge me and tell me who is a voter, and then I slip a sovereign into the hand of each one of them, and say, take care of so-and-so, whoever the candidate happens to be. If I were to do that, and to spend 2,000 l., no election could stand for the person for whom I did it, even although it was proved to demonstration that I was not his agent, and that he never wished me to be one.

Sir J. S. Willes, Knight.

10777. Supposing that instead of doing it in that clumsy manner it was done more effectually and carefully, yet being only a stranger, and choosing to spend his money in that way, or to use particular influence other than money, for the purpose of influencing the election?—If it be general corruption, then, in point of law, the election is avoided, for the reason stated by my Brother Martin with respect to Beverley. But further, if I found a person spending a large sum of money in favour of A. B., although I thought it did not amount to general corruption, if it was so large a sum that it was highly improbable but that it came from some person who was connected either with the candidate or his agent, I should conclude agency from the fact of the extreme improbability that anybody but an agent, or a person conniving with the agent, would have spent so large a sum in favour of A. B.

10778. Then it would be a constructive agency, and you would apply that to the seat, that is to say, you would apply the law assuming that the man was an agent?—Yes, concluding that he was an agent.

10779. You would assume that though there was not the least proof of agency, that he would not spend his money in that way without being an agent, still, for the very purpose he had in view, he would take care how he spent his money, and would be careful that you should not be able to say that he was an agent?—If I could not come to the conclusion either that he was an agent, or that there was general corruption, then his bribery would not avoid the election.

10780. How would it be with respect to intimidation; supposing any number of owners of land, or owners of houses, were to use their influence to induce men to vote for a candidate, and those persons should not even be known to the candidate, but that they had a preference for one colour over another colour, and to threaten those people that they would be turned out of their occupation if they did not vote for the persons they named, and evidence is laid before you of such influence so used, how would you regard it under the section against intimidation?—I should apply the same rule, only substituting intimidation for bribery. One ought to think of a third case, and that is, as to the effect upon the poll; of course, if it affected the poll, all the votes that were bribed would go off the poll.

10781. I am only speaking of one kind of intimidation; and I assume that people have used it, but with no connection whatever with the candidate?—The effect upon the poll is one thing, and the effect upon the election is another. Of course all the votes of bribed people, whether they were bribed for the person they voted for, or for the person against whom they voted, must go off the poll.

10782. That is supposing there was a scrutiny afterwards; but is there any responsible relation that you would assume to exist between such a person intimidating the tenant and the candidate?—I think there must be shown to be agency, or there must be shown to be intimidation so general as to affect the election.

10783. But particular intimidation may be exercised without the candidate suffering from it in any way?—Particular intimidation might be exercised. I know a landlord who gives a supper to his tenants upon the occasion of an election, but I cannot conceive that that would affect the election. Even assuming it to be treating, I cannot conceive that it would affect the election of the candidate for whom he voted, unless you could prove that such a person was an agent.

10784. Do you think that you could form any just idea of the general character of a borough from evidence that was submitted to you, considering that it is evidence only partially selected?—I think I could form a general, but not a complete one. In any proceeding of that kind, where peoples' passions and interests are so involved, at some period of the proceedings, which last over several days, there would be sure to come out something to show the judge if he had a feigned case before him. I think the judge generally must be able to make a pretty good guess, but not sufficient to arrive at a judicial conclusion as to what was going on in the borough.

10785. Do you consider that the inquiries that are now being instituted by judges after the elections are very imperfect in their character?—Yes, subject to what I was going to suggest, with reference to the fourth point, which I intended to draw attention to presently.

10786. I am referring to what Mr. Baron Martin said, that he was not able to follow up the inquiry into matters which might have disclosed a much more extensive system of corruption at Norwich and other places; you do not exactly believe all that is alleged before you, unless it is properly supported, and you do not profess to have what you may call an original jurisdiction upon the matter, for you do not institute any inquiry, you only listen to what is alleged before you, and that evidence usually from questionable sources?—I think that is not quite all; and with regard to that point, I may refer to a section of the Act of 1868, which seems to bear upon it. It is Section 32, and by that section on the trial of an election petition the judge may order any witness to attend, and he may examine that witness so ordered to attend, and direct his expenses to be paid. That section is a novelty. Generally speaking the judge is to listen to the evidence which is brought before him by the parties, and he is not to cast about for witnesses.

10787. This section, however, does give him the power?—Yes. He may suggest, of course, that such-and-such witness ought to be called by such-and-such parties, but, in ordinary cases, a judge would would be doing wrong if he were to call a witness of his own head, because he does not know the character of the person; he has no brief, and he does not know but that he may seriously injure the party in whose favour he may call the witness. It would make him a sort of litigant, whereas each of the parties is considered to be the dominus of his own case. This section altered that law in the particular to which your question is directed. It does apply so as to enable a judge where a matter is left doubtful upon the evidence, and where it is clear that a little inquiry may set it right, to say for instance to the inspector of the police, "You go to such a place, which has been mentioned, and see whether A. B., who is said to be away from home, really is away from home, and if he is there bring him here by gentle persuasion, and if he will not come I will issue my summons and have him brought here to be examined." And so to follow out some clue of evidence that has been presented, without tracing which to the end the judge cannot satisfactorily, to his own mind, decide the question which had been submitted to him by the parties, so far the 32nd section is sufficient. If you refer to the case of the Coventry election, you will find at the end of the judgment in that case a description of what resulted from having adopted that course. But then comes this sort of case. I will suppose some great proprietor, or employer of labour, to be guilty of a gross case of intimidation, and the judge's back being set up by it, and his feeling not only that it was a thing to observe upon from the bench, but that it ought to be exposed as an example, the judge has no power to put the 32nd section in force, although one cannot conceive of a case more proper, if the judge ever is to be turned into a prosecutor or inquisitor. No such case could be properly tried without a regular prosecution. What I should do in such a case as that would be to report to the Speaker that such a case had arisen, that it was expedient that the person should be made an example of, and that it should be submitted to the wisdom of the House whether they would not take steps to have the matter placed in the hands of the solicitor to the Treasury.

10788. In the report which you have made where the seat has not been voided, I think that you have not mentioned what you have observed with respect to the character of the witnesses, or indeed with respect to the character of the proceedings?—No; the case I put was an imaginary one, in which the judge ought to go out of his way if he were to be a censor, and not a judge, to notice a case of oppression.

10789. The real issue before you is the validity of the return?—Yes; the validity of the return; and I will conclude what I have to say upon this by observing, that if such a power is to be exercised by the court, it could only be at the instance of a public prosecutor; there is the Queen's Proctor to watch the Divorce Court, and it does seem strange if Parliament wished that done under the 32nd section, that with respect to the proceedings in the Divorce Court, all the expenses of secondary inquiries to enable the court to come to a right conclusion are to be defrayed, but that the election courts have no such officer. I do not recommend the appointment of one, but would leave such work to Commissions.

10791–2. Do you think that it is not right for a judge to act under the authority given by that 32nd section, except with a view to determining the precise issue which he has to try if he has made up his mind that he should not prosecute the inquiry further?—I think not, for one reason, amongst others, and that reason, although it is only a pecuniary one, would be sufficient to induce me not to do that which I was not bound to do in point of law; parties are put to very great expense by those inquiries, and it might take two or three days, or even weeks, to investigate the collateral matter, and the parties would be bound to attend with their counsel, and with their witnesses, in order to protect themselves against any possible conclusion at which the judge might arrive if he took such a course. Unless that is by law my duty, I think it is my duty to avoid imposing such a hardship.—(Sir Samuel Martin.) Perhaps I may be permitted to observe with respect to what Mr. Villiers was asking my Brother Willes about with regard to the interference of the judge, when parties to a suit were made witnesses, which is within the memory of all the Members of the Committee, it was supposed that there would be a good deal of perjury; and as a mode to prevent that, it was enacted that a judge should have power to direct that persons who gave false evidence should be prosecuted for perjury, and several provisions were made about it, and, amongst others, there was one that it was not to be stated to a jury, and that the matter was directed to be done by the judge; it is true that a vast deal of perjury has been introduced into this country by that law; when that law first came into operation several of the judges, and amongst others myself, committed persons for trial, but it was found utterly unavailing; the first thing that counsel did who defended a person, was to make out that the judge had ordered it, and then it was stated as a case of oppression, and therefore it turned out that the man was universally acquitted; so far from its being found any benefit or advantage, it was found to interfere with the real course of justice; I am satisfied myself that if the judge were to interfere in matters of that kind it would be found to have the effect that you expect.

10793. Sir George Grey (to Sir Samuel Martin).] I want to know whether in the Norwich case, if you had been in doubt as to whether the agency for the sitting Member had been proved so as to bring home bribery to him, you would have felt yourself authorised under that 32nd section to call a witness with a view to ascertain whether he was in any way connected nected with the sitting Member?—In that particular case if I had had an idea of any man in Norwich who could have given me information I would have had him called, because the person who was called as a witness was the man who presented the cheque, and the man who drew the cheque, and he was the person who proved the getting of the money. It was said to be an accident, but the clerk who paid him happened to be in court, and thereupon they called him next, and he, the clerk, gave an utterly contradictory account of how the money came to be given; but when those two witnesses were gone it was all exhausted, and that was all the information that I could get. I could not fix anyone whatever. The man said that the money was all spent for the private purposes of his inn, and so he was exhausted. Whether he spoke truly or falsely he knows best.

10794. Was there no other witness that you could lay your hand upon?—No, if I had had the least idea of any person who could have thrown any light upon the transaction I would have had him, for I was very much struck with the circumstance.

10796. You found that he kept an account at the bank?—Yes, the man had kept an account there. It was a check drawn by the innkeeper of the principal inn in Norwich.

10797. Sir George Grey (to Sir James Willes).] You have some alterations, have you not, to suggest in the 32nd section?—I think it is rather a matter of policy, and I do not recommend it, but only suggest that if the House wishes that a judge should be a censor or an inquisitor he ought to be furnished with a solicitor in order to make the 32nd section effective. I may further add that that is not the only section to which I refer. The 56th section is as to the Crown issuing a Commission upon the requisition of two electors, but there is, I need hardly say, the power of issuing a Commission upon the report of the judge, and under that Commission, if issued, a course may be taken which, as it appears to the judges who have hitherto conducted those proceedings, they ought not to take under the 32nd section, and that is to enter into a collateral inquiry into matters which it is not in the power of either party, but only of the Crown upon the address of both Houses, to issue Commissions to investigate. Commissioners have the means of collecting evidence through their secretary in the first instance; the judge has not.

10798. Mr. Hunt.] Mr. Baron Martin mentioned that you had made a suggestion to him that there might be a provision that the seat should be avoided upon the proof of unreasonable and unnecessary expenditure, even although it had not taken the form of bribery. What is the exact nature of your suggestion upon that point?—Nothing beyond declaring it, or if that be considered an inconvenient mode of legislating, enacting over again with an enlargement the 3rd sub-section of the 2nd section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, that is to say, that any extravagant expenditure of money in the sense of an unreasonable and unnecessary, or you may add of an unusual, kind by the candidate with a view to produce an effect upon the mind of the voters, and procure votes for him, should avoid the election.

10799. You would leave it to the judge to say whether the expenditure was unreasonable and unnecessary?—Yes.

10800. Might not the judges take a very different view of what was reasonable and necessary?—I think they would not; perhaps there might be a difference between them; but speaking of cases in which there really was an extravagant expenditure, I do not think that the judges would doubt. For instance, take this sort of case; take a case which I tried, in which two candidates were well known in the place, and the third was a stranger, who certainly went to a great deal of expense in introducing himself, by getting places for meeting, and making speeches at them, and so on, and in which his expenses were in hundreds, and I think must have come to nearly double those of either of the other candidates. I should not have said that that was an extravagant expenditure, because, coming from a distance, and being personally unknown, it was natural that he should have canvassed longer and spent more money in getting up meetings at which his qualities might be put before the electors; but if one candidate spends 500*l.* at an election, and another spends 5,000*l.*, one could not hesitate for a moment, unless some very distinct explanation were given.

10801. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you were satisfied with the law of agency as regards Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

10802. Do not you think there have been certain cases of hardship in many decisions by which a man is bound by the acts of his agent, for which he had given no authority whatever?—I must resort to the saying, "Hard cases make bad law." Hard cases will occur, but this is a case in which you must take care to keep the inferior agents in order, and you can only do that by terror; and the most wholesome terror you can hang over them is, that they will defeat their object if they break the law.

10803. Mr. Cross.] Do you know whether the Irish judges have taken the same view of agency as the English judges have?—Yes, thoroughly so: I observe that Mr. Justice Keogh, in one of his judgments, has gloried in the fact of the judges on both sides of the water having arrived at the same conclusions.

10804. There was a question asked by Mr. Hunt of Mr. Baron Martin about intimidation by ecclesiastical persons or spiritual intimidation; has such a point arisen in Ireland?—Yes, it has arisen there; you will find that Mr. Justice Keogh in the Drogheda case, page 324, deals very ably with that, and lays down very clearly that spiritual intimidation is within the 5th section; and I may add to what he said a very obvious illustration; as children are more afraid of ghosts than of being whipped, and inasmuch as whipping is intimidation, of course it is intimidation to say you shall be locked up in a dark room where you will see a ghost; and with respect to grown-up people, who are only grown-up children, those who believe that a certain ordained officer has power to affect what will become of them in a future world, and who are led to believe that he will exercise that power to their disadvantage unless they vote in a particular way, are very much in the same position as the child, who is more afraid of a ghost than of a whipping; and you must deal with people as they are.

10806. Could you make any suggestion as to diminishing the expense of these inquiries in any way?—I am afraid not; I think that that must be left to the taxing officer and to the judges when they have acquired more experience, and are able to form a judgment as to what is a reasonable scale of expenditure. If you refer to the 41st section of the Act of Parliament, it provides for rather a large scale of expenditure, because it speaks of costs being taxed upon the same scale as between solicitor and client in the Court of Chancery; and I need not tell the Committee that that is at once suggesting that there ought to be a very liberal allowance of costs. The judges have not yet felt themselves enabled by the amount of experience which they have had to frame any scale. We took pains, and Master Gordon took great pains, to get information to enable us to frame a scale; but after staying awake over it for some time, we thought it better to let the thing work itself into something like a practical shape, by seeing the result of the actual bills of costs before we ventured to lay down any rule.

10807. At present you are not prepared to suggest any alteration in the mode of taxing?—No, I think that must be left to the discretion of the judge and the taxing officer.

10808. Sir George Grey.] Have the taxed costs fallen very far short of the actual expenditure of the parties in petitions?—I am not able to answer that question, but I should think they did. There must have been a great number of collateral inquiries through agents that are not properly law agents, for the purpose of watching people, a detective system as it were, to find out bribery on the other side, and so forth.

10809. Is that a just comparison which is made between the taxed costs on petitions tried before a judge, and the actual costs incurred when petitions were tried by Committees?—Some costs, I take it, would not have been allowed by the Taxing Master of the House of Commons any more than by our officer; though they are occasioned by the election, they are not properly the costs of the petition.

10810. Have you formed any opinion as to the comparative expense of the trial of a petition before a judge, and the trial of a petition before a Committee, taking into account the whole of the expenditure, irrespective of taxed costs?—I cannot give any opinion of my own, but only what I collect from the papers. At first it was suggested that the expense of the proceedings before the judges would be more than the expenses before Committees, but I see that latterly some copies of bills of costs that have been taxed have been given, and a contrary opinion has been expressed, that they are rather less expensive. Witnesses made a chief item of expense, and they are now examined on the spot where most of them live.

10811. Mr. Cross.] I think you said there was some difficulty at first in deciding upon questions of fact in these election matters?—Yes, in my own mind there was.

10812. Would it, or would it not, be convenient or satisfactory to a judge to have, say four Members of the House, associated with him?—Beyond anything. I think two would be sufficient; four would be too many, because you could not well talk to them if there were two on each side. The sort of person that occurs to me at present, is Sir John Duckworth. I do not exactly know what position he occupies, but I think he assists the House in an office in which former Members of the House are engaged, as a referee. I should like very much if there could be an officer of that kind, not chosen as a lawyer, but chosen as a practical man.

10813. Sir George Grey.] Should he be a Member of the House?—I should not object to a Member of the House.

10814. But not necessarily a Member of the House?—No, not necessarily a Member of the House. I mentioned Sir John Duckworth, because I believe he was a man of great experience as a Member, and was selected to fill the position of referee in consequence of that, and I suppose there are a great number of others.

10815. Mr. Cross.] I was rather putting it, that two or more Members of the House, an equal number on each side, should be chosen to decide those matters of fact, the judge sitting as assessor?—It would be the greatest possible relief to me personally, and would, I think, very much fortify the tribunal.

10816. Sir George Grey.] Merely to give an opinion upon matters of fact?—Yes, merely upon matters of fact.

10817. What would you say in the case of an equal division?—Then, I think, you would have to give the judge a casting voice. I think a judge is a sort of personage that people would be satisfied should have sway if there were to be a division.

10818. Mr. Cross.] But would you still have the inquiry local in the town?—I think that the locality of the inquiry is very important.

10819. Mr. Hunt.] At the places where you have held inquiries, have you heard satisfaction expressed at the inquiry being on the spot?—I think it must be so. A man connected for a moment with a cure is sure to vaunt it, so that I can really hardly answer that question. I think, so far as I can judge, there has been general satisfaction expressed with the working of the Act; and I think even those who are against it say it is rather better than matters were before, but beyond that I cannot say.

10820. Mr. Whitbread.] I wish to call your recollection to an answer which you gave sometime ago, in which you said, I think, that expenditure for drink by a publican, with the hope of getting it paid by a candidate after the election was over, if it was so paid by the candidate, probably would invalidate the election?—Ought to invalidate the election. I said that the better opinion was that such ratification would be equivalent to the original treating. There is a ruling of Baron Alderson's, at Nisi Prius, to that effect, and it has been so dealt with I observe in the books (Bayntun v. Cattle, 1 Moody & Robinson, 265, 269). I think the tendency of opinion is so. I should like to consider the matter, if it arose before me, a little more before delivering judgment upon it; but that is my impression.

10821. You think that that case could not be tried tried if the judgment of the election judge had been given upon a petition?—No, not under this Act.

Sir J. S. Willes, Knight.

29 June 1869.

10822. Is it sub-section 13 of section 11 which leads you to that conclusion?—No, it is because there is no section in the Act to the contrary, and the general rule is that a judgment once pronounced exhausts the jurisdiction of the judge. There was an instance in which a county court judge refused a new trial, and afterwards changed his mind and sent for the parties, and said, "I grant a new trial;" but he was prohibited from doing so, because having once expressed his opinion judicially, it being a case in which there was no appeal, his functions were exhausted.

10823. Will you refer to section 6 of the Act of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, which speaks of any payment made "in pursuance or in furtherance of such corrupt practices, in which case the petition may be presented at any time within 28 days after the date of such payment"?—That refers, I think you will find, to bribery only; at least, I have read it so. "The petition shall be presented within 21 days after the return has been made to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery in England, or to the clerk of the Crown and Hanaper in Ireland, as the case may be, of the Member to whose election the petition relates, unless it question the return or election, upon an allegation of corrupt practices." You find it begins with that, but now read on and see how it is pointed: "and specifically alleges a payment of money or other reward to have been made by any Member, or on his account, or with his privity, since the time of such return, in pursuance or in futherance of such corrupt practices; in which case the petition may be presented at any time within 28 days after the date of such payment." I believe that the true construction to be put upon that is, that it applies to the case of bribery only. It may be that what has crossed your mind that it applies to payment for drink would fall within this section, but my impression is that it is limited to bribery.

10824. Assuming that it is limited to bribery, do you think that sub-section 13 of section 11 would prevent a second petition being presented for it, assuming that the payment was made after the first petition was tried?—Yes, and I think you will find that that opinion was expressed in effect by the Court of Common Pleas in the second Taunton case (not reported amongst the judgments printed for the House), in the 38th Law Journal, Common Pleas, 195.

10825. Do you think it would be desirable to alter the law, so that at any time if a corrupt act is performed it should be within the power of an elector to present a petition?—I think the answer to that would be, that if it were what lawyers call res noviter ad notitiam veniens, if it was matter discovered of so secret a kind that no diligence could have brought it forward in the first instance, it might be proper that it should be brought forward, and perhaps in punishment of the Member, if it should turn out to affect him personally, it might be allowed to be brought forward at any time. But this second clause of the 6th section is only in pursuance of, and an adoption in substance of, the Sessional Orders of the House, made, I think, even before the Grenville Act, and certainly made ever since the Grenville Act.

10826. I will assume this case. Supposing a petition is presented and tried against a Member, and that he does not lose his seat under this Act, do you think it possible that he should pay there and then to a large class of voters, to the freemen or any other class who may be supposed to be more corrupt, head-money, and that he could not be brought to account for it?—He probably could under this Act, in case of bribery. You will observe that bribery is divided into two heads. It speaks of personal bribery, a payment to anybody in order to obtain his vote, and a corrupt payment to anybody of money, because of his having voted.

10828. You do not think that this 13th sub-section of clause 11 would prevent the presentation of another petition?—I think not in that particular case; I should think that it must be read with the exception of the 2nd section.

10831. Mr. Whitbread.] As a matter of opinion, if it is so in a case of direct bribery; do not you think that the Act should be extended so as to include the case which you referred to before, of paying a publican after the petition had been decided, for treats that had been given during the election?—I must at once admit that I do not look upon treating as so hateful a thing as bribery. I rather sympathise with the distinction. Unless treating can be brought forward in time for an ordinary petition, I think it wiser to say no more about it; but with respect to bribery, whenever it is found out for the first time it ought to be brought up.—(Mr. Baron Martin.) With reference to what you have been asking Mr. Justice Willes, you must take into consideration a matter not contained in the Act of Parliament at all. It is a principle of the law of England, that when once a transaction has been investigated and ended, the circumstance that some things are not known and not produced at the investigation, has no effect whatever upon it. As a general rule, the law of England treats a thing, when once determined, as being ended. For instance, if an action be brought against a man and he had the best possible defence to it, but he did not happen to make use of it, and it was not brought forward, by the law of England, when once a decision was come to, the circumstance of that evidence existing has no effect whatever. When once a thing is brought forward and tried there is an end of it.

10832. Mr. Whitbread (to Sir James Willes).] But the question was, where acts had been done after the petition had been decided; and I want to know whether you have considered that clause as to the possibility of a new petition being presented?—I should assent to what my Brother Martin says; but, with the exception of res noviter ad notitiam veniens, which is excluded by a technical rule of common law after judgment, but may be considered upon a rehearing in other tribunals.

10833. Sir George Grey.] In the case supposed it is not what comes to knowledge recently, but the act itself has not been committed until the Member thinks that it is quite safe, the petition against him having been decided?—My impression is (I must state it with reserve, because others have to form an opinion upon it and to correct it), but my impression is, that that second clause of the 6th section means to give an independent petition in respect of an act done after the election, and that the act so pointed at is a corrupt payment under the 2nd section of the 17th & 18th of Victoria, chapter 102, as a reward for having voted. I incline to think that that is a ground of an independent petition, and I should think that it was not controlled by the 13th clause of the 11th section. I ought to add, in explanation, that this all turns upon whether section 6, sub-section 2, gives, as I have hitherto supposed, an independent remedy in respect of a new act of bribery after the election, or only extends the time of petitioning in respect of corrupt acts complete at the time of election, but followed out by subsequent payment. Upon reflection, I am not at all sure but that what Mr. Whitbread suggested is the correct view. To prevent doubt, the section ought to be amended.

10834. The O'Conor Don.] In case a candidate is defeated at an election, and petitions against the successful candidate, but does not pray for the seat, is it the case that there can be no inquiry at that election trial into the conduct of that candidate?—That is so.

10836. And supposing he be successful after that petition has been tried, can a petition be presented against the second return for acts done at the first election?—Yes, provided it be during the same Parliament. If you observe, the 36th section says, if he "shall be declared by any Election Committee" (that means now the judge) "guilty by himself or his agents of bribery,' &c. "at such election, such candidate shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for such county, city, or borough during the Parliament then in existence." The result of that is, that if you have not an opportunity of bringing the matter forward against him on the first petition, you may bring it forward against him if he subsequently becomes the Member; and that has been repeatedly held by Parliamentary Committees.

10838. (To Sir James Willes.) Supposing there are two candidates on the same side sitting for a borough in which there are two seats, and supposing they had but one committee, and employed the same agents, and that one of those candidates is successful and the other is not at the election, and a petition is presented against the successful candidate and he is unseated for bribery, and he of course is therefore incapable of sitting again, would the other candidate who employed the same agents be incapable of standing as a candidate at the next election?—He could not hold the seat upon petition, if one of his agents had been guilty of bribery at the first election as his agent; I assume from the question that the candidates had a common cause, because their committees were the same and their agents the same.

10839. I am assuming that there are two candidates, A and B, standing for a constituency C; and there are two seats; A is successful, and B is unsuccessful, but both A and B have employed exactly the same agents, and have had the same committee: A is found guilty of bribery through his agents, and A is therefore incapable of standing again for that constituency. Can B stand again for that constituency at the new election, by the fact of his not coming before the judge at all?—No, for this reason, that bribery committed by his agents at the first election may be brought up against B upon a petition during that Parliament.

10842. In the case that I have put, would it be necessary to go into the trial of the whole case again, or could the decision of the judge, we will say in the first election against his colleague, who had the same agents as himself and the same committee, be put in as a final decision against him?—No, it would be res inter alios; it would have to be all tried over again. The decision of the judge would be final as to the last election, because, as to that, it would be a decision in rem; but but his decision as to the conduct of the parties would be irrelevant; it would be a matter to be litigated between other parties.

29 June 1869.

10843. Sir George Grey (to Sir Samuel Martin).] You stated that you tried 13 cases?—Yes.

10844. And Mr. Justice Willes 10?—Yes.

10846. Were costs asked for in all the cases?—In the southern division of the West Riding they were not; and they were not asked for in the Warrington case; they were asked for in the Westminster case to a certain extent. I think they were not asked for generally, but they were asked for upon the allegation that the Member, that is Mr. Smith, had charges made against him which were groundless, and that he had been put to great expense for the purpose of investigating them.

10847. (To Sir James Willes.) In how many of the cases that you tried did the costs follow the event?—In five cases the costs absolutely followed the event; in one the parties agreed not to ask for costs on either side; in one the costs of one Member followed the event, and the costs of the other were refused; in three cases the costs did not follow the event.

10848. In the majority of the cases the costs have followed the event?—Yes, that is the general rule.

10849. Mr. Cross.] You stated, did you not, that the law of agency was perfectly satisfactory?—I do not think I used that expression; hardly anything is perfectly satisfactory.

10850. But for all practical purposes?—Yes.

10851. As to what constitutes agency, is it satisfactory?—I think so.

10853. What constitutes an employment; a man merely being upon a committee would not make him an employé, would it?—I think that a man's being upon a committee is evidence of agency; but then you must come to the conclusion whether the man is a mere name; take the committee for the Oxford and Cambridge Universities, for instance. It is only evidence, but Lord Kenyon treated a person's acting on an ordinary committee as a proof of agency. May I add one word before I conclude; it is the only point upon which I have not been asked, and as to which I wish to say something; it is with reference to the 11th section of the Representation of the People Act, 1867. I do not know whether I ought to state it, but I think that that is an exceedingly lame section; it is the section which takes away votes from voters who are employed by a candidate at an election, but it does not avoid the election, and it does not include treating, and in both those particulars I should say that that section was nugatory. I think that there ought to be no payment or treating of committees or canvassers. I ought, also, to apologise, that I did not at an earlier part of my examination say that I thought that the pretence of giving committee-men reasonable refreshment ought to be taken away. What I refer to is the Representation of the People Act, 1867, chapter 102, section 11, "No elector who within six months before or during any election for any county or borough shall have been retained, hired, or employed for all or any of the purposes of the election for reward, by or on behalf of any candidate at such election as agent, canvasser, clerk, manager, or in other like employment, shall be entitled to vote at such election, and if he shall so vote he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." At Southampton my attention was called to that section, and certainly it appeared to me to be quite insufficient, because the voters will vote, and it is a chance whether it turns up that they have been paid, and if it does turn up, then, for the reason stated by my Brother Martin, no one would take the trouble of indicting them.

10855. Chairman.] You think that it ought to avoid the election?—Yes, it ought to avoid the election; it involves colourable employment of the worst sort, for it gives plausible means of silencing voters.

10856. When you said that the section does not include treating, what did you refer to?—Because it says, "shall have been retained, hired, or employed for reward." By treating, I meant treating in the sense of paying a man in drink, and not in money.

10857. You would not allow any person to vote who had received drink or meat at the expense of a candidate?—No; for work done by him for the candidate.

10858. Sir George Grey.] How could you make the election void, supposing the candidate had no control whatever over the agents that he has employed; they may come up and vote without his knowledge?—If you will turn to the Lambeth case you will find what I mean. The Committee there had great difficulty in dealing with the case of a candidate who employed and paid certain of his committee-men, and certain of his canvassers who were voters, and they came to the conclusion that the case was not made out; unless the sum of money was so much larger than the services really represented that it was to be treated as a colourable employment.

Sir J. S. Willes, Knight.

10859. I am supposing a bonâ fide employment of an agent or a canvasser. Supposing that person who has been paid for his services comes and votes with the knowledge of the candidate, would you render the candidate's seat void on account of the voter who, under those circumstances, is guilty of a misdemeanor, without the knowledge of the candidate?—No, that would come within the 36th section as a misdemeanor, if it were with the knowledge and consent of the candidate or his agent. (Sir Samuel Martin.) I have reason to believe that you will find a book published in a very short time which will give you the whole of the statements of the three judges with respect to agency.

10860. Mr. Hunt.] Will that be with the authority of the judges?—It will be printed out of the published book of the judgments. (Sir James Willes.) It is in very good hands; it is by Mr. Chandos Leigh, a very competent man, who was counsel in some of those inquiries.

10861. Mr. Whitbread (to Sir Samuel Martin).] Do you see any objection to two questions being put to the voter by the returning officer, with a view to rejecting his vote; first, whether he has been a paid agent; and, secondly, whether he has received any money?—The first Reform Act gave three questions; but by 6 Vict. c. 18, in consequence of the inconvenience of putting questions at the poll, one of those questions has been struck out, which was as to whether the voter's qualification continued. I think that the general opinion is, that the fewer the questions put the better.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN FOSTER VESEY FITZGERALD, was called in; and Examined.

2 July 1869.

10862. Chairman.] YOU are acquainted with some of the Australian colonies, are you not?—I was Colonial Secretary in Victoria for a long time, and Treasurer, and I have acted as Returning Officer under the ballot, and have been elected both under the system of open voting and under the ballot.

10863. How long have you been acquainted with Victoria?—Since 1841. I was one of the earliest settlers there.

10864. When was the ballot introduced there?—The ballot was introduced there in the year 1856, I think.

10865. Have you formed any opinion as to the working of the ballot in Victoria?—Yes. Of course the Committee do not wish me to go into the details, as they have had them all from Mr. Verdon. I was present during his examination, and I corroborate everything he has said as to the details. There are one or two points which he scarcely brought out in sufficient relief, and in those I know that he quite agrees with me. I should wish to corroborate him particularly as to the absence of any venality in Victoria at any time either before or since the ballot. Anyone who knows the circumstances of the Colony knows that before the ballot was introduced, a seat in Parliament was no object to any man, and that nobody would bribe, and, as a matter of fact, bribery did not exist to any extent.

10866. Were there any corrupt practices which existed previous to the adoption of the ballot?—There was some mob intimidation on the day of the election, and, as you have heard it said, there was treating on one or two occasions, but I do not know that it went to any extent. My impression is that it did not, but there was decidedly mob intimidation at the taking of the poll, and once or twice very serious rioting.

10867. Have you formed any opinion as to whether there has been any bribery since the adoption of the ballot?—I do not think there has; I have heard of one or two cases, but very few; I do not attach any value to them. There was one man unseated for bribery, and a case of individual bribery was proved, but it has not been practised to any extent.

10868. Sir George Grey.] It was not the system before?—No; I think I can satisfy the Committee on that point at once. I know that Mr. Childers made a speech, saying that it was so, but I think he was mistaken. I was myself a member for several years, but it was a compliment to the constituency to go; the difficulty was to find a candidate. No man would have bought voters; there was seldom a contest. A very few months after the erection of Victoria into a separate colony, the gold was discovered, and nobody attended to politics at all, and the amount of wealth in the lower orders was such that nobody would have thought of bribing. The ballot was introduced a few months before our present constitution was introduced, about twelve months, I think; so that, up to the time of the institution of the ballot, I am perfectly satisfied that though there may have been an individual case of bribery, it was impossible that it could have existed extensively.

10869. Chairman.] Is much interest taken now in the elections in Victoria?—Yes, very great.

10871. To a certain extent the inducement to bribery does exist now?—Yes, no doubt.

10872. But nevertheless, is there a class of voters who are of the same character as that which is here supposed to be open to bribery?—Not to the same extent; the lower orders are very well off, their wages are very high, and though I am very far from saying that there may not be venal individuals among them, the state of things is very different from what it is here among the lower orders.

10873. Do you think it would be possible or probable that any candidate who was disposed to bribe would find the means of doing so now?—Not as a general rule; I do not think that many would take it, they are so well off.

10874. I mean as to the system of the ballot, would the ballot make it more easy or more difficult in your opinion to bribe a large number of voters?—It renders it more difficult certainly to bribe individual voters; but the great objection which I have always seen to the ballot, though in the main I am a friend to it, is that I think it is very hard to detect wholesale bribery under it.

I think

I think it would be open to a candidate to make an arrangement with the leaders of clubs and bodies of men, and to say, "I will pay so much after the election is over, if I am returned;" I do not see any check upon that, and if the voting is kept secret, I do not see how it is possible to detect it; that is an objection that I feel in my mind to the ballot.

10875. Mr. Villiers.] Do you apply that only to one candidate, or several seeking the represent tation of the same place?—It would apply equally to both.

10876. Do you think that they would both make the same offer?—They both might; A might make an offer, and B might make an offer; but if A made an offer and got 100 pledged to vote in favour of the Reds, or the Blues, or any other colour, I do not see how you are to know whether they give their vote to one candidate or to the other.

10877. We are talking about the action which it would have upon the voters when such offers as those were made; they would not know, perhaps, which was the best offer for them to choose, but there may be two or three candidates, and each would make an offer through the leader of some kind; how do you view the result of that?—I am afraid that those venal men would vote for the highest bidder.

10879. But in the case of a proceeding against a candidate for bribery under open voting, it is necessary to prove something more than that any individual voter has voted for any particular candidate; it is necessary to prove that he has been paid money, is it not?—Certainly, but in my observation I was speaking of the proceeding to set aside an election; that a petitioner would think twice before he incurred the certain and heavy expense of lodging a petition if he was not, in the first instance, perfectly certain that the man whose vote he was going to impugn had voted against him.

10880. Is it not possible, in the Victorian system, to ascertain after the election, if necessary, how each voter has voted?—Not without a petition to the House demanding a scrutiny, and I should think that it is a great discouragement to a candidate to demand a scrutiny and to challenge votes when he really does not know how they have been recorded.

10881. Sir George Grey.] The candidate does not know if there is no record kept of the votes, unless the elector tells him himself how each voter has voted?—He does not, but it is very discouraging to the candidate.

10882. Do you know of more than one petition being lodged?—I do not, on the ground of bribery.

10883. Chairman.] As to personation, in your opinion has the ballot any effect in making it more easy or more difficult?—I do not think that it has any effect in making it more easy or more difficult; but if it has taken place, my last observation would apply to personation also, that unless you know how a man has recorded his vote, I do not see how you are to amend the return by a scrutiny.

10884. You have already said, I think, that the ballot has had some effect in checking mob intimidation?—Yes, entirely, 10885. The elections are now very quiet?—Yes, very quiet indeed.

10886. Although great interest is felt in them?—Yes; and I attribute it to the circumstance that the whole mode of taking the poll now is such as to allay excitement; it is very different from what it is in this country, where there are opposing mobs cheering a man as he records his vote for A or for B. In Victoria, if I may use such an expression, it is the most dead-alive proceeding I ever saw; a man walks into the room and nobody sees what he does; he puts his piece of paper into the box, and when he goes out there is no excitement whatever.

10887. Is it a convenient and an expeditious form of voting?—I think it is about as expeditious as open voting; I do not see any difference in that respect, the same questions have to be put to each voter, and it takes only a few seconds to score out the name, not much longer than to pronounce the name vivâ voce.

10888. The absence of a crowd or excitement makes the proceedings go on much faster, I suppose?—Yes, no doubt.

10889. Is there any intimidation by the ministers of religion on either side?—I have heard it said that the Roman Catholic priesthood exercised influence, but I cannot say that I know it of my own knowledge; I know it is popularly so reported.

10891. That was the result of a canvass?—Yes; that was the result of their local knowledge and canvass. I mention that to show that the people really do not care to conceal their votes there at all; it is a mode of taking the poll, which is very facile, and which does admit of accuracy, but as a matter of fact nobody cares about secrecy.

10892. But if any particular voter had any personal object in concealing his vote it would be possible for him to do so?—Clearly.

10893. And probably even in Victoria there may be a few who, for one reason or another, have such a desire?—No doubt.

10894. Does canvassing go on to anything like the same extent as it does here previous to the election?—No, not so much. The general mode of canvassing there is to hold public meetings for the candidates to address their constituents, and to subject themselves to a public catechism. I do not think that the candidate does personally canvass much there; his friends may go round about among their own immediate neighbours, but certainly not to the extent that it goes on here.

Mr. J. F. V. Fitzgerald.

10895. It is not considered indispensable that the candidate should personally visit each voter?—No, and as a rule the candidate does not; he has not the time; the constituencies are very large, and very scattered.

10896. Was there any strong feeling manifested in Victoria in favour of the adoption of the ballot?—There was in political circles; I do not think that anybody felt that it was very necessary. It seems to me to be an imported party cry from the country; but I would add while I am upon this point, that what was called the Conservative party there who opposed it as a general rule, have become completely converted to it from their experience. In fact, the only opponents to it now seem to be the Roman Catholic party.

10897. Sir George Grey.] Why was it imported as a cry if there was no bribery, or anything of that sort?—I really think it was a watchword imported from this country; I do not think that there was any evil to correct except that of mob intimidation.

10898. Chairman.] What are the circumstances which have converted the previous opponents of the ballot to be in favour of it?—The quietness and good order of the elections, the convenience of the system, and the suppression of the mob intimidation which they felt. I know that is what I feared, and the ballot has completely cured it.

10899. Do you yourself think that there are any advantages in open voting which are not accomplished by the ballot?—The great advantage that I see in open voting is what I have just mentioned, that I think it gives great facility in amending a fraudulent return, whether brought about by personation or by bribery.

10900. Should you then, from your personal experience of the Colony, be in favour of collecting the votes, in the first instance, by the means of the ballot, and then afterwards publishing a list?—That is a suggestion which I intended to make to the Committee. It seems to me that, if the Parliament here should deem it necessary to to make an alteration in the present system, and did not see their way to going the whole length of the ballot, the maximum of benefit might be derived by a suggestion of that sort. The collection of the poll by the ballot has very great advantages, and it puts an end to the mob intimidation that I mentioned, and it would certainly put an end entirely to that which is known here as afternoon bribery, about three o'clock, when people cannot make up their minds. If, after the ballot, the votes were to be published, it would afford all the facilities that open voting does for the detection of bribery and the amending of the return.

10901. Sir George Grey.] That would altogether destroy the secrecy of the voting?—Yes, entirely; a week after the poll. It strikes me that it would also very much diminish, although it would not entirely destroy, the intimidation of landlords or employers, because a man in cool blood, a week after the election, is not apt to fulfil the threats which perhaps on the spur of the moment he might use.

10902. Chairman.] Would such a suggested alteration be for a moment entertained in Australia?—No, I do not think it would.

10903. All parties would reject it?—Yes, I think they would; I do not think there is the same cause for introducing it there as there is here; because my only object is to detect bribery, which, according to the evidence before the Committee, does not exist there.

10904. As to the effect of such a system upon intimidation, although the landlord, or other person exercising influence, might not proceed to put his threats into execution, would there not still be the fear of such intimidation acting upon the voter?—No doubt there would; and I do not at all suggest this plan on the ground of secret voting, but only if the Committee did not adopt the ballot, it seems to me that this plan would embrace a great deal of the advantage without any of the objections that the opponents of it urge.

10905. Are you acquainted with the system of the ballot in Tasmania?—It is very nearly the same as that in Victoria.

10906. Have you seen the working of it personally?—I have not personally seen it, I have heard of it.

10907. Are you acquainted with the fraud which goes by the name of the Tasmanian Dodge?—Yes; and I must take the opportunity of saying that there was a suggestion made here the other day by Mr. Whitbread, of having consecutive numbers attached to each of the balloting papers, and it seems to me that that meets such a case.

10908. Would not that very much delay the voting?—Not much; we all know how rapidly railway tickets are issued with a stamp affixed to them; I do not see that it would affect it much. I have brought down with me a book which has just been published in Tasmania by Mr. Martineau which mentions it. He sent it home in some letters to the "Spectator" newspaper, and he there mentions the fact that the Dodge was successfully perpetrated there.

10909. Do you believe that it has been practised to any very great extent?—I understand that it was, but it was a mere hearsay, and Mr. Martineau mentions it.

10910. Are you aware whether it still continues, or has it been put a stop to?—I do not know.

10911. Do you know whether any attempt has been made to stop it?—It was only about 12 months ago that it was attempted; and I do not know whether any elections have taken place since.

10912. And you think that some such plan as that suggested by Mr. Whitbread might meet that case?—Yes, I do.

10913. Are there any other points which you wish to mention to the Committee?—There are one or two points in which I think the system in Victoria might be made more perfect, and if the Committee will allow me I will mention them. This is an instance which came within my own knowledge of what might occur where there are a number of candidates to be elected, such as in the city of Melbourne, where at one time four candidates had to be elected. Some of the very best men in the colony were candidates, and some that were utterly unknown; and the result was that the least known of any, whose candidature was in fact a laughing-stock, came in, by a very large majority, at the head of the poll; and the three or four of the very best men in the colony, for whose return their partizans were most anxious, were running within one, two, or three of each other.

10914. What was the cause of that?—The cause cause was that, having four votes to dispose of, a man thought that he might safely throw away his vote upon an utterly unknown man who nobody thought had the smallest chance.

10915. Mr. Villiers.] But they knew the others?—Yes, they knew the others; and the men who would almost have laid down their lives to get in their own favourite candidate, not knowing that they were in jeopardy, threw away their votes.

10916. Then it was a question between those that they knew something of and those that they did not?—No; not that exactly.

10917. Sir George Grey.] You mean, that a man having four votes, gave two votes to the two candidates whom he was anxious of bringing in, and threw away the other two, as he supposed, in voting for candidates that he knew nothing about rather than give them to the two candidates who were well known, but whom he did not wish to be returned?—It was from ignorance of the state of the poll during the day.

10918. Chairman.] If they had known the state of the poll they would have plumped or given only one or two votes for their favourite candidates?—Certainly.

10919. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to that?—I see none, except not to have too many members allotted to a single seat.

10920. Is it an exceptional case in Victoria that there are four members for one constituency?—It has been done away with now. Melbourne has since that time been divided into three constituencies.

10921. Sir George Grey.] Is a voter obliged to give the same number of votes as there are vacancies?—No.

10922. Might he not what we call plump here?—Yes, certainly.

10923. But the practice is not to do so, is it, because why should not they, if they wanted to throw away their votes, have abstained from giving them at all?—They might; but I am speaking of an instance of the evil of not knowing the state of the poll; of course they might do so.

10924. Mr. Villiers.] Is it not rather a proof of the state of the people who voted upon that occasion; surely no intelligent man would have given his vote in that way, if you state the facts correctly?—I not know that. A person might wish to oblige do another.

10925. You state that although those two candidates were decidedly the favourites, and all the voters wished to return them, they took the course which was precisely opposed to that, and which any intelligent man would see was opposed to it?—They ought to have seen it, no doubt; but I think that they never dreamed that their own candidates were in any jeopardy.

10926. Chairman.] Is there any other point which you wish to mention to the Committee?—Yes. We have two classes of voters: those whose names are inserted on the ratepayer's roll, and others who are registered in virtue of their manhood, as we call it. The latter class have certificates issued to them which they must produce at the time they poll; I have heard of a candidate at an election purchasing up a large number of those certificates, and keeping them till the day of the polling, which gives him a very undue influence over the voters; in fact, as they cannot vote without producing it, unless he can make them all sure on the day of the polling, he does not give it back to them. With the permission of the Committee I will hand in this certificate.

2 July 1869.

[The same was delivered in, and is as follows:—]

No. 111314.

ELECTOR'S RIGHT.

Electoral District of } Grenville. Buninyong Division.

RESIDENTIAL QUALIFICATION.

THE holder hereof, John Warrington Rogers, of Buninyong, whose name is signed hereunder, is entitled, being duly enrolled, to vote at elections of members of the Assembly, in the above division of the above district, being qualified in respect of manhood and of residence in such division.

Daniel Oliver, Registrar.
J. W. Rogers, above named.

The 23rd day of July A.D. 1863.

10927. Sir George Grey.] Does that number correspond with the number on the register of voters, or what does the number designate?—I really cannot say; no doubt it does correspond with the register.

10928. Are these issued to every elector who has a right to vote?—Yes.

10929. Chairman.] He has to obtain this?—Yes, he has to obtain it, and he has to produce it upon the poll.

10930. How does a candidate buy up these certificates?—Through the means of agents long before the election (it may be 12 months before) he obtains possession of them by some negotiation.

10931. They must be bought separately from the individual voters?—Yes, and then the voter is in the power of the candidate or the agent, or whoever chooses to buy them up.

10932. How is this plan worked; we have only at present got as far as the candidate buying up those certificates?—He retains them until the day of the poll, and unless he has very good reason to think that the voter intends to vote for him in the course of a quarter-of-an-hour afterwards, he retains the certificate, and the voter cannot vote at all.

10933. If he has reason to think that the voter will vote for him, what does he do?—He hands it back to him, and the voter goes up and votes.

10934. But he must give the proper certificate back to the proper voter?—Clearly.

10935. Sir George Grey.] When are those certificates issued to the voters?—At the time of the registration, which may be a year before the time of the poll.

10937. Supposing he cannot write?—I do not remember the provision for that; but that is the rule; the returning officer compares the signatures; it is a rough mode of identification; there is no doubt that the handing of this electoral right to A B, if he is not the genuine man, affords a facility for personation; the possession of the electoral right is a sort of primâ facie evidence.

2 July 1869.

10938. Sir George Grey.] When is the signature of the voter attached to that certificate?—At the time of registration.

10939. Supposing the voter cannot write, can he obtain such a certificate?—There is some way of doing it, but I do not recollect how it is done; I believe he can.

10940. But in those cases the comparison of the handwriting would be useless?—Perfectly.

10941. Mr. Cross.] Has the voter to sign it every year?—Yes, I think so.

10942. Chairman.] Has he to obtain a fresh certificate every year?—Yes.

10944. Probably the trouble of going to get it is of more importance to the man than the payment of the shilling?—Most decidedly.

10945. Have you any idea what sums are paid by candidates for the purpose of buying up those tickets?—No, I have not; I have only heard of its being done in one or two instances; I apprehend that he would pay very little.

10946. Sir George Grey.] Something more than 1 s., I suppose?—I never heard any sum named.

10947. Chairman.] Did you ever hear of candidates paying the registration expenses of persons who they thought were likely to vote for them?—I have heard so, certainly; but I cannot name any individual instance in which I know that it has been done. But funds have been subscribed to facilitate registration, and no doubt that was one of the items in it; but I do not apprehend that the payment of 1 s. is an obstacle; it is the loss of time and the trouble in going up.

10948. Mr. Villiers.] I think we understand you to say that the motive has not been adequate for anybody to bribe or to pay money to become a Member?—I said that it was not originally; it is now; but before the introduction of the ballot, I said that the motive was not sufficient to the candidate to pay, nor to the voter to receive.

10950. You have stated that you do not think that the ballot was necessary in that respect, as there was no bribery; but as there is now a motive to get in, and an interested motive, there possibly is bribery now?—There is the motive, but I do not think that the bribery exists.

10951. Sir George Grey.] I think you said that you did not think that the constituency was bribable?—Not to any extent; they are very well off, and very independent.

10952. Mr. Villiers.] You said that one of the effects of the ballot was to put an end to mob intimidation; had mob intimidation, then, existed before?—Yes; very greatly.

10953. What was the purpose of it, if there was no motive to get into the Chamber?—I said that there was no motive to candidates to get into the Chamber. I think that the rioting was the act of the voter; I do not think that the candidate did anything to cause it at all.

10954. But they must have had an interest in selecting one man instead of another?—The only mob that ever I knew of there, I must say, although I am an Irishman myself, was an Irish mob, and of course very excitable, and drink had a good deal to say to it. I do not think that there was any organised intention of rioting in order to affect the election.

10955. But generally speaking, was it the case that there was a riot?—On several occasions there was.

10956. But you say that that has been stopped by the ballot?—Yes.

10957. Sir George Grey.] But you said, did you not, that contests were very infrequent formerly?—The contest was quite the exception. If there was a contest, it might be between two ambitious individuals whose friends supported them; it was not a matter of any very great public excitement.

10958. And it was only in such cases that this mob intimidation could have any effect upon the election?—I do not think that an election ever was turned by a riot; and I do not think that the candidate had anything to say to an organised mob, or had any wish that there should be a mob or any rioting.

10959. Mr. Villiers.] I think you have further offered an opinion that if there were the half sort of open voting, which you propose, it would not prevent intimidation, but that you do not expect it to occur, because people would probably act more calmly when they had to consider whether they would turn a man out of his occupation, and you do not think that that would occur?—I said that it would entirely prevent mob intimidation, and that I thought it would diminish intimidation of any other sort.

10960. I think, if I understand your plan, it was this, that they were to vote by ballot, but that the way in which they had voted was to be disclosed afterwards?—Yes, it was to be disclosed afterwards by a publication of the votes.

10961. Then you think that intimidation would be prevented by that, if we understand you?—Diminished, not prevented entirely.

10962. But when we are alluding to a single individual exercising the influence of property, perhaps, over tenants or other persons exercising power, whatever it may be, do you think that your plan would check it in any way after the vote has been disclosed?—I think it would have a tendency to do so. I do not say that it would be a panacea for it, but I think it would have a strong tendency that way.

10963. Have you had any instance of intimidation, where you have had the means of observing the operation of the ballot?—No, I do not think I know of one.

10964. People are not threatened in Victoria?—No.

10965. Have you had any opportunity of observing the elections in this country?—No; I have no experience of elections here.

10966. In the colonies, is there any such thing as this exercise of influence?—Certainly not. The men are generally the masters there, virtually; and a landlord is only too glad to get a tenant and take his farm from him.

10967. Are the Committee to understand that this system of disclosing the votes taken by the ballot has ever been tried?—No.

10968. It is merely a notion of your own?—It is a notion of my own.

10969. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You stated that the only persons who you thought were now opposed to the ballot in Victoria, were the Roman Catholics;

Catholics; on what grounds do you express that opinion?—As a matter of fact, the only individuals whom I know to be opposed to it are Roman Catholics, but what their motive may be I cannot say; it may be a fortuitous circumstance.

10970. At that particular election which you spoke of at Melbourne, was it a party contest, or merely a contest of individuals?—It was a contest of individuals heading different parties, but they were not divided into two camps at all. It was the first election that took place under our new constitution, and every one started on his own horse, but each man had his party, there was no alliance between any two candidates.

10971. And eventually the one candidate that was the least acceptable to the whole of Melbourne got in?—Yes, at the head of the poll.

10972. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Will you tell me whether there is any other qualification for the vote besides the one which you have shown us, of manhood and residence?—Yes, all the country is divided into municipal districts, and everybody whose name appears on the ratepayers' roll is ipso facto registered as an elector of the district without claiming his vote. This manhood electoral right is supplemental to that.

10973. What proportion does this manhood class of voters usually represent in a constituency?—About 25 per cent. I think that the last return was that 72 per cent. were registered in virtue of being ratepayers.

10975. What is the nature of the politics, are they religious or social questions?—One of the most hardly-fought questions was the question of protection and free trade, and the Protectionists got very large majorities indeed, in fact they beat their opponents out of the field. That was one question, and there are a number of merely local questions which perhaps excite more acrimony and bitterness than any other.

10976. Do religious questions excite much bitterness?—There are not many religious questions at all. The only question in which religion is any element at present is that of education, and although that does excite great interest, I scarcely should call it party spirit.

10977. Is education denominational, and is education assisted by Government?—It is entirely supported by Government, and the question is whether it is to be denominational or general, that is virtually what it comes to.

10978. That would excite very great interest, would it not?—Yes, it does; but the supporters of denominational education are not confined to anyone body. The episcopal church, I think, are in favour of it, and so are the Roman Catholics. So that you cannot call it a party question, although very great interest is excited upon it.

10979. Do you think that the ballot would produce the same effect generally if it were extended to this country?—I should think that the Committee are more competent to form an opinion upon that than I am. I could point out that there are some great differences in the social position of the two populations. It has been stated that the constituencies there were not venal; I am afraid that some of them here are. Constituencies there never have been subject to intimidation, and I am told that they are here; and I think that the state of education is higher there than it is here, and therefore there are all those considerations to be thought of before one could be sure that the result would be identical.

10980. But the great difference is that money has not the same temptation to the lower classes there that it would have here?—Certainly, it would not.

10981. Mr. Cross.] Why is that?—Wages are much higher, and the people are much better off.

10982. In addition to the differences between that country and this, which you have mentioned, in that country they do not work by parties as we do in this country?—They are not nearly so well organised.

10983. There are not clearly defined parties in that country as there are here?—No, not nearly so much; they are becoming so now, but heretofore it has not been so at all.

10984. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are there a large number of polling places?—A very large number. We find a great benefit from having a large number of polling places. It is more necessary there than it is here on account of some districts being very extensive indeed; but we have found that it is very useful.

10985. Sir George Grey.] What is the size of the constituencies of any electoral district?—There are one or two electoral districts which I should say at a guess might be 150 miles long; but those are very sparsely inhabited districts.

10986. What would be the number of the constituency that would have to poll?—I think there is one constituency of about 300. I was rather surprised the other day to hear Mr. Verdon state that there was one as high as 12,000; I did not think it was so high as that, but there are several of about 3,000, or 4,000 or 5,000.

10987. Chairman.] On what principle is the number of polling places for a district decided?—I do not think that there is any principle at all, but to suit the convenience of the neighbourhood. In a town of course it would be with reference to the number of voters.

10988. Is there any maximum number of voters which are allowed to poll at one place?—No, I think not.

10989. Sir George Grey.] Take the constituency that you represented; what was the number of constituents, and how many polling places were there?—I was fortunate enough always to get in without a contest; the number of constituents were 600, and I think I had two polling places.

10990. But how many polling places would there be for a constituency of about 600 in a town if there is such a constituency?—About two or three.

10991. That would leave not more than 300 polling at each polling place?—Yes, but a much larger number could poll without any inconvenience.

10992. I suppose that where the area was very large, as it is in some cases, the polling places would be much more numerous to enable the voters to get to the poll?—Well, no doubt they must be.

10993. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You mentioned that there is no means of knowing during the day the state of the poll; would not you think that the want of knowledge of the state of the poll, as it went on from hour to hour, would be one great reason of the quietude that prevails at those elections?—Yes, no doubt; it is the great reason, I think.

2 July 1869.

10994. And that might be the case, might it not, without the ballot?—No; I do not see how you are to keep it secret if you know how a man votes; the agents would be certain to disclose it.

10995. Mr. Cross.] What is your notion of the expense of elections in Victoria?—I have known two or three instances where from 1,000*l.* to 1,500*l.* has been spent by each candidate.

10996. How is that expense incurred?—It seems to me to be principally in printing; everybody seems to me to wish to get the good-will of the press, and they are very liberal in advertising.

10997. That is independent of the ordinary expenses of polling places, which are paid by the Government?—Yes.

10998. What would that bring the total expenses of the candidates up to, supposing the candidate to pay the same regular expenses as he does now?—That would entirely depend upon the number of polling places, but I apprehend it does not cost the Government very much; they generally use the police office of the district. If the candidate had to pay for the polling places and so on, it would come to a very serious item.

10999. So that if that was added to what you call the candidate's expenses, it would bring the amount which the candidate pays pretty nearly equal to what we pay here?—That I cannot attempt to answer.

11000. However, it would increase the expenses very much?—It must.

11001. Was it a large constituency that you were speaking of where the expenses were 1,200*l.*?—Yes; one of them was the constituency of Melbourne at the very election that I have been alluding to, and another, I am speaking from memory, but I think the constituency was about 1,000.

11002. Was that the expense without paying for the conveyance of voters to the poll?—No, it included that; but the heaviest expense that I see out there is the advertising and printing.

11003. Sir George Grey.] And that, you say, is with the view of getting the goodwill of the press, and to get articles written in the newspapers recommending particular candidates?—I am very much afraid it is so in some cases.

11004. Mr. Graves.] In practice, does the mode of recording votes in Victoria really ensure secrecy?—I answered that before you came into the room; my reply was that nobody cared to conceal his vote; if a man chose to keep it secret he could.

11005. Did you ever yourself contest an election in Victoria?—No, I think I always walked over.

11006. Did you know pretty well how persons would have voted?—Yes, I think so; there were very few that I had any doubt in my own mind about at all.

11007. So that in practice you could have told how most of the electors would have voted?—Yes.

11008. I notice in the qualification certificate you have handed in, the word "residence," could you tell me what that "residence" means?—Twelve months.

11009. Does the payment of 1*s.* for this certificate in your opinion prevent many from taking it out?—No, a shilling is of very little consequence to them there, the rate of wages is 8*s.* or 11*s.* a day. I do not think anybody would be stopped for the want of a shilling

11011. I observe by the 114th section of the Electoral Act, 1865, that any blind person or any person who cannot read can ask the deputy registrar to strike out the name, but you do not know whether the same thing is in operation for those who cannot write?—I cannot say, but it does not require a man to be able to write to strike out a name if he can read it.

11012. The Act specifically lays it down that writing is a qualification of a voter, and that a man who cannot sign, cannot vote?—No, he was not intended to vote.

11013. Can you say whether receiving out-door relief is a disqualification for voting in Australia?—We have no such thing as out-door relief, we have no system of poor law and no out-door relief; but I apprehend that that would not operate; there is no such thing as a property qualification or disqualification.

11014. The O'Conor Don.] I think you stated that the only persons in Australia who objected to the ballot were the Roman Catholics?—I said the only individuals that I knew to be of that opinion happened to be Roman Catholics.

11015. Are you in a position to state whether the Roman Catholic priests object to the ballot?—I know individuals and priests have in conversation told me so.

11016. And therefore you do not believe that their influence would be increased by adopting the ballot?—No, certainly not.

11017. In fact it was generally supposed in Australia that the influence of the priests was diminished by the ballot?—I think that was the feeling; I never heard it exactly alleged one way or the other, but judging from conversation generally, I should say that that was the feeling.

11018. You never heard, I presume, the contrary expressed?—No, certainly not.

11019. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Did I rightly understand you, that the certificate is given as a certificate to prevent personation?—No, as evidence of the right to vote.

11020. There is, of course, a roll of voters as well?—Yes.

11021. And this is given to a man as evidence that he is the person who is on the register?—Yes, that is the intention of it.

11022. Probably a good many of those men would, like other people, lose those papers; would there be a great many of them to be got a few days before the election?—No, I apprehend that the registrar would not issue such a duplicate.

11023. Have you no list that would enable you to say that they were voters?—There must be.

11024. There must be a good many people who would lose their papers in the course of the year; could not those men who lost them get others at some time before the election came on?—I do not recollect that there is any such provision, but I think it would be most injurious if there was.

11025. Would

11025. Would losing that paper be fatal to the right to vote?—I should say so; if duplicates were to be issued in that way there might be no end to fraud.

11026. Mr. Leatham.] You spoke of Mr. Childers having referred to the existence of bribery before the introduction of the ballot; are you aware that he stated that there was one special constituency where bribery was notorious, and do you know to what constituency he referred?—Certainly not.

11027. You stated, I think, that secret voting has discouraged candidates from petitioning on the ground of bribery, and that you have only known one petition presented; might not that be accounted for by the fact which you state that bribery does not exist?—No doubt it might. I should be sorry to say that bribery did not absolutely exist. I say it was not general, but there might be individual cases.

11028. Did the instance to which you referred, in which the exact poll was predicted beforehand, occur recently or was it some time ago?—It occurred about 18 months ago.

11029. Then it was many years after the introduction of the ballot?—Yes.

11030. But I suppose soon after the introduction of the ballot, the voting was practically secret?—I do not know that there was much difference.

11031. You spoke of the least known man having come in at the head of the poll; I presume that you did not mean it to be inferred that the well known men were rejected?—The best known man in the colony was within 20 votes of losing his seat.

11032. But they were all elected?—No, one of the best men in the colony was thrown out; was not within the first four.

11033. Mr. Brand.] At the time of the election you are speaking of, Melbourne used to return four members, did it not?—Yes.

11034. Was not that found inconvenient and was not there a change carried out?—Yes; Melbourne was subsequently divided into three seats, getting two members each.

11035. And it now returns six members?—Yes.

11036. There being three constituencies?—Yes, three constituencies.

11037. Have you since the adoption of the ballot observed any change in the character of the representatives to the Legislature?—Very great, but I am by no means sure that that was owing to the introduction of the ballot; I do not think it was.

11038. Was the change for the better, or for the worse?—Very much indeed for the worse; indeed, there was no comparison; but my own belief is that the same change would have taken place under open voting.

11039. How do you account for that?—Partly it may be that the suffrage is very much extended and partly it may be that a great number of the best colonists who used to command the respect and confidence of their fellow colonists have come home, but there is no comparison whatever between the house as it now stands, and what it was 10 or 12 years ago.

11040. Sir George Grey.] Was the establishment of the new constitution and the adoption of the ballot simultaneous?—The ballot was introduced about 12 months before the new constitution.

11041. And did the new constitution very largely increase the constituent body?—Yes, it did, but it has been subsequently extended much farther.

11042. Then the ballot was really only in operation for a comparatively limited constituency for one year in Victoria?—Yes, and I really do not know whether any elections took place under it; certainly no general election did.

11043. Chairman.] Is there any other suggestion which you would wish to make?—There is one suggestion which I want to make also. We have abolished all public nominations in that country, and with very good effect indeed.

11044. Were public nominations the rule previous to the adoption of the ballot?—Yes; and we had a public nomination subsequently to the adoption of the ballot, but by a subsequent law we have abolished nominations.

11045. Used your nominations to be scenes of riot and noise?—Yes, very great; the ballot, of course, would have no effect upon that.

11047. Do the opposing candidates meet at the same public meetings, or are the meetings held exclusively to hear the opinions of one candidate?—I have once or twice known opposing candidates to meet, but as a rule, "Mr. A.'s friends are requested to meet," or "Mr. B. will address the electors at such-and-such a place."

11048. Are those meetings orderly?—Generally speaking, they are; I have once or twice known a considerable disturbance.

11049. Chairman.] Are the partisans of the other side allowed to come and question the candidates?—Yes; they are public meetings.

11050. But they are not interrupted or hustled by the partisans of the candidates?—Sometimes they are; I think, generally speaking, there is good feeling, and a feeling of fair play, but I have known instances where they have been hustled, and I have known cases where, after a candidate has addressed a public meeting, it has been carried by a large majority that he is not a fit and proper party to represent them.

11051. Sir George Grey.] Are those meetings generally followed by resolutions, either in favour of or against the candidate?—I think always.

11052. Are there committees appointed to conduct the election?—Yes.

11053. Are the names of those committee-men published?—Yes, I think they are; there is no secret about it; but whether they are published in the newspapers I can scarcely say.

11054. Are the committees very numerous?—Yes.

11055. I think I understood you to say that there was no motive for secrecy in Victoria, and that, in fact, there was no secrecy?—If a man chooses to keep his vote secret he can do so, but nobody does care about it as a matter of fact; as a general rule, I mean. Perhaps I may be allowed to observe that Mr. Graves has just drawn my attention to clause 20 of the Electoral Act of 1865, which I had forgotten when I said that there was no out-door relief, and, in fact, no poor law system. I see that there is a provision that no elector's right shall be issued to any person who shall at the time be receiving relief as an inmate of any eleemosynary or charitable institution. Knowing that there was no system of public relief of the poor, I answered that what we popularly know as out-door relief would not disqualify a man, but I see that there is this special provision.

Major JOHN WILLIAM PERCY, called in; and Examined.

Major J. W. Percy.

11056. Chairman.] You are a Resident Magistrate in Ireland, are you not?—Yes.

11057. In what county?—In the county of Galway, and in the county of Tipperary; they are joint districts; the River Shannon divides my districts.

11058. How long have you been so?—Five years and some months; since March 1864.

11059. Were you acting in Sligo at the time of the late election?—I was.

11060. Were you sent there specially?—Yes, on the 16th of November.

11061. There was, I believe, a very severe contest in the county of Sligo, was there not?—A very severe and a very active contest.

11062. Who were the candidates?—Sir Robert Gore Booth and Colonel Cooper, on the Conservative side; and Mr. O'Conor, a brother of The O'Conor Don, on the Liberal side.

11063. Has your attention been called to the evidence of the Rev. Mr. M'Dermot?—No, I have seen no evidence nor heard of it.

11064. Have you seen the Parliamentary Return which was moved for by The O'Conor Don with reference to the Sligo county election?—No, I never saw it.

11065. It was stated by Mr. M'Dermot that escorts were applied for, and sent several days before the election to bring voters into the polling place at Ballymote three or four days before the election; have you any knowledge of such a state of things?—It is not substantially correct.

11066. If you will look at page 15 of the Return to the House of Commons on the Sligo County Election, Parliamentary Paper 180, there is this letter from Mr. Ffolliott, a magistrate of the county: "Holly Brook, 18th November 1868.—Sir, I have to request that you will give me an escort to protect voters proceeding from Ballinafad to Sligo, on the morning of Monday November 23rd. I consider that 20 men will be sufficient, and that it will not be necessary for them to go further than Collooney unless any unexpected opposition should be offered. I have also applied for an escort of the Royal Irish Constabulary. I have, &c. (signed) John Ffolliott, J.P.—To Officer Commanding Troops in County Sligo." Have you any knowledge of the circumstances to which that letter refers?—I never heard of it before in my life; I did get an application from Mr. Ffolliott some time during the election for an escort, which he did not want afterwards.

11067. Sir George Grey.] You were not the officer commanding the troops?—No, I was the resident magistrate.

11068. Chairman.] Referring to page 10 of the Return, which is a "Summary of Returns of Applications for Escorts, made to Resident Magistrates," I see the first case is on the 22nd of November, when an application was made to you by Colonel Cooper and Charles Lang for an escort; will you state the circumstances under which that was made?—It was not on the 22nd, it was on the 24th, I think.

11069. On what day did the nomination take place?—On the 26th, I think. I got Colonel Cooper's letter, and it was dated the 24th of November. He wrote to me to give protection to his man, who was going to a large and widely scattered district, to collect voters from some portions of his property. I did not give him an escort to escort voters, that was not applied for; I gave it as a personal protection to the man himself, as he swore that he would be killed if he went out without.

11070. Sir George Grey.] But he was going to collect voters, was he not?—He said he was going to warn them, and he said he could not reach them without being protected, they were at such a distance. I have here the distances in Mr. Lang's own writing. The barony which Mr. Lang applied for was the barony of Leyny in and near the townland of Aclare; it is 20 miles from Ballymote; there were 12 voters, and the number of cars which was required to go there, three. I wanted to know what he wanted them for, and where he proposed to go; and this is his own handwriting. Also from the same barony of Leyny from the town of Tobercurry on the 24th, he wanted five cars for 20 voters 10 miles.

11071. I thought you said that the escort was taken to protect the agent in going to warn voters to come to vote; what do you mean by those cars and the number of voters?—It was to escort him only; because I told him if you want the voters escorted, you shall get them the day before the polling-day. I cannot give you the escort now, but there will be certain arrangements made in due time, as has always been my custom at other contested elections. The magistrates meet a day or two before, and we receive applications from the agents, and apportion the escorts as our force, and as the exigencies of time require it, and therefore I said, "You will have to state to me ultimately how many cars you will require for my future guidance"; and he had from the same barony of Leyny four miles west of the town of Coolaney eight men to warn.

11072. Will you explain what you mean by "warning"; do you mean that the agent was going to tell them that the election was about to take place, and that they might vote, or that he was to warn them that they were to come in to vote for a particular candidate?—I cannot tell you; he said he was to warn Colonel Cooper's voters.

11073. What did you understand by his warning Colonel Cooper's voters?—I did not give it any consideration; I did not ask him any question about it.

11074. Is that a common expression when a person applies for an escort?—I had often heard it used before.

11075. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Does not the word "warn" in Ireland, answer to the words "give notice" in England?—Yes, he meant to give notice.

11076. Sir George Grey.] To give notice that the the election was to take place; was that all he meant by it, in your opinion?—I think so.

11077. Chairman.] Having received that information, you ordered an escort to accompany Mr. Lang?—I sent an order on the 24th of November to the sub-inspector in charge of the constabulary at Ballymote, a copy of which, if you will permit me, I will read: "Ballymote, 24-11-68. Sir,—You are hereby requested to furnish 12 men of the Royal Irish constabulary this day to accompany Mr. Lang to the vicinity of Tobercurry, and escort freeholders back to Ballymote."

11078. I thought you said that he only went to warn the voters?—I see that I have written that; my impression was as I have said; I know that he told me that it was to warn voters; and why I put in that form I really cannot say; I have stated it in my written answer before. I know it was a slip of mine.

11079. On what day was this escort sent?—On that same day, the 24th.

11080. On what day was the polling?—The polling was on the 30th of November, the Monday; this was six days before that.

11081. Who commanded that escort?—Mr. Williams, the sub-inspector.

11082. Did he make any report to you of having done his duty?—Yes, when he came back he reported to me.

11083. Have you that report?—It was only a verbal report. He told me when he came back on the same day that he had accompanied Mr. Lang and given him the protection which he required, and that he (Lang) had gone to the houses and warned the people, and that he had got nobody, and brought back no men with him.

11084. When did he come back?—That afternoon.

11085. Then, did he go to fetch voters?—No, he went out with Mr. Lang, and he said he brought back no men with him; no voter came in with him, he brought back nobody.

11086. Sir George Grey.] Did he tell you why he brought back nobody?—I have no recollection whatever of having stated, "I ordered him to bring back those men"; it is incorrect. I did not order him to bring any special number, and he brought back none; and he reported to me that he brought back none.

11087. Did he tell you why?—I cannot charge my memory with that; I cannot say that he did tell me why.

11088. Chairman.] You, I conclude, were not surprised at his not bringing back voters if you had not sent him to bring back voters?—I had not, I never gave it any consideration. That portion of the written order was an error of mine, unquestionably, in telling him to escort voters back; I did not mean him to do so.

11089. One officer and 12 constables, then, were sent to protect Mr. Lang in warning those voters?—Yes, in warning the voters.

11090. Why did he require that protection?—He swore an affidavit before me, that he dare not go out into that country, and that he would be attacked if he went alone.

11091. Then, are you certain that it was not his intention, or your intention, that he should come back accompanied by the voters?—I do not know anything about his intention; I did not give him the men to escort back voters; I gave him the men positively for his own protection; he swore to me that he would be killed, and that he would not be safe to go out into that country without a guard.

11092. Supposing that he had brought back voters, and that officer and 12 constables had escorted those voters back, would they have exceeded their duty?—No, I should say not, not exceeded their duty, because I should say that the police are obliged to afford protection to anybody who asks it; but it is not the police duty to go and tell people to come in to vote. If the officer found any man willing to come into Ballymote, and he asked him there and then to escort him in, I should say that the police officer should take him, and he would not have done his duty if he had not done so.

11093. That order of yours would have been a sufficient authority for that?—Quite enough, according to my idea.

11094. Sir George Grey.] Have you got a copy of Mr. Lang's affidavit?—I never could lay my hand upon that affidavit when the correspondence arose, in the first instance, with The O'Conor Don, whose letter is adverted to in that paper. There was a great crush in the room at the time, there was a great number of people, and all the papers were on the table, and what became of that affidavit I do not know; I lost it. I am positive that Mr. Lang swore that.

11095. What was Mr. Lang?—He is a very respectable man.

11096. Was he agent to anybody?—He was represented to me as the under agent of Mr. Ormsby Gore.

11097. Was it Mr. Ormsby Gore whose tenants he was going to?—I had no idea in the world; I did not know anything about it.

11098. Would nobody have been able to give notice that the election was to take place on the 26th without being in danger of his life; why should Mr. Lang go if he was personally obnoxious?—I do not know; I never asked the question; I did not consider it my duty; my orders were to go and assist to preserve the peace during a disturbed time.

11099. Had you been employed at any previous contested elections?—Yes.

11100. Did you ever have a similar application for an escort to take a person into a district to give notice that an election was about to take place anywhere?—Never; the whole thing was incomprehensible to me until I was informed by residents in the place that the district about Ballymote had been very much disturbed for a long time, even before I had gone down there at all, and that people were stopped, and houses were visited every night and threatened, and windows were broken open, and there was a great deal of intimidation going on in the county; that was why I was sent there at all on the 16th of November; I could not believe it; I thought it was a mistake when I got the order to go on the 16th, knowing that it was the last county election in the whole kingdom, and I could not understand how it was that I got the order to be off at once on the Sunday, to go without a moment's delay to Ballymote, as the place was seriously disturbed; I got that order, and on the Monday, when I got there, I asked the local magistrate, "What on earth have you brought me here for this day; the election is not going to be till the end of the month?" He said, "The whole place is in a state of disturbance; it is quite a reign of terror."

11101. You would hardly believe that Mr. Lang

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

Lang required an escort merely to warn voters; therefore you added that the escort was to bring voters back; was not that so?—I got there on the 16th, and Mr. Lang applied to me on the 24th, and in the interval between the 16th and the 24th. I had learnt quite sufficient of the country to justify me in affording Mr. Lang the protection which he demanded.

11104. According to that letter the statement is that the voters "will require protection," because it says, "They will require protection and I trust you will be good enough to grant him an escort"; then was your letter written in consequence of the receipt of this, or in consequence of Mr. Lang's affidavit?—When Mr. Lang came to me himself, I said I must have an information; I would not give him an escort because I said it was too soon, and I refused Mr. Ffolliott and everybody; it was not him alone; I have got Mr. Ffolliott's correspondence here, which will show that I would not give him an escort to go to bring in voters. Mr. Lang said that he wanted to go out there to those places; he brought me Colonel Cooper's letter and he said, "I must go out, I cannot go alone, if I do I shall be seriously assaulted"; then it was I said, "If you will put it into the form of an information, to justify me in giving you protection, I shall consider it, and I shall do it if I see that it is a sufficient information." Then he swore that he was in terror of his life, and that he had good reason to believe that if he went out into this particular part of the county, he would be seriously assaulted, and would not be allowed to go on.

11105. Then you are quite sure that in that affidavit, he only asked for protection for himself and not for any voters that he might bring in?—I am quite sure that he did only ask for protection for himself, because I told him that I would not give him an escort for voters at that date.

11106. Had you a great pressure of business on that day, with reference to the election?—I had a good deal of correspondence.

11107. Was the order that you speak of written in your own hand or signed by you?—It had to be written by my own hand; I had no clerk at all.

11108. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I suppose you knew that the election was not until the 30th?—Yes.

11109. It must have occurred to you that it was a long time to keep voters before voting?—Very much so.

11110. What seems extraordinary is, that you should put in these words, "and escort voters"?—I know it was a slip of mine.

11111. When the officer returned with those 12 constables, did he come to you on the same day?—He came to me on that night.

11112. Did he not tell you that your order was wrong; that it was not for the purpose of bringing back voters that the escort was asked?—No, he did not.

11113. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] I see that just afterwards in the same return on the 26th of November there is a letter which is addressed to you by Mr. Lionel Townsend, the sub-inspector, in which he tells you that "20 of Colonel Cooper's voters arrived in this town on last night;" that would be on the 25th of November, had they been brought in under any escort by your direction into Tobercurry?—No, not at all.

11114. The O'Conor Don.] It appears, then, that you received a letter dated the 22nd of November, from the Conservative candidate, asking you to send out an escort to bring in voters?—Yes.

11115. And it also appears that you wrote a letter yourself to the inspector directing him to escort voters in?—Yes; the few lines which I have read.

11116. So that what was actually done in that case was that you first received an application for an escort for voters about seven days before the election, and you wrote a letter directing the sub-inspector to escort those voters into the town of Ballymote at that date?—Yes.

11117. Then, with regard to the distance, I do not exactly understand what you stated first on that point; how far was this place from Ballymote?—Where he went I understood on that day was to the vicinity of Tobercurry.

11118. How far is Tobercurry from Ballymote?—Ten Irish miles.

11119. Did he go the whole way to Tobercurry?—I do not know; I do not believe he did.

11120. Do you know where Chaffpool is?—I do.

11121. How far is that from Ballymote?—About eight miles, I should think.

11122. You are not able to say how far those men lived from Ballymote?—Not the least idea in the world.

11123. It is quite possible they might have lived within six miles of it?—Quite possible, but I understood from the sub-inspector that he had gone further than that, certainly.

11124. You stated, did you not, that he came in without any voters?—I think he came in without any at all. I think he told me that he saw none, and he came in without any.

11125. Will you have the goodness to read the report which was furnished, not to you, but to the county inspector, at page 4?—"Referring to the inquiries the county inspector has been making touching the escort duty performed by me for the protection of voters on the 24th ultimo, I beg to say that, in compliance with a requisition, a copy of which I attach, I proceeded with 12 of the constabulary on the day in question to the neighbourhood of Chaffpool, accompanied by a Mr. Ch. Lang, and when on our way we were overtaken by the Rev. Mr. M'Dermot." He told me that he had met Mr. M'Dermot. I remember it when I see it here now. I have a distinct recollection before Mr. Williams started, telling Mr. Williams that his object in going out was to protect Mr. Lang, and he says here, I perceive "I wished to keep Lang in view so that no injury should occur to him." I told Mr. Williams himself, and I cannot tell what possessed me me to write that last order to take care that there was no interference with the people or anything else, and that he was sent to protect the man. I have a distinct recollection of that and so has he.

11126. Will you undertake to say that Mr. Lang's affidavit had no reference to the voters?—I will certainly say that, decidedly.

11127. Have you lost that affidavit?—I never could find it since. The first time I had occasion to refer to it was when I got your letter to answer, and I looked for it on the spot; but I never could find it since.

11128. Sir George Grey.] Do you make a report of your proceedings to any superior officer or to the Government on those occasions?—Yes, always.

11129. Do not you transmit to the Government copies of the orders you give, and the affidavits on which those orders are given?—No, not necessarily unless they are called for as they were in the present instance.

11130. Chairman.] I see that on the 26th you were applied to by Mr. Townsend for an escort for voters in danger of an attack?—Yes.

11131. That is the same case, I believe, as is referred to in page 13, where you will find the letter signed by Mr. Townsend?—Yes, addressed to myself, and that is the one that I acted upon.

11132. The letter is in these terms: "County Sligo, Tobercurry, 26th November 1868.—Sir, I beg to inform you that about 20 of Colonel Cooper's voters arrived in this town on last night previous to starting for Chaffpool, but a mob of several hundreds having seen them, put a guard on the house, and paraded the street during the entire night; they made several applications to me for an escort, but owing to the smallness of the force at my disposal and not having sufficient authority, I declined doing so. The houses are still guarded by the mob, and I fear may be attacked at any moment. (signed) N. Lionel Townsend, Third Sub-Inspector.—To Major Percy, R.M., &c., &c., Ballymote." What did you do on receipt of that letter?—On receipt of that letter, I sent an order to the senior sub-inspector at Ballymote, to reinforce Mr. Townsend by a few men until I could make arrangements to bring them in, with one general escort for the whole of the parties.

11133. Those voters were already in charge of a small escort, were they not?—No, they were not.

11134. What was Mr. Townsend doing?—He merely wrote in to inform me that they had come into the police at Tobercurry, in which he was stationed, and that they were threatened, and he applied to me for an escort to proceed to bring them into the town of Ballymote.

11135. Then you ordered that small reinforcement to go out?—Yes; upon his application to me that he had not sufficient force, and I required him to be very active at that time in patrolling the country by night, because there were constant outrages occurring every night, and those people could not have stopped in the town without protection, and I sent him out some other men that I had to reinforce him for the moment, until we could arrange to bring them all in.

11136. Did the voters stay there that night?—I think till two days after. I could not go there for them; I had not time to go.

11137. How were they eventually brought in to Ballymote?—By me, with an armed party of police, on Friday, the 28th.

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

11138. The polling being on the Monday?—Yes, on the Monday; we were obliged to get them in, because we had several other places to go to on the Saturday. We could not leave them over; they would not have come in at all if I had not gone out for them on the Friday.

11139. Where were they lodged while they were in Ballymote?—I have no idea at all.

11140. You did not provide an escort, did you, after they had arrived in Ballymote?—No; I brought them to the edge of the village, and I do not know what became of them; I never saw them afterwards.

11141. Sir George Grey.] Were they walking afterwards in Ballymote, and going wherever they chose on the Saturday?—Yes, I suppose so.

11142. The O'Conor Don.] Has it been usual, in your experience, to bring in voters with an armed escort so long before the polling day?—Never before; it has been one day, perhaps, before from long distances, if they could not come in in the morning, if they had long drives; but it was always so arranged by the agents that the escorts should meet them at certain parts of the road, at five or six, or even three o'clock in the morning. I have started at four o'clock in the morning to bring 200 or 300 cars of voters, with dragoons, 12 or 15 miles.

11143. Who paid for those cars?—I do not know anything about that.

11145. Now, will you turn to page 10 of that Return; let me refer you to case No. 12, on page 10; H. Swansy applied to you, in writing, for an escort?—Yes.

11146. And one officer and 30 police were sent?—Yes.

11147. That appears not to have been on sworn information?—That was to go to the railway to bring those men from the railway station into the town of Ballymote, but the railway station is outside the town about a quarter of a mile, perhaps not so far; and in that part of the town that they would have to come through, there were a good many people at that time, and Mr. Swansea came up to us, and brought a written application as conducting agent, that a party should go down to the station to clear the way so as not to have a collision with the people, and they were given him. They were not out ten minutes, I should suppose, altogether.

11148. They were not accompanied by any magistrate?—No; not by me, certainly not.

11149. Is it usual to send out a force of that description without any sworn information, or without any magistrate accompanying them?—I think it is without information; I have never seen it required so much before, because the circumstances were not the same. In this case there was no outrage at all; it was only as a protection. Captain Peel certainly did not consider that the presence of a magistrate with that 30 men going to the station would be necessary, and I myself am one of those who consider that the police are perfectly justified, as peace officers, in acting by the orders of their own officers.

Major J. W. Percy.

11150. That force was not sent out precisely as an escort?—No, not at all; it was just as a preventive against possible collision; it was to keep order; it was not out five minutes; they met with no opposition whatever; they returned to their station, and were turned in again directly.

11151. Will you refer to case No. 16 on that Return, from which it appears that one officer and 30 police were sent by you on the application of Frederick Hamilton, Esq., agent to Charles O'Hara, Esq., not on information and not accompanied by a magistrate; can you give the Committee an account of that escort?—It was on Sunday the 29th, the day before the polling. There was a meeting of the respective agents on the Conservative side on the Thursday previous, in the town of Ballymote, to arrange about getting in those voters, and it was then arranged that this escort, which I have referred to before, should go on the Friday and make a circuit of all the district, to do it all in one day; go to Tobercurry, go to Chaffpool, go to Coolaney, and pick up all the respective voters, as their agents asked for, and bring them in to Ballymote. I started at six in the morning to Tobercurry, and Captain Peel started with a large force of dragoons, infantry, and police to Mr. O'Hara's place at Coolaney same morning. He got to Coolaney (this was on the Friday); the voters were assembled in the town; he saw them himself, and from some cause, which I am not in a position to explain, or give any account of whatever, the voters would not go with him; they would not accept the escort. That was Captain Peel's report to me, and he came in without the men at all. I saw him coming in; I had come in before him with my party from Tobercurry, who were so anxious to come in. On the following day, Saturday, Mr. Hamilton came to us again to say that several of Mr. O'Hara's voters, and somebody else's, I think, their Protestant voters, were anxious to come into the town of Ballymote to vote; "60 of Mr. O'Hara's Protestant voters will be ready to start from Coolaney to-morrow, Sunday;" those were the words used; "and an attempt might be made to stop them;" and there also as a preventive we ordered that party which you see under the date of the 29th, No. 16, to patrol the road for a few miles outside the town of Ballymote; not to go out to Coolaney, but to go a short distance, and a very short distance, outside the town of Ballymote to meet them coming in, where the only danger, as I anticipated, was to be dreaded.

11152. Sir George Grey.] Were those the same voters who had refused the escort of Captain Peel?—I do not know anything about that.

11153. Were they from the same district?—Yes, from the same district, but the agent making the application calls them the "Prostestant voters of Mr. O'Hara's."

11155. Sir George Grey.] Did you ever ascertain why it was those 60 voters had two days before refused to come in under Captain Peel's escort?—I do not say that it included those 60, because I am not in a position to do it, but if you ask me, Do I know why the voters would not come on the Friday, it was told me by Captain Peel that the priest was there, and would not permit them to come.

11156. Would that affect the Protestant voters?—That is the only answer I can give; I can only state that when I asked him why he had not brought them in, he said there was some reverend gentleman there. I did not know his name even, and he told me they would not go in, or would not be allowed.

11157. Chairman.] That escort was not accompanied by any magistrate?—No, not the one on the Sunday outside the town.

11158. Were the voters brought in?—I think they walked in; there was no disturbance whatever. We did not escort them, the people came in themselves, and required no escort at all. I have a correspondence here in which we urged them in the strongest way not to ask for those escorts at all, but when you are pressed, and people say that danger will accrue, and when gentlemen say to me, "We must be protected, and we demand the protection which you are sent here to afford, you have got troops here and constabulary, and we require you to protect us," what is one to do?

11159. Why did you urge that such escorts should not be applied for?—Because I thought that 60 Protestant voters would be able to come in without any molestation.

11160. Sir George Grey.] In fact, the Protestants were willing to come in and vote, and the Catholics were not?—I do not know that; I thought that 60 men ought to be able to go anywhere. I did not go into their religious opinions.

11161. But yet you sent them the escort?—On the application, and the very urgent application, of the agent.

11162. Was that application in writing?—Yes, I have read it.

11163. Chairman.] Before you went into the county of Sligo upon this election business did you receive any instructions from the Government?—None at all; merely a warrant ordering me to go to Ballymote.

11164. That was your head-quarters, I suppose?—Yes, that was my head-quarters.

11165. What were you to do there?—To assist in keeping the peace during the county of Sligo election.

11167. What are your powers, as resident magistrate, in ordering escorts?—None whatever greater than any other magistrate possesses. I think sufficient informations ought to be sworn in most cases. In giving escorts to go out in all other elections where I have been, and I have seen five or six of them now, as I have said before, there was a day appointed for a meeting of the magistrates to arrange all the details. That was departed from in the county of Sligo election and was not so done, because they said the districts were so large, and so widely scattered and extended that they had to bring them in in detail; they could not bring them in in one day.

11168. Were any instructions issued by the Government, do you know, with regard to this particular Sligo election?—I have not the least idea in the world; none were issued to me; I had had no communication from them, and I never heard of any.

11169. Who was the local resident magistrate for that district?—Mr. Coulson, in the town of Sligo, distant some 16 miles from Ballymote.

11171. Had you charge of a particular district?—Yes, Ballymote, and a circle around Ballymote.

11172. Was that a polling district?—Yes, it was the polling place for three baronies.

11173. Do you know what force of military there were in that polling district while you were there?—There were on the 30th November of the 6th Dragoon Guards, five officers and 80 rank and file; of the 63rd Foot, four officers and 64 men, and of the Constabulary, six officers and 202 men, and of the 63rd Foot, four officers and 80 men came up by train, from Boyle, and returned to Boyle again by 20 minutes to 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

11174. All those escorts which we have been talking about hitherto, I think, consisted only of police and not of soldiers?—Excepting the one to Coolaney on Friday; Captain Peel took out with him cavalry and infantry, but I took the police always.

11175. Will you refer to page 14, to the "Returns of applications for escorts made to military officers"; case No. 4, is that the escort to which you refer?—That is the escort under Captain Peel with the 6th Dragoon Guards, two officers, and 34 men. The second, 17th Foot, two officers and 30 men. This party went under the charge of Captain Peel to Coolaney, on Friday the 26th, I think.

11176. Did you apply to the officer commanding the troops at Ballymote for that escort?—Yes, we sent him a requisition for them.

11177. Was it on a sworn information that you made that requisition to the officer commanding the troops?—No, I do not think it was; I am not quite sure that it was at this moment, but I do not think so.

11178. On what grounds was it given?—On the application of the agent of Mr. O'Hara, Mr. Frederick Hamilton.

11179. Sir George Grey.] What are the cases in which you require sworn informations, and what is the class of cases in which you send an escort without such information?—I would be more particular in sending an escort, and might myself go with them, if I apprehended that danger was likely to occur on a collision with the people; but in this case it was a concerted movement; it was a concerted thing between the parties to go out and bring them in, for we were sent there to discharge that duty, and I never saw any information sworn before in similar cases at all.

11180. But in some of those cases there appears to have been sworn informations?—No, unless they are sent to escort men personally to protect men individually, I usually do not take an information. We are bound to protect individual men when going on special service, when we send a special party with him to protect him.

11181. You send an escort to escort voters without any information whatever that any danger is to be apprehended by those voters in coming to the poll?—I think so.

11182. Chairman.] You consider that information received from any respectable person is sufficient to justify you in sending out an escort?—From a conducting agent, or from an agent, when it is an organised thing, where it is a preconcerted arrangement for a special day for the poll.

11184. What does the agent mean by saying, "I have got 60 or 70 voters;" does that mean, "I have 60 or 70 voters on the estate for which I am agent, who are coming to vote for a particular candidate"?—He does not say for what candidate he wants to bring them to the poll.

11186. Chairman.] It was stated by Mr. McDermot that in the case of an escort on the 27th of November, which marched a number of voters into Ballymote, it did not go by the direct road to Ballymote; but Mr. McDermot stated that it went by a road which was double as long as the direct road, and being asked, at Question 8551, what was the object of marching them such a long distance round, he says, "it was done for display, and the people were convinced that it was done to indicate that Government intimidation was combining with landlord intimidation, and that the one was made use of to supplement the other, and hence a great deal of evil accrued;" do you know anything of that?—I presume that Mr. McDermot alludes on that occasion to the escort which I took to Tobercurry on the 26th. The reason why I took that route was, that I believed it was just as short to come back by the road I did, as to come back by the road that I went; for instance, I did not want to pass through the village that I went through in the morning, which was a village greatly disturbed during the whole time, and a cause of great anxiety to me, Buninadden. It was a place greatly disturbed, and in going through it that morning I was hooted, and some stones were thrown; even as early as seven o'clock; they turned out in force, and if I had come back by that same road I should never have got in at all, I should not have got through; I had arranged with Captain Peel to come to meet me, and give me his assistance on the other road, and that is why I came back that road, to escape coming back through the village of Buninadden, and also to receive the assistance of a large escort, which was out in that part of the country, and coming round; I only having a small escort of a few few policemen, and far from being an exhibition at all; it was very much the contrary.

11187. Sir George Grey.] When those voters are being escorted, supposing any of them say they wish to leave the escort and to return home, are they allowed to do so?—Yes; they are permitted to leave instantly.

11188. Have you known cases of that kind occur?—Yes; that very day Mr. M'Dermot came up to me and said, "Major Percy, there are two men here in the escort that say they do not want to go on." I said, "Both of them may go back if they like. I do not care where they go to; where are they?" I went back with him, and he said, "Those two men say that they do not want to go on." I said, "If you say you do not want to go on, why go back; if you do not want to go on I do not care where you go;" and they went back on the spot. Then I shouted out at once on the side of the road, there was a great crowd, and I said, "I am not come here to take anybody, I am only come to afford protection to anyone who comes under my charge when they ask me for it."

11189. I understand that you have had a great deal of experience in contested elections in Ireland?—I have been at four or five.

11190. Chairman.] Do you think that the voters are generally aware that they are perfectly free to go on with the escort or to leave it?—I do not know that; I could not say that I could give a positive answer upon that head. From one or two cases that have come under my knowledge I should rather be led to the impression that they have thought that they were under escort; by escort I mean that they would not be allowed to leave. I have that impression upon my mind.

11191. That they were prisoners?—That they would be brought in; but after I had acted as I have said, they all escaped.

11192. Was it usual, when you accompanied an escort, to make any public declaration that the voters were perfectly at liberty to go on or go back, as they pleased?—I always have done so myself, individually.

11193. Sir George Grey.] When you take an escort to a place from which voters are to come, how are the voters collected and put upon the cars?—I do not know anything about that.

11194. But you have been present with escorts, have you not?—I was going to say that I have written to the agent in answer to an application from him for troops, to state, "I shall be with a certain number of troops at a certain point, at a certain hour, on a certain day, and anybody there at the time I shall be glad to give protection to."

11195. Have you ever yourself accompanied one of those escorts, for the purpose of bringing in voters at any time, on any other occasion than the Sligo election?—I have escorted a great many voters upon one occasion, 12 or 14 miles.

11196. Do you take the escort to the place where the voters have to come from?—No, they bring them to me; I take the escort to a given point in the district in which the voters live, and then their agents, or whoever they are, bring them to that spot.

11197. They are brought by the agents, are they?—Yes, they are handed up to me.

11198. And placed upon cars by the agent?—Yes, they are placed upon cars by the agent, and when he has got them all in, he comes up and says, "I have got all my men in, will you start?" (That occurred to me before this election.) And I have said, "Yes, I am very anxious to get on; we will go as fast as we can."

11199. Do they come up individually, and beg for an escort, or do they come up in a body under the charge of the agent?—I cannot tell at all; I do not know that.

11200. I want to know how it has been in the cases in which you have been an eye witness?—They have driven up on cars in a body, perhaps five or 10 or 20 cars together, in a long string of Irish cars.

11201. Chairman.] It was stated that a general belief in the county was, that it was the intention of the Government to intimidate the voters by means of those escorts; have you reason to suppose that any such general impression existed?—I have no such notion at all; I do not believe anything of the sort existed.

11202. Have you had much conversation with the lower class of voters?—I have very often conversed with them, having had occasion to visit them during the 20 days that I was in Ballymote; I had to go out every morning in my life to visit the scene of some outrage the night before; that was what I was sent there for.

11203. Did you receive the impression when they were going to vote with their landlords, that they were going to do it willingly?—They were very greatly distressed, and in a very great state of anxiety about the whole subject, and very much annoyed at their property and houses and everything being smashed to pieces at night. I think they were in a very excited state and very much annoyed about it; they were in a very great state of perplexity to know why they should be so treated.

11204. Treated by whom?—To use the words of one or two people, they said we were afraid either of eviction or of the priest; either one or the other.

11205. There was a prevalent fear of eviction, was there?—Those were the words that one or two people said to me, and the priest particularly they said.

11206. What was the nature of those outrages which took place at night?—I have a whole string of them that I reported to the Government, beginning with the 17th of November: "Ballymote, 17th November 1868. I have to report that on the night of the 15th instant, about the hour of 11 o'clock, a party of men numbering between 15 and 20 called at the house of Charles Tighe, of Knockmoynagh. They forced open his door, after which they dragged him about and kicked him, and swore him to give his vote to Mr. O'Conor, the Liberal candidate, at the ensuing election, and on his doing so they left. On visiting him on yesterday I found him in bed; he stated he was ill from the effects of the beating he received, although my own opinion is that he is only pretending illness, and I am borne out in this opinion by Dr. McMun, who visited him on yesterday, who told me that he saw no marks of violence whatever on his person, nor was he, in the doctor's opinion, ill. Tighe also stated that he did not know any of the party who visited him, nor could he describe them."

11207. Who is that signed by?—I am not correct in stating that it is addressed to me individually; it is to the Inspector General of the Constabulary, but a copy was sent to me by the sub-inspector, Mr. Williams, at Ballymote.

11208. Sir George Grey.] Who was Tighe?—He was a tenant farmer.

11209. The O'Conor Don.] Are you aware that he was a brother of the parish priest of Ballymote?—I am not aware.

11210. Sir George Grey.] Do you know whom he voted for ultimately?—I do not know a word about it. I have here another abstract of statement made to the Inspector General. "Ballymote, 19th November 1868. I have to report that on the night of the 16th instant, about 11½ o'clock, a party of persons, consisting of from 15 to 20, called to the house of Luke Healey, of Cloonkeeny, and on being admitted, they took him (Healey) out of his house, and swore him to give his vote to Mr. O'Conor, the Liberal candidate for this county at the ensuing election. One of the party struck Healey on the head with a gun which he carried, but did not hurt him much. The same party visited the houses of Patrick McGetrick, of Emlaghnaghton, John Coleman, William Flanagan, and Thomas McGetrick, of Rathdooney, John Healy, of Cluid, and Farrell Quigley, of Corrancushacline, the greater part of whom they swore to vote for Mr. O'Conor. I have been accompanied by Major Percy, R.M., on yesterday evening to the houses of the persons visited, who examined some of them on oath, but who denied that they knew, nor could they describe them."

11211. Chairman.] You visited some of those people?—Yes; all those people that are named here.

11212. Did they make those complaints?—Yes; and I certainly believed in the statement, for it was taken down by the sub-inspector at the table on oath.

11213. Did the information which put the sub-inspector in action proceed from them?—The police, having heard that such-and-such a house had been visited, were out all night, because the country was patrolled by them. Every morning a report of those outrages used to come in to me at Ballymote.

11214. Do you know any case where persons who had been visited in this way in the middle of the night, made complaint and asked for protection?—No; none ever came to me demanding protection.

11215. Are the other cases like those you have read?—Yes, they are all the same.

11216. Sir George Grey.] It has been stated to the Committee that this sort of intimidation which you have been describing is practised in some cases with the consent of the person supposed to be intimidated, in order to give him an excuse for voting against his landlord's interest; do you believe that to be the case?—I should, of course, speak under great reservation, after a man swearing to you that he did not know anything about it; but I candidly confess that my impression led me to form such an idea upon one or two occasions, that the man was humbugging.

11217. In none of those cases did the persons identify those who had committed the outrages?—No.

11218. And their injuries were very slight, were they not?—Yes, that is so.

11219. It has also been stated to the Committee that, but for the escort that goes to conduct the voters, in many cases the voters would not come to the poll at all, as they do not wish either to incur the danger of eviction or to offend the priest; is that your opinion?—I cannot answer that question, whether that is so, because I never have, for one instant, compelled men to come. I have, on the contrary, told them that the Government sent me there, not to force them, but to afford them protection, if they wish to come.

11220. Have you formed any opinion as to the unwillingness of voters to vote at all from fear of offending either the priest or the landlord?—Yes, I can answer that question; I think that some of those men would rather not have voted at all; people have made use of that expression to me on their knees; there they have been, their wives all howling, and the house damaged and wrecked to pieces.

11221. Chairman.] You received, did you not, a great number of reports similar to those you have read to us?—Yes, there are a great number of them.

11222. But they are much of the same character?—Yes.

11223. Was there any case in which a voter had suffered severe personal injuries?—Yes, I saw them very much so, with very bad wounds in the head and bad cuts, the whole place broken, the windows smashed, the door in pieces, and the houses utterly wrecked.

11224. Were those Protestants or Roman Catholics?—I cannot state that; I never asked the question.

11225. The O'Conor Don.] Could you give the names of those who were injured in that way?—I think they are all in these reports which I have been reading.

11226. I mean in any case where a person was seriously injured?—Indeed I did not take that down especially, but I saw people with cuts, for instance, on the side of their heads; I saw two or three who had been very much hurt. In answer to the Right honourable Baronet, I may say that this is a report which the sub-inspector, Mr. Williams, made on visiting a man named Michael O'Connor. "I have to report that on the night of the 18th instant, about the hour of four o'clock, a party of persons, between 20 or 30, called at the house of Michael O'Connor of Spurton, and after getting admittance they swore him to give his vote to Mr. O'Conor, the Liberal candidate for this county at the ensuing election. On this day I visited O'Conor accompanied by Major Percy, who wished to examine him on oath; and on tendering him a book he refused being sworn, which led Major Percy and myself to come to the conclusion that his statement in the first instance was not correct, and that he wished to have it believed by his landlord that he was coerced to give his vote to Mr. O'Conor. It appears that his landlord, Mr. O'Reilly, has given his interest to Sir Robert Gore Booth and Colonel Cooper."

11227. Chairman.] Have you found any cases in which voters were seriously injured who were subjected to those nocturnal outrages?—I have read one.

11228. Sir George Grey.] You said that on one man being examined he was found not to have sustained any serious damage; were there any cases in which the persons who were examined were found to be suffering from those injuries?—They were more or less suffering when I saw them; I do not know whether they were dangerous injuries. You may see an Irishman in court one day with his head tied up, and he makes a great fuss about it, and then five minutes after after the case is over the whole thing is off and it is all smooth again.

11229. You never found anything more than that?—No, certainly not.

11230. Chairman.] Did you take any steps to repress this system of nocturnal outrage?—Yes, patroles were out, and there was a constabulary station established upon the district of Buninaddan, in the very centre of that disturbed part, because it was all confined to one portion of the county.

11231. Did those measures have any effect in checking the outrages?—They were not so frequent, I think, but they continued up to the 25th.

11232. Sir George Grey.] Did the police ever fall in with any of those parties that were going round to intimidate, or to profess to intimidate?—No, they did not. I had judicial knowledge of the fact that on the night before that escort went to Coolaney on the Thursday night, the police that night did fall in with them; the party fired on the police, and the police fired on the party again, and they were caught, and they are now undergoing imprisonment for being out under arms at night, to the alarm and terror of the country.

11233. What date was that?—On the Thursday night, the 26th of November, before the escort went out.

11234. Chairman.] Was this election at Sligo accompanied by more violence than other county elections that you had seen in Ireland?—Very much more; it was the worse, because it was so long before the election that it began. In the northern part of Ireland, or anywhere else, it began 48 hours before, perhaps, but here it was a whole three weeks, and we wanted the troops and police there all the time, the country was disturbed so long a time.

11236. Sir George Grey.] Was there any loss of life in the course of this election?—Not under my own knowledge. I believe there was some loss of life there (in borough of Sligo), but not to my own knowledge; there was a man hurt in the hand. There was firing at night, and that sort of thing; and a man was shot in his hand, and a man has been tried for it, with I forget what result at this moment.

11237. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion as to the expediency of the use of soldiers and constabulary at Irish elections?—I have thought of the matter for a long time, and I have formed a very strong opinion about it, that if I could get rid of the use of the soldiers I would cease to employ them certainly.

11238. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean soldiers as distinct from constabulary?—Yes, precisely.

11239. Chairman.] On what ground would you get rid of them?—They are hampered by orders. I will give an example: suppose Mr. Light, or Mr. Ormsby Booth's agent, comes to me and says, "I want a party to go to a certain place 12 miles off; there are some men there who ought to be escorted, and I require an escort from you." I have 50, or 60, or 100 troopers and their horses for the purpose, who, I presume, are sent to me to use to the best of my ability for the preservation of the peace, and to forward everything in the best way that it can be done. I send to the officer commanding the cavalry detachment, and I tell him I want 20 troopers and a subaltern to go 12 miles off at once, at night, at one o'clock in the morning, and he sends me this back in answer to my requisition. "Sir,—In accordance with instructions received from the Adjutant General's Office, Dublin, I am unable to furnish any escort of cavalry without infantry." I say that that paralyses me on the spot; then I must go back again to Mr. Ormsby Booth's agent and say, "You must give me cars for 30 men, for I want four infantry on a car at the outside;" so that I should require eight or nine cars for a very small party of infantry, which, according to Lord Strathnairn's orders, must accompany the troopers; and those cars are essentially necessary for going any distance to escort, say, 40 or 50 voters in other cars. If I take foot soldiers with me we are out the whole day of the election perhaps; and if I have got 20 troopers, and 20 or 30 infantry walking behind them, it will be an endless business unless I have cars for them.

11240. Sir George Grey.] In consequence of that you dispensed with the cavalry?—Yes, altogether.

11241. Do you know whether the voters came in to vote?—No, I do not.

11242. You do not know what the result was of refusing the escort?—I do not.

11243. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion as to the effect which the employment of troops has upon the people generally?—Yes, I have; I think that the presence of the troops rather helps to attract a crowd.

11244. And to irritate the people?—No, I do not think so.

11245. Sir George Grey.] But you seem to think that they are of very little use?—I do not say that; I think that they are too much hampered by orders.

11246. When you say that you would dispense with them if you could, what do mean by that?—I would have the constabulary as being more handy and more useful; and a few of the constabulary will do more than three times the number of soldiers.

11247. Chairman.] Do you think that it would be possible in Irish elections to dispense altogether with an armed force?—No; and if you will permit me, I will say when I think that they would be necessary. I think that they would be necessary on the polling-day, to keep the approaches in the town open and clear.

11248. Do you think it is necessary to employ them as escorts?—Some escorts are sometimes required; but as I have said before, if you have cavalry, you must have a string of cars, with infantry after them.

11249. I am speaking either of soldiers or police. Do you think it is absolutely necessary in some counties in Ireland, that an escort of some sort should be sent a considerable distance to outlying districts, to bring in voters?—Sometimes, I am not prepared to state always; I do not think so, because if I sent every escort that was asked for in Sligo, I should have required the British army to be there to suit them at all.

11250. Mr. Cross.] Do you think that voters would come up without escorts?—I do.

11251. Do you think that they could come up safely without escorts?—I do; I have told the agents to let them alone, let them come in at night night or any other way, without show and singly, across the fields.

11252. Without an escort of either police or soldiers?—Yes, I will give an instance of that; a man in the town of Tobercurry, on the 26th of November, who rather wanted to come in under my escort, a poll clerk or somebody of that sort; I neither told him to come or not to come; however, somebody wanted me to give this man official protection; I asked him, was he a voter at all, a freeholder as they call them, and I was told that he was not a freeholder; I said, "Very well, I certainly shall not take any man who is not a freeholder, and I certainly shall not take in that man, because he does not require to come in; let him stop at home; he has no business there." That man was in Ballymote two hours before I was myself.

11253. Sir George Grey.] You think that the voters who are willing to come, might come, and, those that were not willing would stay away?—Yes, a very respectable man told me that day, "If you leave that man behind you will be answerable for his life." "Very well," I said, "all right;" and the first man I saw when I came into the town was this gentleman, and he told me that he had been in two hours before I was, and had never met a human being.

11254. Sir Frederick Heygate] How long have you been a resident magistrate?—Five years; since the 9th of March 1864.

11255. Who appointed you to that position?—Lord Carlisle, I think it was.

11256. Were you previously in the army?—Yes.

11257. For how long a period?--For 18 years.

11258. Upon what principle does the promotion of resident magistrates proceed; are they promoted on account of long service, from one station to another from different grades?—I do not know; I know that I am in the same grade that I was in when I began; I have not yet been improved in my position since I joined; I believe that I am not entitled to it yet.

11259. You, of course, show no political feeling on one side or another?—I have no feeling either way, and I think soldiers never have.

11260. It has been stated here that the presence of troops and escorts influences the elections; is that your opinion?—No, I do not think so, as I said before, I think that the troops tend to collect a great crowd of people, which is always objectionable in my mind.

11261. Will you explain to the Committee what you consider to be your position and strict duty as a resident magistrate, when you are sent down to a town where an election is going to take place?—I receive an order from the Chief Secretary to go to a certain station and to stop there, keeping the peace during such election. I proceed to that town, and I put myself in communication with the nearest local justice of the peace and the nearest central town magistrates, and I try to collect from them the state of feeling, the circumstances of the place, and all about it. I must form, of course, my own opinion and judge entirely for myself. Then I find in elections that the local justices of the peace are unwilling to act as magistrates, and I think naturally so. They are men who cannot act; they have their own people to look after; they are going to vote themselves; they perhaps may be obnoxious, and one thing and another may happen, and they say that they will not act; and that is the reason given by four or five resident magistrates that I have seen at the last Tipperary election.

11262. How many were there on this occasion?—Two; Captain Peel came up just at the last day.

11263. But how many in the county?—A great many, I think.

11264. Were there as many as 10?—There were four at Sligo, two at Easkey, and two at Ballymote. Captain Whelan was there, and Mr. Caulson was there.

11265. Do you constantly go for assistance in the preservation of the peace to the local magistrates?—Yes.

11266. Do they act in concert?—No, we are all detached.

11267. You each act upon your own responsibility?—Yes; we are obliged to do so. We are sent to particular spots, and told to stop there.

11268. You consider yourself charged with the preservation of the peace in all that district?—Yes, personally responsible.

11269. And in no way to interfere with the election?—No, in no way; we cannot do so, I think.

11270. You understand your duty to be to receive any complaint of danger that may exist, and to provide against it?—To take every means possible within your power, and according to the means placed at your command, to prevent a breach of the peace if possible, and so put an end to it as speedily as possible if unfortunately it should occur.

11271. If those applications for escorts are made to you, are they always obliged to be made on sworn informations?—I had never had them upon sworn informations before.

11272. Are they not many in that return of The O'Conor Don's that were made upon sworn informations?—I see that there are; but I had never seen this done before; but the circumstances in the county of Sligo, as I said before, were different from any other election that I was ever on; we never did it in Tipperary, where we had a great many escorts in a large district of 30 or 40 miles to traverse, and in that case it was only two days before, and at Lisburn in the North of Ireland the same, and at Tallaghmore in King's County the same, which was a very strongly contested election; there the escorts were always employed, merely for the one day, and there was no previous animosity, no dreadful feeling like it was in the county of Sligo; therefore the circumstances were so different that they have no comparison at all.

11273. When an escort is given, is it necessary that it should be accompanied by a magistrate?—That is my own opinion.

11274. Is it the rule?—I say soldiers certainly should be; I do not say the same with regard to policemen; I say that for the protection of the peace a police officer must have it within his power to go without a magistrate.

11275. The difference between the constabulary and the soldiers, as I understand it, is that the soldiers ought to be accompanied by a magistrate, and the constabulary can act upon their own responsibility?—Yes, they should do so.

11276. Each constable and soldier being a peace officer?—Yes, every man of the police, I say, represents the majesty of the law.

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

11277. Is there any difference in their arms?—I think the constabulary are better armed, for they have got the Schneider rifle, and beautiful weapons altogether.

11278. It was stated in evidence before the Committee that in one instance the police were marched by a circuitous route, was that the case?—It was done to save themselves from impediments.

11279. It was done, was it not, to avoid any chance of a conflict with the people?—They came by a bye road, instead of by a public road, that was the only difference.

11280. Are the voters under escort compelled to go to the poll?—I do not consider that they are compelled to go to the poll; I do not care whether they come or not, they may go away if they like, I should never dream of bringing them to the poll.

11281. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] If a voter asked you, he could go at once, could he not?—Yes, certainly.

11282. Sir Frederick Heygate.] It was stated in evidence that voters under escort were practically prisoners; is that your opinion?—No, it is not.

11283. At Question No. 7516 of Major General McMurdo's evidence, there was this question: "In what light do military officers regard those voters that are committed to their charge; do they regard them as free men whom they are bound to protect, or do they regard them in the light of prisoners?" and the answer given was, "Practically as prisoners; in receiving charge of a number of men, with orders to take them to a polling station, the officers are bound, according to their ideas of military usage, to take care of those men, that they do not escape, and that others do not injure them." Then Question No. 7519 is this: "And you were determined, in the case where you were employed, that they should not escape?" and the answer is, "Certainly; I gave most specific instructions with regard to the conduct of the officers and their men, in the event of their convoys being attacked." Is it your opinion, as a resident magistrate, that voters in that condition are prisoners?—Certainly not.

11284. Do you think that they consider themselves so?—I could not really say; some people, I daresay, do believe it. My mind would lead me on some points to arrive at the same conclusion, that they have imbibed the idea that they would be compelled to come to the poll.

11286. There was one question which was not read to you: "The officers understand that they are to take care that those men do not escape?" and the answer was, "Certainly; I gave orders myself in Tipperary that, in case of attack, the voters should not be allowed to move for fear of their being taken for rioters." In your opinion, would not many officers, in case of their escort being attacked, think it their duty not only to protect their voters, but to prevent the voters escaping under cover of the attack?—I should say not to prevent their escaping; I should say that it was their duty to prevent them, as far as possible, from being molested.

11287. Do not you think that is the impression of many officers that such is their duty?—They, perhaps, may have that impression; not all, I should think, but some young officers might think so.

11288. Sir Frederick Heygate.] It was stated in Major General McMurdo's evidence that he believed that in many cases there was no necessity for so large an escort, or for any escort, because no attack had been made upon the voters. Might not, in your opinion, a great necessity for an escort have existed although no subsequent attack had been made?—Yes. It is the presence of the armed power, or the law, that saves them a probable breach of the peace. I am quite of opinion that prevention is the very best course to adopt.

11289. At Question 7653, referring to the evidence about voters being taken as prisoners, Mr. Gathorne Hardy asked Major General McMurdo this question, "Did I rightly understand you to say that the voters were taken as prisoners?" and the answer was, "That is our feeling;" and the next Question, No. 7654, was, "But, I presume, that if any one of those persons were to tell the escort, or the commander of the escort, that he wished to be left, he would be left?" and the answer was, "No, certainly not." Do you agree that that is the practice in the Irish elections?—No, I do not know that it is.

11290. The next question is, "I understand your orders to apply only in the case of an attack upon the escort; but supposing that at the starting any one of them said, 'I do not wish to go,' do you mean to say that the escort would compel him to go?" and the answer was, "Certainly." Is that your view of the matter?—I should never recommend any officer in that way, because I consider that the officers are under my orders for the time being, and I should certainly never give them such instructions as that.

11291. As a resident magistrate you would state that such an idea amongst voters would be entirely a mistake, and also if such an idea existed amongst the officers as to their duty, it would be a mistake?—Yes, and amongst officers in general I do not think it is so. A young man may have an exaggerated idea, perhaps, of discipline, and he may think that if he is upon the escort he is bound to bring them in; but I do not regard it so.

11292. Mr. Cross.] The next question to General McMurdo was, "Do you mean from the time the commander of the escort receives the voters he would not allow him even of his own free will to go?" and the answer was, "He should take the very greatest care of him, and take care that he does not move from his seat. That is one of the inconveniences of the employment of military men on such service." Do you agree with that opinion?—It is a great inconvenience, certainly; but I do not think that a soldier has anything whatever to say as to the voter retaining his seat or vacating it. That is my idea about it.

11293. Sir George Grey.] Who gives the instructions to the military officer in command of one of those escorts?—I should say the magistrate who signs the requisition to him, and goes with with him, and stops by his side the whole time; he tells him what to do.

11294. Does he ever give written instructions to the officer as to what he is to do?—Never, because he is under his eye all the time; he never should leave him; I always tell the officer not to go out of sight.

11295. Do you mean that in every one of those escorts the magistrate is present with the officer commanding the troop?—I never knew an escort to be without.

11296. Sir Frederick Heygate.] In your opinion, what would have been the result if those escorts had not been granted in the case of the Sligo election?—There were only three or four granted altogether from beginning to end; I mean, including the patrols, because many of them were not escorts. In the case of the one at Tobercurry, if I had not gone to Tobercurry with those people I do not think that they would ever have got in, from the great resistance which was offered to me.

11297. Would those voters have been intimidated from coming to vote?—I think they would.

11298. By whom?—By the Liberal candidate's party, certainly.

11299. Was there a great excitement at that time in Sligo?—There was fearful excitement.

11300. Was that caused by the speeches of the candidates, or was it caused by the speeches or harangues of other parties?—It was caused, I think, partially by the harangues of the reverend Catholic gentlemen from the pulpits.

11301. Did the priests and clergymen take part in that election?—Yes; Mr. McDermot, for instance.

11302. Did the clergymen of any other denomination, besides the Roman Catholic priests, adopt that course?—I never heard of any at all; I heard of the Roman Catholic priests doing it, because it was reported to me especially, and I have a report of it here.

11303. Have you ever had any experience of the northern counties of Ireland?—I have been up in the north three or four times, on the 12th of July, and at elections, and so forth.

11305. It has been stated that the military are always brought into requisition by one side. When you have been to the north, has it been the case that military protection has been applied for and has been given, on a requisition, on the side of the Roman Catholic party?—As far as that is concerned I cannot answer that question, because I have no reason to know why I have ever gone to the north of Ireland. I have been ordered, and I have gone, and when I have been there neither party has ever come to me for assistance, as a party.

11306. Have you no knowledge that application is made in the north of Ireland by the Roman Catholic party as against the other party?—I do know it from other sources; but not from my own knowledge.

11307. Referring to the last election in the county of Sligo, was more military force than usual sent down there?—There was a greater force at the last election, and there were a great many more available and free; and there was a prevailing opinion in the country that there would have been possibly serious breaches of the peace; and I have no doubt that the Government, acting on the information which they received, took care that there should be no possible danger.

11308. Had you any special orders given you from the Government?—None at all.

11310. As resident magistrate of the county of Sligo, did you report to the Government the state of the county?—I reported with respect to the number of outrages and things of that kind. There is a special provision in the instructions that there is no necessity for sending up a duplicate report, because the report goes in to the Government itself, through the Inspector General.

11311. Did not the magistrates ask for an additional force on account of the disturbed condition of the county before the election?—I suppose the magistrates did; I did not ask.

11312. You were there a very short time, I believe?—Yes. And the short time I was there the county was in a very excited state; it was on the boil when I arrived there.

11313. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did you ask for additional police force?—Yes. I did not ask for soldiers; I wanted police, and I pressed for police, knowing that they were all free from other parts of Ireland, the other elections having been all over; therefore I asked for them and got them.

11314. Mr. Locke.] But you made one application for soldiers when they said that you must have infantry?—They were on the spot; that was a local application.

11315. Sir Frederick Heygate.] In collecting voters for escorts you stated, in answer to Sir George Grey, that those voters were brought by agents; how do you know that they were agents?—I had been associating with them for some days before, and had attended meetings where they came in as the representatives of the landlords.

11316. Did they act as election agents?—Mr. Swansey, whose application to me is referred to in the Parliamentary Paper, was an election agent; the other parties were land agents. They were their landlords assistants in managing their property.

11317. Was it the case on both sides that the land agents acted for their respective candidates?—That would be so if there was a necessity, but there never is; there is only a necessity on one side; there are never two sides at all, if I may use the Irishism, because one side of course see that there is no obstruction to their coming in, "only to the other side."

11318. You mentioned Captain Peel's name, how often was he associated with you?—A short time; he came down a few days before the election began.

11318*. Sir George Grey.] Was he a resident magistrate?—Yes.

11319. Sir Frederick Heygate.] In General McMurdo's evidence, at Question 7521, he recommends the arming of part of the soldiery with sticks, and that they should only in self-defence resort to their mortal weapons; as a resident magistrate, what do you think would be the effect of that?—There would be a dreadful "wattling" match, match, as they call it in Ireland, if there was anything of that sort done.

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

11320. Would not they be able to keep the peace?—I do not think so; I think there would be a regular row.

11321. The constabulary in Ireland are armed with the rifle, and in that respect are in quite a different position from the police in this country; do you think that it would be possible to take away the rifle and make them still efficient as a constabulary in Ireland?—I do, to a great extent; I think they are too much armed certainly. For instance, if I had 200 of the constabulary at an election, I should be very glad to have 100 of them with their short batons; I think they would be very useful, and would know how to manage a mob better. Fancy "soldiers" joining in a mêlée fighting with sticks, nothing could be more absurd; whereas, policemen are used to it every day.

11322. Sir George Grey.] Have you read General McMurdo's evidence, and the reasons which he gives for his opinion?—I just read sketches of the report in the paper, here and there, I have not seen it in extenso.

11323. Sir Frederick Heygate.] What number of polling places are there in the county of Sligo?—I think there are only three, Easkey, Ballymote, and Sligo.

11324. What number of voters are there in the county?—I do not know the number.

11325. Have you any idea of the average distance which voters would have to go to the poll?—Some very long distances, 15 or 20 miles in some cases, a great deal too long.

11326. Is it your opinion that a good deal of the necessity for escorts arises from long distances that voters have to go to the poll?—I think so; I have always thought that there ought to be more polling places, and more facilities afforded to the population of the country to record their votes.

11327. Supposing the polling places were only two or three miles apart, in your opinion, would it be possible to do without the military in that case?—Yes. In the Tipperary election two years ago, which was a dreadful contest between Captain White and Mr. Waldron, I had to ride 12 miles with a squadron of Scots Greys the night before, from Nenagh to Borrisokane; it is 11 Irish miles from Nenagh to Borrisokane. I was given instructions to go there with a squadron of Scots Greys, and to start from thence back the next morning again to Nenagh to bring up voters from the barony of Lower Ormond, the most distant point of which from the polling place was somewhere over 20 Irish miles, and I had about 150 or 200 cars in my charge on that occasion. They had to come from within one mile of Parsonstown from the end of the Lower Ormond district of Tipperary to Nenagh to record their votes. It is over 20 Irish miles, and if they had come to where I had started from to go to Borrisokane, it would have been half the journey exactly.

11328. Sir George Grey.] Was there no polling-booth at Parsonstown?—Yes; but it is not in the district, it is in another county. If there had been a polling-place at Borrisokane, which is a very good town, and a very large place, and afforded the military accommodation for 80 horses over night, and a good hotel, it would have saved a great deal of trouble; they had to pass that village and to go 11 Irish miles further on to Nenagh. They wanted me to bring them back again that night, but I said I would not do so.

11329. Sir Frederick Heygate.] In the county elections, is the danger greatest in getting to the town where the voter is to be taken, or in the town itself, when he is there?—The difficulty is to get him inside the town at all.

11330. When he gets into the town is it perfectly straight sailing?—He mixes with the crowd, and there is an end of it. We always escort them to the poll if we bring them there on the morning of the poll, but if we brought them in beforehand, as in this case of Sligo, they were left at the edge of the town, and we never saw them again; but I never saw that done before.

11331. Did you have any difficulty in keeping the passage to the poll open?—We had a strong force, and we kept the course open.

11332. If you had not had that force, would there have been any difficulty in keeping the course open?—There was a violent mob, armed with sticks.

11333. Was it the object of that mob to prevent voters from polling?—It would have been if they could have surrounded and closed up the polling booth, but it was kept clear a quarter of a mile down from the place, and there was as much freedom as there is to walk about here now.

11334. In case the ballot was established, would there be the same difficulty in getting to the poll, do you think, and the same necessity for the employment of a force to keep the approaches clear?—I should think not.

11335. Why?—I am not competent to give an opinion upon that, because I have not studied the question; but as far as I can judge, I should say there are a great many men who would wish to record their votes in secret, and be very glad to do it.

11336. Is it your opinion that there is much intimidation exercised by landlords upon voters going to the poll?—I cannot say as regards landlords; I do not know anything about landlord intimidation; I do not think there is; but I think there is intimidation of some sort put upon them.

11337. Is it the intimidation of the mob, or of public opinion?—I must say, from my experience, that I think it is spiritual intimidation by the priests.

11338. In the evidence given by the Reverend Mr. McDermott, at Question 8622, he is asked, "Is it your belief yourself that the Government intended to intimidate the voters by those escorts, and by the employment of the constabulary and the soldiers"? His answer is, "I believe that the Conservative candidates and the Conservatives of the county did so intend. Whether the Government or the executive really so intended or not I cannot judge, but I believe that such was the intention of those who sent out the force." The next question is, "Do you attribute to the Government the intention to intimidate the voters by the employment of the military at the last election?" To which he answers, "I attribute that to the officials of the Government in Sligo certainly, without any doubt whatever; I attribute it to the stipendary magistrate and to the high sheriff, as far as I can judge." At Question 8624, he is asked, "Were there several stipendiary magistrates employed in the election for the county?" The answer is, "Yes, but one was more remarkably so than the others"; are you that one?—I do not know who he refers to.

11339. Who

11339. Who was the sheriff?—The sheriff was Mr. Howley; but I think there was a change. On the 28th of November I got an order from the high sheriff, Mr. Orme, which was my first official knowledge of the gentleman to conduct the business. "Sir,—You will please take under your command the military and police stationed at Ballymote during the election, and see that they act effectively and with as little violence as possible whenever in your direction they are required. I am, sir, your obedient servant, Robert Orme, High Sheriff, county Sligo." That is the deputation which he sent to me to act.

11340. Was he high sheriff during the whole of the election?—Not at all.

11341. Was he high sheriff at the beginning of the election?—No, he did not fix the day of it or anything else; I believe he was not high sheriff till just before this date.

11342. Then there was a previous high sheriff who was superseded in the middle of it?—Yes; he was ill, I think; I do not know him.

11343. Is Mr. Orme, the second high sheriff, the person who is alluded to in this question which I have referred to?—Yes.

11344. What are his politics?—Upon my word I cannot tell you.

11345. At Question 8626, Mr. McDermot is asked, "Are you speaking now of one particular stipendiary magistrate?" and his answer is, "Yes, I think that one stipendiary magistrate was much more hostile to the Liberal candidate in Sligo; I do not speak now merely of the county, but of both the county and the borough elections; I think there was one more hostile to us than the rest, at least such is the general impression;" does that refer to you?—I have no idea in the world; I was not in the borough of Sligo at all.

11346. Was any complaint, to your knowledge, made against you to the Castle of Dublin for your conduct at the election?—I never heard of it in my life. In fact everybody at Ballymote, every gentleman, including the Roman Catholic priest himself, a gentleman whom I met every day, and received the greatest assistance from, a kind, nice, gentlemanly man, said, when I was going away, that they were all very much pleased with my services; several people told me that there was no disturbance, that I kept the peace of the place, and that there never was an election business terminated so quietly as at that time.

11348. It has been insinuated in this examination, to a great extent, that the Government helped the landlords to intimidate their tenants and make them vote against their will; I ask you, as a resident magistrate, have you any idea that such a thing was done?—Not the least in the world; not to my knowledge. I cannot fancy any resident magistrate doing it. I cannot fancy any man who had got a due regard to the position which he holds, which is one of pure disinterestedness as a Government officer, and I may say, an officer of the Crown, interfering in any way at all. I never heard of it and never saw it, and I live in the midst of a Roman Catholic population altogether in Galway.

11349. On the whole you consider that the election was satisfactorily conducted?—I thought so, and I received such an intimation from parties of opposite politics.

11350. Do you think it would be an improper imputation upon the late Government to say that they sent down troops with the view of influencing the election?—I should think it would be highly improper.

11351. Your opinion is that they simply took the course which it was their duty to do?—Certainly.

11352. Sir George Grey.] I understood you to say that the priests were on one side, and the landlords on the other, and the tenants were in great apprehension of the consequences of their voting for either the one or the other?—Yes.

11353. And that was a notorious fact?—Yes, certainly.

11355. Sir Frederick Heygate.] It has been stated that the disposition of the troops sent down by the late authorities was different on this election than usual; was that done at the instigation of the magistrates, or was it the idea of the commanding officer Lord Strathnairn or General McMurdo, for instance?—I do not know. In the early stage of the proceedings, before we knew exactly anything about it, the details were sent out, and indeed I cannot say who sent the soldiers down into the county.

11356. They were sent as if they were going to occupy a hostile country and undertake a campaign?—Yes, and by doing so they were of great value.

11357. But that was not at the instigation of the magistrates in any shape or way?—I really do not know.

11358. Did you suggest such a thing to the officer commanding the troops?—I will tell you what I did. In the early part, when we had only a very small portion of police, Colonel Bruce wrote to me to know whether I thought the presence of another company or something would be required on the polling day. I said, "Yes, there are only a few soldiers in the town."

11359. With regard to the escorts, you stated, did you not, that when you wished to have an escort of cavalry soldiers you were refused it unless it was accompanied by infantry?—He said he would not send cavalry without infantry.

11360. I wish to know whether the magistracy had anything to do with that, or whether it was due to military strategy that such measures were organised to occupy the country, that is to say, was it at all necessary to send infantry, cavalry, and artillery to escort those voters?—I do not know what was the opinion in other parts of the country. There were other districts, and there were other men of importance; there was the high sheriff, who was a very important functionary, and whatever he might have done, I had nothing to do with it.

11361. Mr. Locke.] On which side were the mob?—On the Liberal side.

11362. And the priests were on the Liberal side?—Yes, of course.

11363. Were all the priests on the Liberal side?—I do not know. Mr. McDermot, I suppose, was, from his own statements.

11364. I ask you, were all the priests on the Liberal

Major J. W. Percy.
2 July 1869.

Liberal side?—I have no reason to say that they were not. I do not know.

11365. You do not know whether they were or not?—I should say that they were on the Liberal side; but I cannot swear to the whole of them.

11366. You have been asked about those escorts; who is it that applies for the escort; it is some particular person, is it not?—Yes.

11367. And is it for the purpose of conducting persons to the poll?—Yes, to the poll.

11368. Then, of course, those persons who are to be conducted are all persons of one way of thinking, are they not?—Yes.

11369. There was no mixture of Liberals and Conservatives that had to be taken to the poll?—No, not to my knowledge.

11370. When they start off to go to the poll what is the duty of the person who takes them; is it to bring them to the poll?—If they choose to come with him it is his duty to help them up, to escort them, to prevent their being attacked, and if he can to bring them to the polling booth.

11371. When they have once started from a place, can they get out of being escorted?—I should say that they can go if they like.

11372. Can they just get out of the car and go away, without saying anything to anybody?—I should say so, certainly.

11373. But is that always the case?—As far as I have anything to do with it, it is.

11374. Does not that depend entirely upon the person who is at the head of the escorts; and may he not act precisely as he thinks proper?—I have never conceived it possible to prevent their going away if they wanted to go away.

11375. What distinction do you draw between soldiers and policemen in Ireland; are they not pretty much the same?—In the form of the force and efficiency, and everything, they are the same, but there is a very material difference in their constitution; the one is a peace officer and the other is military; as a police officer a policeman is absolute; one policeman is as good as 500 as representing the majesty of the law.

11376. Are not the police in Ireland an entirely different class of men from those in England?—Yes, they are a perfect and complete military force.

11377. If you see them marching into Dublin, or any other place, you would not know them from a regiment of riflemen?—No, they are very much alike.

11378. You would say they were a rifle brigade?—Yes, they are dressed alike; they are a very fine body of men.

11379. What would be the distinction between the police and a body of soldiers with an officer at their head?—In my opinion the police do not require a magistrate to go with them at all; but as to soldiers, it is a paramount necessity that they should have one.

11380. Is it your opinion that a soldier would not be protected by the law in the same way as the police?—That is my impression, and always has been.

11381. A policeman would act at once in the execution of his duty, and a soldier would not unless he was directed specially by his superior officer?—By a civil officer; by a magistrate, or a police constable, I say.

11382. But as to a private soldier and an ordinary policeman, they are much about the same, are they not?—In physical force, and in arms, and equipment, they are nearly exactly the same, and in drill also.

11383. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Is their intelligence similar?—No.

11384. Who is superior?—The constabulary; a member of the constabulary force is a man perfectly well able to sit down and write a report fit for anybody to read.

11385. Mr. Locke.] Is that the case with every private policeman?—Yes.

11386. The O'Conor Don.] You stated that there were very few, only three or four, escorts sent out at the last election in Sligo?—Very few.

11387. Are you aware that according to the Parliamentary Return, there were 24 escorts sent out?—There were upwards of 20; but I mean as far as Ballymote and myself were concerned.

11388. But are you aware that they were sent out in the same way in different parts of the county?—I was not aware; I only referred to the cases of four escorts.

11389. On the 27th you went yourself, did you not, to Tubbercurry?—Yes.

11390. And you applied for an escort of military to accompany Captain Peel to Coolaney?—Yes, the same day.

11391. And those two escorts went out upon the Friday, the election being on the Monday?—Yes.

11392. How far is Coolaney from Ballymote?—I was never there; I think it is eight or nine miles.

11393. Coolaney being eight miles from Ballymote, an escort of military and police were sent out upon the Friday to bring in voters for the polling upon the Monday?—Yes, that was so.

11394. And you state that they did not succeed in bringing in any?—I was told that they brought none at all.

11395. Upon the Sunday, was not another escort called for to go out in the same neighbourhood, and bring in voters?—No; we had a correspondence upon the subject; an escort was refused, but a patrol was sent.

11396. It is stated, in the Return to Parliament, that they went out and brought in 60 voters; is that correct?—It is substantially, but not strictly correct.

11397. Those were the Protestant voters, who you say were able to walk in without any molestation?—So I heard.

11398. It would appear that the agent, Mr. Hamilton, applied for an escort upon the Friday, to bring in the Catholic voters?—I do not know what they were; I suppose so.

11399. Voters that did not want to come?—I do not know that.

11400. An escort was applied for to bring in voters on the Friday a distance of eight miles, and none of these voters came in?—None came in.

11401. And upon the following Sunday 60 voters who wished to come in came in unmolested?—That is quite true.

11402. You consider that you were quite justified in calling for this escort of military and police on a mere application of the agent of a landlord in writing, without any sworn information?—I thought it was sufficient; I had to send out to Coolaney to bring in voters on the Friday, and the application came from the agent of one of the parties concerned.

11403. Do you consider that, where the landlords and their agents come to an understanding that that the voters are to be brought in, the resident magistrate is bound to send out an escort without any information being sworn to him that there is likely to be a breach of the peace?—I do, to a certain degree, as I said before.

11404. And you acted upon that supposition?—Yes; because that is what I had seen done elsewhere, where the high sheriff of the county is the party that has had to do with the general organisation of escorts.

11405. Where landlords meet together, and come to an understanding that it is time to bring in their tenants, do you consider the resident magistrate bound upon their application to send out escorts?—The sheriff and the deputy sheriff have hitherto asked for them, and the magistrates act on the best of their discretion.

11406. Without any application from the sheriff, you consider that it is the duty of the resident magistrate to obey the orders of an election agent?—You are sent there for the purpose of keeping the peace of the county.

11407. Were you at the late Sligo Assizes?—No, I was not.

11408. You stated that on one occasion, and only on one occasion, the police came in contact with those night rioters?—I happen to know that.

11409. There were shots interchanged on both sides?—So I heard.

11410. Are you aware that at the last assizes the judge who tried the case severely censured the conduct of the police?—No, I have not heard that.

11411. You stated that there was a man shot in the hand at Ballymote; was that man shot by those riotous mobs?—No, I do not know that; he was shot in the night before the polling; during the morning of the 30th of November.

11412. Do you know to which side of the politics that man belonged?—I do not.

11413. When you state that the electors are in dread on the one hand of eviction, and on the other of the priest, would it not be more correct to say, in dread on the one hand of eviction, and on the other of the mob?—Such was not my impression received at the time; I thought that they were afraid of denunciations from the altar, or eviction.

11414. Would not a denunciation from the altar follow just as much if, after having been escorted by the military or police, they voted against the priests' wishes?—It might, I suppose; but they were not to be allowed to do as they like, I think; that is my impression.

11415. What would they have done if they were allowed to do as they like?—I think in many instances they would have supported their landlord.

11416. From what premises do you draw that conclusion?—I do not know. I have no special reason for saying so; it is only a fancy of mine.

11417-34. None of them told you so?—None of them told me so; I had no conversation with them upon it.

11435. You stated that the military should never be without a magistrate; are you aware that in the county of Sligo they went out without a magistrate?—I am not.

11436. Do you consider that a police officer would be sufficient to accompany the military?—I do not think so, not if there was a magistate available; if he was not available, one constable would, in my opinion, be sufficient.

11437. Would one constable be sufficient to take the place of a magistrate?—If he was not present, then a constable, in my opinion, would do. I have heard that also argued legally; I believe it could be supported. I think a policeman would be sufficient in the absence of a magistrate to act with the troops.

11438. You spoke of voters being escorted very long distances in the county of Tipperary, was that long before the polling day?—On the morning.

11439. So that in Tipperary, upon the morning of the polling day, they considered that they could escort voters a distance of 20 miles?—Yes, I believe it was 20 miles.

11440. In the county of Sligo did you consider it necessary to send out troops to escort voters eight miles on the Friday before the polling day, the polling day being Monday?—If you will permit me, as I said before, the circumstances are not the same, they were entirely different. In the North Riding of Tipperary, the last time I was there, the contest was exceedingly violent, but there was no ill feeling; there was not the same amount of excitement prevailing at all as there was in Sligo; the cases were not the same, there was no disturbance whatever of the peace up to 12 hours prior to the polling; there was great and serious disturbances of the peace in the county of Sligo for three or four weeks previous to the polling; that makes all the difference, I think.

11441. The noble Chirman read to you the letter upon which you took the escort to Tubbercurry, on the 26th of November, from Mr. Townsend, in which he says, "I beg to inform you that about 20 of Colonel Cooper's voters arrived in this town on last night previous to starting for Chaffpool;" is not Chaffpool the residence of a Conservative landlord in that county?—It is the residence of Captain Armstrong.

11442. It is not a town, it is a landlord's residence?—I believe so; I do not know whether it is a town.

11443. Are you not aware that voters were taken to the houses of Conservative proprietors, and locked up in their yards?—I am not aware of anything of the sort.

11444. What do you understand by this letter in which Mr. Townsend asks for assistance, and states that the "Voters arrived in this town on last night, previous to starting for Chaffpool;" why should voters be starting for Chaffpool?—I do not know; I consider that no man ought to be stopped if he wanted to go to Chaffpool, or to go anywhere else.

11445. You consider, do you, that it was the duty of the police to protect those 20 voters in going to this landlord's house to be kept there till the polling day?—No, I do not say that; I say that it is the duty of the police to protect people who are in danger of being attacked if they apply for it, and ask for protection.

11446. But only upon their personal application?—Certainly; I do not think they are to do it unless a riot is going on.

11447. Were you personally applied to in any of those cases by the voters themselves for this protection?—I was not, except in one case.

11448. You were applied to, upon one occasion, by an individual for protection, and you refused it?—He was not a freeholder.

11449. But I understand that that protection

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

is not afforded to them as voters, but as citizens?—I did not grant the escort, because I was told the man was not a freeholder, and if he was not a freeholder, I did not consider he was in danger, that was all.

11450. Chairman.] Should you give an escort to any individual who asked for it any time?—No, certainly not.

11451. Should you give an escort to anybody, except at election times?—No, I never would.

11152. But at election times, you do not consider a sworn information requisite before granting an escort?—Where there are a great many electors or freeholders, 50 or 60, or any number to be brought in, there is a meeting of the magistrates, as I have said before, with the high sheriff, or some civil functionary, in the chair, arranging the details for bringing people in for the election.

11453. In this case, of the county of Sligo election, I think you said there was no meeting of magistrates?—There was; Mr. Hamilton and others met; there was Captain Gethin there, and he is a local magistrate. Captain Peel was at the same meeting; he came up about the 25th. Captain Peel's name has been used with mine in correspondence with Mr. Hamilton.

11454. You appear to have considered that a representation from the election agent or the agent of some county gentleman was a sufficient ground for you to furnish an escort to go to a certain place and bring those voters who were expected to vote?—I did it because I had seen it so done elsewhere.

11455. But under no other circumstances would you give an escort to take a body of persons from one point to another?—No, I would not; because I consider that I was sent down for the purpose of taking that business up, and carrying on the business of the election in the most practicable and quiet manner.

11457. Although, so far as you or the persons with whom you were acting were concerned, there may have been no ground for the imputations which have been read to you which were made by Mr. McDermot, do not you think the fact of sending escorts here and there about the country merely for the purpose of escorting Conservative voters might very reasonably have given rise to the impression which Mr. McDermot says did exist?—I do not think that it could or did.

11458. Do you believe that any number of people thought that the escorts were employed for anything but for the purposes of protection?—I am satisfied that they did not think anything otherwise.

11459. And do you think that any change in the system is required?—It is a difficult question the management of elections; it is the most difficult one that could possibly be asked to give an opinion upon, and I have always the greatest difficulty when I think about it.

11460. The O'Conor Don.] This meeting at which you met magistrates was not a meeting of magistrates; was it not a meeting of election agents and land agents to bring in voters?—There were, I think, two or three magistrates; I cannot remember their names.

11461. There might have been magistrates there, but it was not a meeting of magistrates; it was a meeting of the election agents of the Conservative candidates, some of them happening to be magistrates; was that not the case?—No; I think it was the intention to depute Mr. Duke to act with the troops.

11464. The meeting was not a meeting of the magistrates of the county to suggest what measures should be taken for the peace of the county?—It was practically, because that was the very object of the arrangement to meet on Thursday to settle about those escorts.

11465. The object of the meeting was to settle about the escorts for bringing in all the voters?—Yes.

11466. And it was a meeting composed of the election agents and the land agents of the Conservative party in the county; are you aware whether any representative of the Liberal side was at that meeting?—I do not think there was.

11467. Was any Liberal magistrate asked to come to that meeting?—I do not know; there would be but one or two magistrates in the place.

11469. The O'Conor Don.] Was it the committee-room of the Conservative candidates?—No, it was in Morrison's Hotel, 11470. Was not that hotel engaged by the Conservative candidates as a committee-room, and did not the Conservative candidates hold their election meetings at that hotel in Ballymote?—No, they did not, at least I think not. I know that the soldiers were all there, and I do not know where they could have held any election meeting, for we had 16 or 17 officers in the house.

11471. Mr. Leatham.] You spoke about some meeting of the Conservatives; was that the meeting that we are speaking of now?—Yes. I think there was only one meeting, as well as I remember.

11472. You called it, I think, in the course of your evidence, a meeting of the Conservatives?—Yes, and I say so still; I believe there were no Liberal representatives there.

11473. It was not a meeting of the magistrates, but merely a meeting of the supporters of the Conservative candidates?—I did not notice that there was any Liberal representative present.

11474. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Were a great number of those who were there magistrates?—I think Captain Armstrong was there.

11475. Is he a resident magistrate?—No; a county magistrate.

11476. Were the greater portion of the others that

Major J. W. Percy.

2 July 1869.

that were there magistrates?—We had a plenty of them; Mr. Swansey, Mr. Hamilton, and Captain Armstrong.

11477. In granting those escorts upon the representation of these gentlemen, you did not grant them because they happened to be agents, but because they happened to be trustworthy witnesses, I suppose, of the state of affairs in the district?—Yes.

11478. And therefore the best evidence you could get of the necessity for escorts?—Yes.

11479. And occasionally you granted them?—Yes.

11480. Not in any way to influence the election?—Certainly not; so far as my opinion, of course, was concerned about the matter.

11481. You would be responsible to the Government if you took any step of that kind?—Yes, personally I should consider myself so.

11482. But you would really be so?—Yes.

11483. Do you report from time to time all that you did to the Government?—Yes.

11484. How often, and to whom, does the resident magistrate report?—To the Chief Secretary.

11485. How often do you report?—When there is anything to report, if necessary, daily. I did not consider that there was any necessity to report daily. Those outrages were reported by me, and that night canvassing was reported by me.

11486. Did you send to the Chief Secretary a report of the conduct of the election as far as you had anything to do with it?—Yes, afterwards; I said that it was all peaceably conducted, and there were no breaches of the peace of any kind complained of; the troops had returned to their stations, and the whole district was quiet.

11487. Did you recapitulate to him what number of troops you had employed or called out?—I sent him up a statement at that time.

11488. In fact, the Chief Secretary knows from time to time, and at short intervals, exactly what you are doing?—Yes, exactly.

11489. And what every other resident magistrate in the county is doing?—Yes.

Tuesday, 6th July 1869.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.	Mr. Howes.
Mr. Brand.	Mr. Hunt.
Mr. Bright.	Mr. Leatham.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Locke.
Sir George Grey.	The O'Conor Don.
Mr. Gathorne Hardy.	Mr. William Henry Smith.
The Marquis of Hartington.	Mr. Villiers.
Sir Frederick Heygate.	Mr. Whitbread.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Reverend GEORGE BUTLER, D.D., called in; and Examined.

6 July 1869.

11490. The O'Conor Don.] YOU are the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, are you not?—Yes.

11491. Have you read the evidence given by Mr. Spaight before this Committee?—Yes.

11492. I believe you communicated with the Chairman of this Committee in reference to some statements made with regard to yourself in that evidence?—Yes.

11494. Will you describe to the Committee what share you actually took in that election; I believe it was a very unexpected one, was it not?—The contest was a very unexpected one; the election took place upon Thursday, and it was only on the Monday previous that any notice was given of a contest; by the election day I mean the polling day; Thursday was the polling day, and there was no notice of a contest until the Monday previous; upon that Monday previous, in the morning, I left Limerick, and I was absent from home, and far away from that moment until the night before the polling; in the meantime I had no communication, by letter or otherwise, with any person in Limerick; I arrived at home on the night before the polling; on the morning following, shortly after nine o'clock, Mr. Russell, one of the Liberal candidates, called upon me with his conducting agent, Mr. Joseph Murphy, and took me in his carriage to the polling-booth of my ward; that polling-booth was stationed on the outskirts of the city, in the direction of my residence.

11495. Do you live outside the city?—Yes, I live about a mile outside the city; the polling-booth of the ward in which I live, and where I had to record my vote, was on the outskirts of the city, in the direction of my house, so that in order to go to the polling-place I had not to pass at all through the city; I went in Mr. Russell's carriage, and entered the polling-booth; I stayed about five minutes, or, perhaps, seven minutes altogether, in the booth, during which I was simply waiting for my turn, as there were some people voting before me; the moment my turn came, I recorded my vote, and instantly left the polling-booth, walked straight home, and did not leave my house for the rest of that day.

11496. You did not visit any other polling-places?—No, I did not go into the city at all.

11498. Is not your carriage one that is very well known in Limerick, so that it could not be mistaken for any other?—I do not think it likely that any person who lives in Limerick could mistake my carriage for another. It is remarkable, on account of the episcopal livery, and the episcopal arms, and it is known by everybody. I do not think it could be mistaken for another carriage.

11499. It was stated before this Committee, but denied by Mr. Spaight, that the Conservatives of Limerick, supported Mr. Pigott at the election. Mr. Pigott was considered the Fenian candidate, was he not?—Yes; his candidature was put forward for the purpose of catching the Fenian vote in Limerick, and employing the Fenian power in the Conservative interest.

11500. How far is it correct that the Conservatives did not support Mr. Pigott?—Mr. Pigott was supported very much by the Conservatives. I should say that at least one-third of those who voted for Mr. Pigott were Conservatives, and some of them very prominent members of that party.

11501. Sir George Grey.] Do you know how many Conservatives voted for Mr. Pigott?—I think about 60 Conservatives voted for Mr. Pigott, and I think the total number of votes recorded for him was about 170.

11502. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know what the Conservative strength in the constituency is?—I do not know what the Conservative strength is, nor nor I do know how many Conservatives voted altogether on that occasion.

11503. The O'Conor Don.] Mr. Spaight has also described that the elections on previous occasions in Limerick were very violent, and in particular the election in 1865, and amongst other acts of violence, he stated at Question 7055, "My house, on Sunday evening, in 1865, was wrecked in the presence of a squadron of Lancers, and absolutely the stones came over their lances." Are you in a position to state whether that is correct or not?—I was not present on the occasion to which Mr. Spaight alludes, that is to say, I was not at his house, or in view of his house, when that occurred; but it so happens that within the last 10 days, I have had a conversation with the stipendiary magistrate, who was in charge of the squadron of Lancers that was guarding Mr. Spaight's house, and he said to me that he read Mr. Spaight's statement before this Committee with amazement; that it was totally and entirely without foundation, and that if he were summoned before this Committee, he would state that from the time the Lancers appeared, until they left, there was not a single stone at all thrown at Mr. Spaight's house. The resident magistrate to whom I allude is Mr. De Gernon, who is now stationed at Rathkeale, in the county of Limerick.

11504. Upon that occasion, I believe, some damage was done to Mr. Spaight's house?—Yes.

11505. In Question 7059, Mr. Spaight gives us an explanation of the word "wrecked:" "The meaning of the word 'wrecked' is, that not a whole pane of glass is left, and that every room in the house was filled with stones of all dimensions, and the furniture and everything broken;" did not Mr. Spaight put in a claim for compensation for damages done to his house after that election?—Yes, he did. No doubt, unfortunately, there was some damage done to Mr. Spaight's house, which everybody regretted; but, at the same time, the statement that he made about it to the Committee was entirely exaggerated. He brought a claim before the grand jury of the city of Limerick for the damage done, and he claimed compensation for the smallest things, things that were not above 2 s. or 3 s., and the whole bill, I think, amounted to 12 l. It is hard to believe that all his furniture and all the windows in his house were only worth 12 l., it is rather a strong statement.

11506. I believe that mobs are at times in the streets at elections in Limerick?—Yes.

11507. At the last election there were rival mobs, were there not?—Yes; I saw myself one mob in Limerick on the occasion of that election.

11508. What day was that?—That was on the Monday morning which I spoke of. The first notice that was given of the contest in Limerick was the appearance of a very large mob in the streets, who came out in the interest of Mr. Tait and Mr. Pigott.

11509. Are you not aware that it was sworn before the judge at the trial of the election petition that several magistrates and supporters of Messrs. Russell and Gavin were afraid to go out to canvass in consequence of that mob?—Yes; I was present at the trying of the petition, and I heard several gentlemen of the city, and some of them magistrates, swear before the judge that they were afraid to go out in the streets to canvass for the Liberal candidates; that they were afraid of the mob that was parading the streets at the time in the interest of the Tory candidates.

11510. Were not some of the priests requested to assist in collecting a body of people in order to support the Liberal candidate at the hustings on the nomination day?—Yes. I became aware for the first time when the petition was tried, that one or two priests had given active help in collecting together a body of people to sustain and protect the candidates and their friends on the day of nomination. The magistrates were afraid to go into the streets lest they should be molested by the mob that was gathered there, and they requested the priests to try and get some people together, who would walk with them through the streets and protect them. I think it was proved on the petition that two clergymen did interest themselves in the matter, and that a large number of people were got together to accompany the candidates and their friends to the hustings, and to give the prestige of popularity to the Liberal cause.

11511. When the priests assist in collecting the people in that way to accompany the candidates, do they not sometimes order refreshments for those persons whom they ask to accompany the candidates?—I do not know that they order refreshments exactly, but I think that they are sometimes anxious that the persons should get refreshments. When a number of people collect together for the purpose of accompanying a canvassing party, and they are on foot all the day, a great many come to the clergyman who perhaps asked them to join the canvassing party, and request him to procure some refreshments for them; and in such cases the priest would be generally anxious that the people should not be disappointed, and would recommend that refreshments should be given; but I am quite sure that upon any occasion of that sort, wherever a priest is concerned, he takes the best precautions he can that there shall be no abuse, and he charges the persons concerned in giving the refreshments, not to give anybody too much.

11512. You do not think that the priests generally furnish the men with drink?—I should think that is a thing which never happens. I do not believe that the priests are ever the immediate dispensers of drink. They sometimes recommend refreshments to be given, as I said before; and I quite admit that on these occasions some few may drink to access, because in spite of any vigilance that may be employed abuses will occur; but to say that the clergy desired this, or intended it, or did not take the best precautions they could against it, would be simply a calumny totally destitute of foundation.

11514. And all you know about the conduct of any of the priests, was that which appeared in the public papers which everyone else in the city might be aware of?—In fact nothing more, because I was absent from the city myself. I merely saw what was in the papers, and I heard what was proved on the petition; but there was no complaint brought before me on the subject, as the ecclesiastical superior of the clergy.

11515. The priests, I suppose, do interfere in elections in Limerick and in other parts of Ireland?—Yes, very actively indeed, especially where there is a principle at stake, or where some great issue is put before the constituencies, such as upon the last occasion, for example, when Parliament was dissolved for the purpose expressly of ascertaining whether the people of the country wished for Protestant ascendancy or for religious equality. The priests considered that a supreme moment had then arrived, when, if ever, they were called upon to interfere and give their best help to the people by rousing them and guiding them, and urging them on to give effect to what they knew to be the people's real feelings and convictions on that subject.

11516. And their interference is generally used, is it not, to make the people act independently of coercion or bribery, or any other improper influence?—I should think that the action of the priests is directed entirely to that. I never knew an instance of a priest asking or suggesting to anyone to vote against his honest convictions. Their whole action lies in the line of urging and encouraging the people to act up to their convictions. They know what the people feel, and what their principles are upon those great questions, and they always inculcate the doctrine that the elective franchise is a trust held and to be exercised for the public good; not a merchandise to be trafficked in for personal gain or private advantage.

11517. If the priests' influence were withdrawn would not the people be afraid to act singly against the many influences that are brought to bear against them; and what do you think would be the result if the priests' influence were withdrawn altogether from politics?—I should think that the influence upon the priests themselves would be very salutary. The priests would be most happy to retire from politics, if they could conscientiously do so. They find that the scenes into which they are led, and the distraction and turmoil in which they are obliged to live during a contested election in which they take part, are wholly unsuited to their vocation, and to their sacred duties, and it is always with reluctance, and under a painful sense of duty that they consent to be mixed up at all with these contests. But another question would be, what effect it would have upon the general interests of the country, and upon the public good, if the priests were to retire from politics? I should say that in the present posture of our affairs it would have a very bad effect, indeed.

11518. In what way would it have a bad effect; would the people give themselves up to Fenianism and to revolutionary projects?—I think that great numbers of the people, whose hopes for their country are set on revolution would take that line, and follow whatever leader had the boldest and most violent counsels to put before them.

11519. Do you think that they would be afraid singly to act upon their convictions with regard to elections, when there would be no one to guide them; that they would be afraid to act, and that they would give up acting altogether at the Parliamentary elections?—Yes; I think that whenever landlord intimidation was brought to bear, the people would be afraid singly to oppose their landlords: whereas if there were anyone of intelligence and influence, in whom they had confidence, such as the priest, to organise and direct them, and bring them to move together in a body, they would take courage to act on their principles and convictions against the landlord; for they would know that he could not punish them all, and they would expect that, in such a case, he might not punish anyone. But I am bound to add in reply to the question, that one of the chief difficulties encountered by the priests and others who take a lead in politics, has been, for the last few years, not so much to induce the people to move in the right direction, as to induce them to move at all, or take any interest in Parliamentary representation. The people have been getting into a sort of despair of any good coming from legislation by the Imperial Parliament; and they have been taught and led to look rather to Washington than to Westminster for redress of the grievances of their country. In fact, when a petition to Parliament was proposed to the people, the clergy very often found it difficult to induce them to sign the petition; not that they did not feel the grievance complained of, and desire the redress prayed for in the petition; but that they regarded all petitions as useless, or, worse than useless, as mere shams; and it is only very lately, since the legislation which is now in progress began, and which really took the people by surprise, when the first attempt was made to establish religious equality, and to dry up that sore of Protestant ascendancy, that was irritating and disfiguring, and degrading the country; it is only since then that they have begun to have any hopes that remedial measures may yet come to them from England.

11520. You think that the influence of the priests has been directed to induce the people to try to have their views carried out through constitutional means? — Certainly.

11521. Would you approve of taking the vote by ballot at Parliamentary elections?—Yes, I should indeed approve greatly of it.

11523. Chairman.] What do you mean by intimidation?—By intimidation, I mean undue fear or terror, brought to bear upon the voter, either by mobs or by landlords; I think that both the one and the other would be almost entirely done away with by the ballot; because I take for granted that there would be no means of ascertaining for whom the voter recorded his vote, and therefore there would be nothing for the mob to act upon, or for the landlord to act upon, after the vote was given.

11524. The O'Conor Don.] Is there any other advantage that you would see in the establishment of the ballot?—I should expect that if the ballot were established the clergy would be able to withdraw very much from politics. The people would be then left to themselves, and I think that the people might be depended upon to vote according to their conscientious convictions when there was no restraint put upon them on either side.

11525. If the ballot were established, do you think that the priests would find out how the members of their congregations voted?—I do not think that a priest would have any means of finding it out, except the means that any gentleman here would have of finding out how his neighbour voted.

11526. If a man voted against the views taken by the priest do you think that he would tell him afterwards that he had voted that way contrary to the view which he knew the priest entertained?

tertained?—I do not think it at all likely that he would; I do not see why he should tell him.

11527. It has been suggested to the Committee that, in the confessional, the priest would have the means of discovering how a man had voted; could a priest make use of the the confessional for this purpose?—The only possible way in which the question of voting could come before the priest in the confessional would be if the person who voted believed that he had offended God by the manner in which he had voted, and if he accused himself of that as a sin in confession.

11528. Sir George Grey.] Suppose he promised to vote for one person and voted for another, would the breach of his promise be an offence which he would be bound to confess?—Yes, he would do so in any case connected with his vote where he thought he had committed sin and had offended God, whether it was by breaking his promise, or by voting from corrupt motives, or taking a bribe, or in any other way acting against his conscience. Suppose, for example, that the question was brought before the constituency, whether it should be declared a felony punishable by death to say mass in Ireland, and suppose a Catholic voted to the effect that it should be declared a felony, I take for granted that he would at once think that he had offended God by that vote, and when he went to confession, he would accuse himself of it as a sin that he had committed against God, just as if he had robbed a man, or killed a man, or committed any other crime.

11529. The O'Conor Don.] Supposing a man in confession did state to the clergyman to whom he went to confess, that he had voted in a particular way for the reasons you have given, could that clergyman make any use whatsoever of that knowledge?—None whatever, directly or indirectly. One of the most sacred and stringent obligations under which a priest is placed on this earth is the obligation of absolute and entire secresy with regard to anything that is revealed to him in confession touching a penitent's sins.

11530. Mr. Hunt.] Could he impose penances upon him for that sin?—He not only could, but he is obliged to do it; it is a part of his duty. Penance or satisfaction is a part of the sacrament, and the priest is therefore obliged to impose a penance whenever he gives absolution; but as regards the obligation of total and entire secresy with respect to the subject-matter of confession, I wish to add that the obligation is imposed upon the priest, not only by the natural and divine law, and by the ecclesiastical law, under its most terrible sanctions; but it is furthermore enforced upon him by his sense of his own interests, or by the law of self-preservation; for if it were ever discovered that a priest had in the slightest way, directly or indirectly, interfered with the seal of confession, he would not only be instantly and for ever set aside by his ecclesiastical superiors, but he would be cast out forthwith by the people themselves. Nobody would ever again approach him or even look at him, unless with horror. He would be regarded as one who had committed the blackest and most hideous crime; a crime, however, let me add, of the commission of which by a priest there is no record in the history of the Church. I may illustrate the nature of the secresy which guards the confessional by a case which is commonly made in theology. Suppose a priest's servant confesses to the priest himself that he has been systematically robbing the priest for a certain length of time, by taking money out of the priest's desk which was always left open under his hand; the priest cannot lock his desk; he cannot turn away the servant; he cannot watch him, he cannot do anything whatever that he would not have done if he had not heard of it at all; and if he were to do so, he would violate his duty in a most essential point.

11531. The O'Conor Don.] With regard to the question asked you by the Right honourable Member, as to the priest imposing penance, what sort penances are usually imposed in the confessional?—The penances usually imposed in the confessional vary, but they are very slight; the penance imposed is a part of the sacrament; in order to complete the sacrament of penance there must be some penance imposed. But the priest seldom imposes the amount of penance that he thinks the penitent ought to perform. He leaves that a great deal to the penitent himself; and, generally speaking, it is only to read some prayers, which perhaps will occupy him a quarter of an hour, or to hear mass for a few mornings, or to give some small alms, or to perform some other works of piety or charity, which come easy to the penitent.

11532. You do not think that any person could be at all influenced under the ballot as to the way that he should vote, by the fear of penance imposed upon him in the confessional?—Never; it often happens that the penitent is rather anxious that the priest should give him more penance than he does give.

11533. It is generally the performance of some religious duty, is it not, attending some religious service, or saying some prayers?—Yes.

11534. I understand you to state that the confessional could in no way aid the priest in obtaining a knowledge as to how a man voted, which knowledge could be used publicly afterwards?—Decidedly not; he cannot use the knowledge obtained in the confessional, either publicly or privately.

11535. To turn to another subject: you are aware that the military and the police are sometimes used at Irish elections in collecting and escorting voters?—Yes, that is quite customary.

11536. Can you state whether the impression has been general amongst the people, that they are used on those occasions to coerce them?—There is a very strong impression, I know, upon the minds of the Liberal party, that when the Tory Administration is in power, the military are sometimes used to carry out their political views. I do not mean to say that that is a correct impression, neither am I able to say much about it, of my own knowledge.

11537. But can you state, from your own knowledge, that the impression among the people is that the military and the police are used, not to protect them, but to coerce them?—That impression I know does prevail; but I am not prepared to give any facts as within my own knowledge.

11538. Sir George Grey.] In what way do the people apprehend that the coercion of troops that are sent to be present at an election, will be brought to bear upon them?—They apprehend, I think, that demonstrations in favour of the Liberal candidates in the streets will be put down, and that demonstrations in favour of the Tory candidates will not be put down, and in the case of any mêlée, or any affray, that the military power will be brought to bear rather upon the people who are supporting the Liberal candidate than upon those who support the other. I merely state that that is the impression of the people. I do not state that as my own impression.

11539. Mr. Bright.] With regard to the confessional and the vote, it has been suspected by many persons that, under the ballot, the priest being a strong partisan, as he may be on some occasions, would greatly influence the voter, and that the ballot would be no security to him; that although it might secure him from the landlord, it could not secure him from the priest, because the priest has a power over him which the landlord has not, through his priestly character through the confessional; can you give the Committee any information upon that point?—I do not see how it is possible that the confessional can be brought to bear at all upon a voter, except in the one case that I mentioned; that is the case where the man who voted believed that he committed a sin against God by his vote, and on going to confession accused himself of that sin as he would of any other; but then I say, that with regard to that knowledge which is communicated to the priest in that case, he can make no use whatever of it directly or indirectly.

11540. Some persons assume that the priest in the confessional charges the penitent with certain things that the priest may have known; for example, that he had voted contrary to the party of the priest, and he says, "You did so-and-so, which was very wrong, and if you persist in that course, I shall deny you the privileges of the Church;" is it conceivable or possible that influence of that kind directly from the priest, and not from the penitent, should be made use of under the ballot?—It is not at all conceivable that such a thing could happen; first of all, the person that voted need not go to confession at all if he likes; persons are bound to go to confession once a year by the law of the Church, but he need not go to confession for months after the election; moreover, he need not go to any priest in that place, but may select a confessor totally unconnected with the locality; and in any case, the priest is never allowed to ask a question about anything except what concerns a man's sins; and it is only in exceedingly rare cases that it could be supposed that a man committed a grievous sin by his vote.

11541. Sir George Grey.] Take the case where a priest takes an active political part in elections as you have stated; he canvasses the members of his congregation, they promise him to vote for a particular candidate, and they break that promise, voting by ballot; has not the priest then the power in the confessional of ascertaining that they had so broken their promise, because, according to your previous statement, they think it a sin which they would be bound to confess?—Then the priest knows the thing if they confess it, but he knows it under the seal of confession.

11542. Mr. Bright.] If the man did not confess, it would be a thing punishable in your church that the priest should charge him with something that he knew that he had done; it means voting in a certain way, although the penitent himself made no confession of it, and did not deem it to be a sin?—The only case in which that could occur would be where the thing in question was so plainly and manifestly a sin that there could be no doubt or controversy about it. Suppose, for example, that a priest saw a person drunk, and that person came to confession a short time after, and did not accuse himself of drunkenness. Now it is known to all Catholics that drunkenness is a grievous sin; the priest therefore being aware that the penitent had committed this sin, and finding that he was not accusing himself of it, would call it to his recollection, with the view of helping him to make a good confession.

11543. But an interference by the priest in the confessional with a man's general freedom of voting would be considered contrary to his duty, would it not?—It is a preposterous idea. No priest would think of such a thing, and no penitent would allow it.

11544. Would such a thing be likely to cause him to lose the confidence of his parishioners?—Decidedly it would. If the parishioners thought that he was using the confessional for the purpose of carrying out his own political views nobody would ever confess to him at all. It would be instantly reported to the bishop, and he would be set aside at once.

11545. Mr. Villiers.] I think it is assumed that the priest is a strong partisan?—Yes, that seems assumed.

11546. Is it that which has led people to suppose that he would be curious to know how his flock had voted, and that, under those circumstances, he would seek to obtain the information?—Do you mean desirous of knowing it through mere curiosity, without intending to make any use of it.

11547. But, where there are many partisans in the flock, if they suspected that a certain number of people had voted wrong, would not the priest be upheld in seeking to discover it?—I do not understand with what view he would seek to discover it

11548. With a view to ascertain whether a man voted as he ought to have voted?—But what would be the object of the priest ascertaining it when he cannot make any possible use of it for the rest of his life, when it should lie hidden in his own breast and locked up there for ever. As to the priest asking the question from mere curiosity to know whether something had occurred that had not reference to the sins of the penitent, it would be violating his duty in the most signal manner, and the penitent would not, and ought not, answer him at all if he asked impertinent questions of that kind.

11549. But there may be reason to suppose that a man has voted contrary to his promise, and he makes no mention of it when he comes to confession, like the case which you mentioned, where a man has happened to be drunk, and makes no allusion to it upon the same occasion, would not you consider yourself bound to lead him to make a confession with respect to his vote, in the same way as you do with respect to drunkenness?—If I thought that his duty, with reference to voting, was so clear that it was an evident and manifest sin to have voted in one particular way, and if I thought that he was simply forgetting that he had done so, I might ask him the question, just as I would about the case of drunkenness. But, of course, if it came out upon that question that he had voted in a way that was sinful, the knowledge that he had so voted would be perfectly useless to me. I could never make the slightest use of it.

11550. I think I understand you, that you could could make no use of the discovery of any sin or crime by confession; but you may withhold an advantage, may you not, inasmuch as they come to confession, not for the sake of the penance, but for the sake of absolution?—To be sure they come to confession mainly for the sake of absolution.

11551. Might not those people be afraid of not receiving absolution?—Not at all; because the condition of that absolution is simply that a person confesses his sin, and is sincerely sorry for it, and firmly resolved not to commit sin again; those are the conditions for absolution.

11552. What you have said lately does not quite seem to consist with what it collected from your evidence before; you said that if the ballot was to be the mode of voting, the priest would withdraw from any interference in elections; do you think that they would do so or not?—I think that if the ballot were established, the priest would be able to withdraw, to a great extent; at all events I think he would not come into the turmoil of contested elections, as he is obliged to do now very often.

11553. You think that the ballot would protect voters against other influences, and that there would be no occasion for the priest then to interfere?—I think so; I think the priests interfere generally for the purpose of meeting the pressure that is brought to bear upon the voter from other quarters, by his landlord for instance, or by persons tempting him with bribes, or other advantages. The priest, as I said before, inculcates the doctrine that the voter holds his vote as a trust for the public good; that he cannot therefore sell it, or barter it away for private advantage. He further teaches that the landlord has no right to control the vote of his tenant; that he is entitled simply to his rent; and that when he seeks to force the tenant to vote against his convictions and his conscience, such as forcing Catholics to vote for Protestant ascendancy, he is exercising over the tenant a debasing and intolerable tyranny to which no one should submit.

11554. Do you believe from what you know of the Irish people that they would maintain secrecy with respect to their vote; would they not communicate, either in a drunken moment or to some members of their family, the way in which they voted, and would not it then be known both to the landlord and the priest?—I do not think it at all likely that they would act so foolishly; I think the people of the country are very well able to keep their secrets when it is important to themselves that they should be kept; I cannot say whether they might tell their own families; they might do that or they might not, but if they did so, their families would take care to keep the thing concealed if they thought that the publication of it would injure the voter.

11555. Upon the whole, you think it would be an unqualified advantage to establish the ballot with regard to public elections?—I think it would. It is the only remedy that I can see, if the ballot were so established that it would be a perfect impossibility to find out how a man voted, unless he were fool enough to tell it himself. I think it would remedy a great many of the evils which are attendant at present upon elections in Ireland.

11557. Mr. Hunt.] How long have you been Bishop of Limerick?—I was consecrated bishop in the year 1861.

11559. The fact is, as you have stated, that you did not go in your carriage to the poll, but you went in Mr. Russell's carriage?—Yes.

11560. Then, did Mr. Russell's carriage bring you home?—No, I walked home. Mr. Russell pressed me to ride home in his carriage, but I declined; I preferred walking.

11561. Are you aware whether Mr. Russell's carriage went to the different polling places in the course of the day?—I am not in the least aware.

11562. Do you think it probable that it did?—I do not know; I do not know where Mr. Russell was during the day, for I never left my house during the day.

11563. I suppose your going in a candidate's carriage with him to the poll may be considered, to a certain extent, as doing what you could to influence the election?—I should think not.

11564. It would be a strong indication, would it not, as to the way in which your feeling went as regards that?—There was no doubt how my feeling went, when the question was as between Protestant ascendancy and religious equality; everybody knew what my feelings should be; but I do not think that 20 people saw me come to the poll in Mr. Russell's carriage; it was very early; it was shortly after the polling booths were opened, and there were but few people about the booth.

11565. Chairman.] When you gave your vote, were there many priests in the polling-booth?—I think I saw but one priest there, and that was the parish priest.

11566. I have received a letter in which it was stated, that in the polling-booth there were five or six priests during the whole day; do you believe that to be the fact?—I was only in the polling-booth for between five and seven minutes, and I saw but one priest there during that time, and that was the priest of the parish in which the polling-booth was.

11567. Mr. Hunt.] Supposing it is the fact that the carriage in which you went to the poll, went about to the different polling-places, Mr. Spaight's evidence would be literally true, would it not, with this exception, that it was not your carriage, but the carriage in which you went to the poll, that went about to the different polling places?—No, I do not think that Mr. Spaight's evidence is at all susceptible of that explanation.

11568. Mr. Spaight said that your carriage was moving about the streets, but it appears that he was mistaken in saying that it was your carriage, but at all events you were in Mr. Russell's carriage, and if that same carriage was going about to the different polling places, that would explain Mr. Spaight's evidence, would it not?—But Mr. Spaight did not know that I went in Mr. Russell's carriage at all; as I said just now, I do not think that 20 people saw me come to the poll in Mr. Russell's carriage.

11569. You are not aware what happened with regard to the carriage, but you do not deny that the carriage in which you went to the poll moved about to the different polling places?—I do not deny it, nor do I admit it; I do not know where the carriage went; I never saw the carriage since.

11570. Have you read the whole of Mr. Spaight's evidence?—I think I read the whole of it; at least I read the substance of it.

11571. I wish to call your attention to this part of it in Question 6886, and the following questions, where he says, "Unfortunately the priests have been proved to have been active, not only in the organisation of mobs, but in the distribution of whisky. Q. Have you any evidence to show that?—A. I have evidence to show that, if it is necessary. There is one thing which I would beg to say to the Chairman, that I have no desire or wish to bring forward the name of any individual priest; it is the system I object to, and, with the permission of the Committee, I would rather not bring forward the name of any particular priest. Q. But you have in your possession orders for drink, signed by Roman Catholic priests, to be distributed to the electors at the election?—A. I have; and I believe that it would be in accordance with the wishes of the respectable Roman Catholics themselves, if the priests were prevented from holding the position that they generally do in elections. These are the kind of documents that are going (producing some documents), and if the Chairman will allow me to read them without the names I would prefer it. The date of the year is not in this document; it is July 13th; it applies to the year 1865; and the circumstances to which this refers are these: 'St. Munchin's, Thursday, p.m. I, on behalf of Messrs. Gavin and Russell, authorise Mr. ——, of Thomondgate, to give drink to the amount of 5 l.' That is signed with the name, and afterwards 'C. C.,' which means Catholic curate. Q. Have you another of the same kind?—A. Yes, I have another in the same handwriting: 'Give So-and-so an order for 5 l.'; and then follows the name of the same clergyman. Then there is a memorandum from the person who supplied this drink, giving the particulars of orders to the amount of 15 l. for St. Munchin's parish, Thomondgate, Limerick. Q. Was it drink that was supplied or refreshment?—A. It merely says, 'Election week; first order, 5 l.; second order, 5 l.; third order, 5 l.'" Did it come to your knowledge in the year 1865 that the priests at Limerick gave orders for drink on behalf of the candidates?—No, I never heard of that circumstance till I saw it in that document from which you are reading.

11572. Would the Roman Catholic curates, who signed those orders, be persons under your spiritual authority?—Certainly; every Catholic curate in the diocese is under my authority.

11573. Have you since you have been made acquainted with this evidence, made any inquiry as to those facts?—No, I have not been much in Limerick for the last three weeks.

11574. Should you think it your duty, on your return, to do so?—Very likely I should. I might inquire whether such a thing was done in the year 1865, and ask under what circumstances it was done.

11575. Should you think it your duty, as the ecclesiastical superior of those persons, to administer any rebuke to them for the part which they took in those transactions?—Yes, I should probably think it my duty to say to that clergyman that he ought not to have done it, that it was an imprudent thing.

11578. You used the word imprudent with regard to the risk of drunkenness amongst the voters?—With regard to the risk of something bad occurring on account of drink being given, I think that a priest should have as little as possible to do with it.

11579. You see nothing to reprehend in a priest mixing himself up in an election, so far as to give drink tickets on behalf of a candidate?—I see nothing improper in ordering refreshments by ticket, or otherwise, for those who need them, whether they are rich or poor, provided it is done under proper precaution and restraint.

11580. Or a priest putting himself into the position of being an agent for a candidate for the purpose of supplying drink to the electors?—They never put themselves into the position of agents in that way; the people come to them, as I said before, and they recommend the agents to give refreshments.

11581. I must

11581. I must call your attention to some of the orders for drink: "I, on behalf of Messrs. Gavin and Russell, authorise Mr. [ ] to give drink to the amount of 5 l.;" do you consider that the person giving that order is not acting as agent for the candidate?—I think that it looks very like it, but I do not think that the clergyman concerned had any agency, or any special authority whatever to give such an order. By giving the order he made himself responsible to the party who supplied the drink, and liable to be called on for payment of the bill, if it were not met by the candidate or his agents.

11582. But you would not say at once that it must be a wrong thing for a priest to do; you would say that it depends upon circumstances?—I think there may be circumstances in which I should look upon it as an act that was very permissible on the part of the priest; but I say that in general, writing orders of that sort is a thing to be condemned as imprudent and silly on the part of a priest. Indeed I never heard of any priest writing such orders, until I read Mr. Spaight's evidence.

11583. You say that supposing the system of secret voting were introduced, the priest at confession would have no chance of learning how the voter had voted unless the voter made a confession of that act of voting as a sin?—Certainly.

11584. And that if the voter at the confessional made a confession about his vote, it must be because the voter believed that he had offended God?—Certainly.

11585. Do the priests of your religion in Ireland point out to voters that they will offend God if they vote for one candidate rather than another?—I am not aware that priests have done that; I am not aware that there was ever in my time an issue put before the people, where the priest could say that, independently of all the circumstances, a voter would offend God by voting for one candidate rather than another.

11586. Is it the case, that priests have denounced from the altar particular candidates previous to an election?—I am not aware of that. I know that in the diocese over which I preside, there is a very strict law, forbidding a priest to denounce anyone whatever by name.

11587. Independently of your own diocese, are you aware that priests have, from the altar, denounced particular candidates previous to an election?—I am not aware of it of my own knowledge; I have seen it in the papers from time to time, as other people have, but I am not aware of it, and there never was a complaint brought before me of any candidate being denounced from the altar in my diocese.

11588. Sir George Grey.] What do you mean by denouncing?—I take denouncing to be speaking contumeliously or injuriously of a person from the altar or the pulpit. I do not know, however, whether this is the meaning attached to it by the Right Honourable Member who has asked me the question.

11589. Mr. Hunt.] Is not the term denouncing from the altar, a term very well understood in Ireland?—Yes; it is a term that is used very much, but I think different people attach different meanings to it; something like ultra-montanism, which is a word very much used, and a word to which almost every second man attaches a different meaning, and for which many who use it have no definite meaning at all.

11590. Would devout Roman Catholics in Ireland attend more to what came from a priest at the altar than they would to his words not at the altar?—Yes.

11592. If a priest from the altar indicated the way in which his congregation should vote, would that be intimating to them, by reason of his taking that step at the altar, that they would be offending God if they voted contrary to the way that he indicated?—Not exactly so; it would not indicate or decide anything with respect to individual cases; because in individual cases a great many excusing reasons and causes would come in. Suppose, for example, that a priest told his congregation from the altar or the pulpit, that it was the duty of Catholics to vote against Protestant ascendency; and suppose one of the congregation afterwards voted for Protestant ascendency, it would not follow that such voter had violated his conscience or offended God, for he might have many reasons that would perfectly justify the act to his own mind. Perhaps that voting against Protestant ascendency would bring ruin on his family, and he would not feel himself bound to make so heavy a sacrifice for the public good; or he might conscientiously take a different view of the subject from that taken by the priest.

11593. In fact, the priest going to the altar to make an address to his congregation with regard to an election, would be an indication to them that the priest considered that they would be offending God if they went contrary to the priest's wishes upon the subject, would it not?—No, that is not necessarily so. The priest does not intend on these occasions to teach or decide anything as to what would or would not be a sin in the case. He merely indicates the general duty incumbent on them as Papists or Catholics, and in a case, where by the supposition, the duty is perfectly clear, and then leaves individuals to be guided by their own consciences.

11595. But the intention of the priests in speaking from the altar is to indicate to their congregations the wishes of God upon the subject, is it not?—It is to indicate to the congregation what the duties of the congregation are in the case; what they ought to do in the circumstances, but it is not, as I said before, to indicate or to decide for any individual, what would or would not offend God in his case.

11596. You mean their duties as religious persons?—Yes, their duties as Catholics; the question being, let us suppose, whether Catholics were to be trodden down for ever, or whether they were to be freed at last.

11598. But supposing a priest had told his congregation that it was their duty to God to support a particular candidate, in that case I presume the voter might think that it was a sin if he voted the other way, and come to the priest to confess?—Very possibly he might; a voter might think that he committed a sin by the way that he voted; a voter might believe that it was his duty to God to give his vote in a certain way, and very often voters do think so.

11599. Mr. Villiers.] He does not promise the priest at the time he will vote?—Not at all; the priest simply explains the issue that is put before the people on the occasion; the question he tells them is to be tried at the hustings, and he says it is the duty of every Catholic to vote in a certain way.

11600. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think it is a right practice to use the altar for such purposes?—If the question in hand were purely a political question, I should not approve of using the altar or the pulpit for its explanation; although there may be questions in which the material interests of the people are so deeply concerned that it would be well to direct them, and to urge the people to take a proper course: but generally speaking, when political questions are introduced from the altar or the pulpit, they are questions that are partly political and partly religious, affecting the religious interests of the people.

11602. But wherever there is a religious element in them, you think that course of conduct would be right?—Yes, with regard to the question of religious equality, for example, the issue put before the people at the last election.

11604. Do you think that devout Catholics have a fear of what may happen to them in the future, if they disregard the injunctions of the priest?—I think they have a very great fear of what may happen to them if they offend God.

11606. I wish to call your attention to those words which occur in Judge Keogh's judgment in the Galway election case; it is a quotation which the judge makes use of from Sir Samuel Romilly: "The case to which I refer was a suit in Chancery to set aside a settlement made voluntarily by a widow on a clergyman and his family. It was set aside as obtained by undue influence, and it was set aside on principles of public policy and utility. The words are" (and this is the quotation), "Undue influence will be used if ecclesiastics make use of their power to excite superstitious fears or pious hopes, to inspire, as the object may be best to promote despair or confidence, that is, to inspire despair or confidence in order to obtain their own object, to alarm the conscience by the horrors of eternal misery, or support the drooping spirits by unfolding prospects of eternal happiness, that good or evil which is never to end." Do you agree with the sentiment contained in that quotation?—I cannot exactly answer that question; perhaps you will have the goodness to put the question in some more succinct and definite manner.

11607. Do you consider that for the purpose of influencing a vote an ecclesiastic is justified in exciting the spiritual fears or pious hopes of a member of his congregation?—It would depend, I think, entirely upon what the case in hand was, or whether the person by his vote would really imperil his interests in the other life; if he really would do so by his vote, I do not see that the priest is hindered from explaining that to him.

11608. Do you think that there are circumstances in which a priest would be justified in threatening spiritual terrors to a voter if he did not vote in a particular way?—Certainly; suppose the question was, as I said a while ago, whether the saying of mass should be declared, as it was before declared, to be a felony in Ireland, punishable by banishment and death, and suppose a person came to the priest and said that he was going to vote, that the saying of mass should be so punishable, I consider it quite within the competence and right of the priest to tell him that if he gives that vote he will lose his soul unless he repents of it before he dies, because I take for granted that he commits a mortal sin by giving such a vote; just as a priest would say to a man that if he gets drunk, if he commits robbery, or if he commits murder, he is perilling his eternal salvation.

11609. Then you think that the priest ought to be the judge whether a man is perilling his eternal salvation in voting for a particular candidate, date, or not?—I think, as I have said over and over again, that it is only in a case where the issue at stake is so plain that nobody can have any doubt whatever about it; where it is plain that it is the man's duty, sub gravi, to vote in a certain way.

11610. But if it is so plain that no man could make a mistake, where is the necessity of priestly influence at the altar?—There is a necessity for encouraging men to keep the Ten Commandments.

11611. Do you look upon that in the same light as you would enforcing obedience to the Ten Commandments?—I look upon it in the same light in the case that I refer to; that is the case where it is plainly the duty, sub gravi peccato, of the penitent to vote in a particular way, as much as it is his duty to abstain from drunkenness or from murder, or any other crime. But cases of that sort, of course, are extremely rare, and are hardly practical cases in our times.

11612. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] I understand you to be of opinion that at the last general election that point had arisen on the question of religious ascendancy, and therefore you thought it the duty of the priest to tell the people that they would be violating their duty to God if they voted in favour of what is called Protestant ascendancy?—No, I did not say that.

11613. As I understood, you said that when the issue was so entirely clear as it was at the last election, you thought it the duty of the priest to tell the people that they would be violating their duty if they did not vote in a particular way?—Certainly violating their duty as men who held a vote in trust for the public good if they did not vote in a particular way, and it was only circumstances that could excuse a man in giving a wrong vote upon an occasion when the issue was so plain.

11614. In speaking of duty, I presume you mean their duty to God?—I mean their duty as citizens, as people that hold a vote for the public good, and not for themselves.

11615. When you speak of duty, do you mean their duty to God or to man?—I suppose that if a person does not do his duty to man, he does not do his duty to God.

11616. Do you suppose that a devout Roman Catholic, hearing from the altar that statement, that it was his duty, unless he was compelled, or otherwise, to abstain from so voting, would conceive from that priest's language that it was his duty to God to give the vote in the way the priest told him upon that subject?—I suppose that a great many people would think that, and I think that they would think it very properly, when the question at issue was, as I always suppose, perfectly clear.

11617. And assuming, therefore, that there was no extraneous influence, such as, for instance, intimidation, which you say is one element in the excuse, it is a paramount duty, the violation of which they think would expose them to the pain of eternal punishment if they did not repent of it after they had done it?—That depends entirely upon the circumstances of every individual case.

11618. But the circumstances, as I understood you in your former answer, were extraneous circumstances, some pressure or other, but not a question in the conscience of the individual?—Extraneous circumstances affect the conscience of the individual and his duty of action in the case.

11619. You have put a very strong case, the case of saying mass, and I put it to you, according to your own statement, would any Roman Catholic who voted in such a case as that for making the saying of mass a punishable offence be guilty of a mortal sin?—Yes.

11620. Would any Roman Catholic who voted on this question, as you say of Protestant ascendancy, be guilty of a mortal sin in so voting?—I think it quite possible that he might not; I can very easily imagine cases in which a Catholic giving his vote for the maintenance of Protestant ascendency might not be guilty of mortal sin.

11621. Are there no positive circumstances in the other case that you have put which would make the vote not a mortal sin?—I think there may be circumstances imagined, even in the other case which would make the vote not a mortal sin.

11622. Then you would wish to qualify your former answer, that it was absolute destruction to the soul of anybody who had done that in the former case with respect to the mass, unless he repented before his death?—Yes, I think an extreme case might be imagined, when considering on the one hand, the gravity of the evils which will fall upon the man, if he does not vote, and on the other hand the very slight influence which his single vote can have in producing the bad law, he would be justified in voting as you describe, especially if he were allowed to state that voting in that way was not an act of apostacy, a thing which could not be allowed under any circumstances.

11623. In the case of an individual taking a bribe, I presume that that would be in itself a mortal sin?—I do not know that that is so clear. I have found a great many people of the world, lawyers and others, maintaining that it was not a sin.

11624. I am not asking you as a lawyer, I am asking you as a priest and a bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, whether you would consider it a mortal sin for a person to have a bribe, and to have voted against his conviction?—That is a matter which I do not think a priest is more competent to decide than any other gentleman in society, for this reason, that it depends entirely upon the nature of the elective franchise. What is the nature of it? Is it a trust of the public good, or is it a privilege for the individual himself?

11625. You stated that if you had seen a person drunk, and he did not confess it, you would remind him of it. Supposing you knew that a person had been bribed to give his vote, and he did not confess it, should you remind him of it?—For my own part I would remind him of it, because I believe that it is a sin to take a bribe, and I know that Catholics who take bribes generally act against conscience. That is my opinion upon the matter; but my opinion is not decisive upon the subject at all. The penitent in question might take quite a different view of bribery, and he would not be bound in the least to adopt my opinion in a matter where opinions vary, and where the Church has decided nothing about it.

11626. I thought you said that from the altar, it was the duty of the priest to tell the people that to merchandise away their votes, which was a solemn trust committed to them, would be in itself such a sin as was proper to denounce from the altar?—I said that priests are in the habit of saying to people from the altar, or from the pulpit, that the elective franchise is a trust which they hold for the public good; that is the opinion, I think, generally of the priests; that is the view that they take of the elective franchise, and they are in the habit of saying to the people that it is not a merchandise to be trafficked in, to be bought and sold.

11627. And the reason that they take the altar for laying down a doctrine of that kind is, because it comes with peculiarly authoritative power, and is, in fact, Divine teaching?—Certainly, they would teach as follows: they would say that a man is responsible to God for the way he votes; that he gets his vote for the public good, and that he ought to give it for the public good, or at least, what he himself believes to be the public good; then, if a man gives his vote for what he believes to be a public evil, and does it from corrupt influences, he acts wrongly, and violates his duty.

11628. I will assume that you knew that a Roman Catholic had voted against what you consider to be his duty to God and man; there again would it be the duty of the priest at the confessional to remind him of his having done it?—Not at all, except it was quite plain that the man voted against his convictions and his conscience, because he might take a different view of the public good from what I would.

11629. Taking one of your own cases, in which you say it is absolutely plain, such as the question of the mass, if he had so voted you would call his attention to it, as a crime of which he ought to repent?—Yes, if I knew he did that, and he did not confess it, I should assume that he was forgetting it, and that he would be glad to be reminded of it, and to do penance for it.

11630. Upon a question so clear as you state that of Protestant ascendency to be, would you take the same course?—I should not at all interfere in that case. It would never come into my head to question a penitent about such a vote. If I knew that he had voted wrong, or what I considered wrong, and that he did not confess it, I should take for granted that he saw reasons to justify his vote, and that his conscience was easy about it.

11631. I am assuming that you would not have to ask him the question, but that you knew how he had voted?—A penitent is never questioned in confession about sins which he does not confess, unless the confessor has reason to believe that the penitent has committed those sins, and that he is either forgetting or concealing them in his confession.

11632. I want to know how far you consider it a mortal sin for a man to vote contrary to what the priest has told him to be his duty, and where the priest has from his altar announced that it is the positive duty for every devout Roman Catholic to vote in a particular way, because the thing is so clear, as you say, that it is quite obvious that it would be a sin for him to do otherwise in such a case as that, if he knows that the man has voted contrary to the denunciation; would the priest in confession remind him of it if he did not state it?—It is possible that he might. I do not consider that he would be violating his duty if he did remind him of it, if he asked him a question about a matter which he thought he was forgetting, and which he thought was a very plain thing, and in which he knew the penitent completely agreed with himself as to the obligation, I should think that he would not be violating his duty. But the only object that he could possibly have in asking that question would be the spiritual good of that penitent.

11633. I understand that the whole course of it is with a view to the spiritual good of the penitent; I am not disputing that; but as a matter of duty, in order to deal with the penitent as a penitent, you would, as I understand you, in such a case not consider it a wrong thing to call his attention to it?—No; I should not consider it a wrong thing in a plain case of that kind, and when the priest knew that the penitent took the same view as the priest with regard to the obligation of voting.

11634. And primâ facie, therefore, you consider it a sin that he had committed?—The confessor would believe, as I suppose, that the man himself thought that he had committed a sin, and if a man thinks that he commits sinning by an act, he is guilty of sin, whether the act is forbidden or not.

11535. And until some satisfactory explanation was given of such a step, the priest would consider that he had committed a sin?—That is assuming that the priest knew what the man's opinions were about the matter, and that the man himself thought it was a sin.

11636. Then, as I understand you, the duty of Roman Catholics, upon certain points, is so clear that it is not a question of doubt at all?—Some things are very clear; there are many duties about which Catholics have not, and cannot have, the least doubt. I do not know whether any Catholic might think that he could fairly vote for Protestant ascendency. I never met anyone that maintained such an opinion as that it was not a wrong thing for a Catholic to use the elective franchise to maintain Protestant ascendency.

11637. Or, I suppose, for anyone to vote in Parliament in the same way who is a Roman Catholic?—Certainly. I do not conceive it possible that any Roman Catholic in Parliament could vote for Protestant ascendency without violating his duty.

11638. And a thing which he ought to be reminded of at confession?—Upon the principle which I mentioned a while ago; that is, if the confessor knew that the penitent had violated his conscience, and committed sin by recording such a vote; but if the confessor did not know this, he should take for granted that the penitent had sufficient reasons to justify his vote to his own conscience, and he would not, and could not, interfere with him in the matter.

11639. Then I infer that you consider that a priest in the Roman Catholic Church has a duty devolving upon him, not merely as a citizen, but as a priest, to interfere with the conscience of the voters with respect to the mode in which they vote?—He has no right at all to interfere with people's conscience, as far as he is a citizen, nor has he any right to interfere with people's conscience, as far as he is a priest, unless he is placed over them as their pastor, or that they come to him voluntarily, and apply for his ministry, nor has he any right even then, unless in cases where there can be no doubt or controversy as to the sinfulness of the vote.

11640. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I think you stated, in one of your earlier answers, that the priests interfere very often at the Limerick elections?—Yes.

11641. Is that interference all on one side, or have you known any cases where the priests have differed?—I have known a case where the priests differed with regard to two candidates, who were both Liberals. I have known one case of that kind.

11642. Have you known any action taken by the bishops, upon any occasion, rebuking a priest for the part he had taken?—I was not a bishop at the time that I allude to now; but the bishop at that date did take action in advising the priests either to act together, or to withdraw entirely from the contest.

11643. Was not there a case during the last election at Galway where the bishop interfered with some priest for not taking a sufficiently active part in the election?—What occurred in Galway was reported in the public newspapers; it happened, I think, in this way. A priest of the town had undertaken to make an address to the people, touching the election on some very important occasion; he made an address, but never said a word about the election. The bishop considered that he had violated his engagement, and that he had done so in bad faith, and to damage the Liberal cause.

11644. What was the action taken by the bishop?—The action taken by the bishop was to make him go back again and address the people upon the subject upon which he promised to address them; I take the facts simply from the public newspapers; I do not profess to know anything more about it.

11645. Was that the Bishop of Galway?—Yes, it was the Bishop of Galway; and the case came afterwards before a public court at the trying of the petition.

11646. Before an election, is there any declaration made by the bishop generally as to the part which he wishes the priests to take, or the particular candidate which he wishes them to support?—I think not, because, generally speaking, the matter is quite plain; there is no line for the bishop and priests to take but one; either to take that line or not to take any line at all, except in such a case as I have mentioned, where two Liberals of exactly the same principles stood for the city of Limerick at one time, and then the priests were divided.

11647. Mr. Whitbread.] With regard to your former answer, supposing the last general election in Ireland had been conducted under the ballot, and it had come out in the course of confession that a voter had voted in the direction of maintaining Protestant ascendency in Ireland, could that, under any circumstances, have been made a ground for refusing absolution?—It could not at all be made a ground of refusing absolution; even supposing it to be a sin, it would be no ground for refusing absolution, but rather a ground for giving absolution.

11648. I am assuming that the voter does not express repentance of his vote, and does not promise to vote in any one direction in future?—If the voter believes that it is a sin, and confesses it as such, but he does not express sorrow for it, and a determination of not committing the sin again, he cannot be absolved, no matter what the sin is; supposing a man has committed a robbery, and he comes to confession and confesses it, and he says he is not sorry for it, but will do it over again, he cannot be absolved.

11649. But supposing the voter refuses to look upon it in the light of a sin?—Then how can it come into confession at all?

11650. Supposing it does transpire in the course of confession that the voter has voted in the direction of maintaining Protestant ascendency in Ireland, and refusing at the same time to give any pledge that he will vote in the contrary direction in the future, and refusing to regard it in the light of a sin, could that be made the ground of refusing absolution to him?—No; for there should be liberty of opinion allowed to him upon that subject; if he said that he did not consider it a sin to maintain Protestant ascendency in Ireland, and that he thought it was the right use to make of the elective franchise, it should be assumed that he had come conscientiously to that conclusion, and there would be an end of it.

11652. And he would have plainly violated his duty if, voting under a secret form of voting, where no external influence could be brought to bear upon him, he had voted in the direction of maintaining Protestant ascendency, would he not?—I should take it that he would be abusing the trust confided to him for the public good; but he might take a different view of it, and he would be, of course, perfectly entitled to his opinion.

11653. Under such circumstances absolution might be refused to him?—I should take it that he would violate his duty; that would be my opinion, but, as I said before, my opinion would not be binding upon him; he should judge for himself, and be guided by his own honest convictions.

11654. The O'Conor Don.] But supposing that he were of opinion that he was justified in giving his vote, and did not regard it as a sin, could absolution then be refused to him?—No, it could not; people may entertain different opinions with regard to the obligation of voters on the question of Protestant ascendency, or of religious equality.

11656. Supposing the question were asked, and the man said, "I voted against what is called religious equality, but I do not consider it a sin, and therefore I do not confess it," could the confessor then refuse him absolution for the sins that he did confess?—If he said, "I do not think it a sin," or if he was under the impression that there was no sin in the matter, then of course there was no sin. If a man acts wrongly through error, or through mistake, and does not know that there is any law against what he is doing, or is not aware that there is anything morally wrong in the act which he is performing, or has not the slightest idea that he is offending God in that act, I should say that that man does not commit sin, and there is no question of absolution in the case.

11657. Therefore it is possible that a man might vote against a candidate, professing religious equality principles, and not consider that he was acting wrong?—I think that quite possible.

11658. In such a case absolution would not be refused to him because he did not confess having done so?—The question supposed, I think, that he did confess it, or that it did come out in some way; but he said he did not think that he acted wrong; then there would be no question of granting him absolution at all, because he committed no morally wrong act; but you may suppose a case where the obligation is so plain and so evident, that you cannot believe that the man thought it was a good act, or that it was not morally wrong; for example, suppose that a man says that he thinks drunkenness is no sin.

11659. Mr. Bright.] If a man said that he thought that the Catholic religion in Ireland advanced more and sustained itself better in the face of an Act of Parliament Protestant Church than it would be likely to do in the face of a free Protestant Church, and that therefore he did not wish to vote for the abolition of the Established Church, should you consider that he was guilty of any offence before God in that?—No, if that were his sincere opinion; for then he would be acting according to his honest convictions, and with good and loyal intentions towards his Church.

11660. Sir Frederick Heygate.] The expression "Protestant ascendency," has been used a great deal; what do you understand by the term Protestant ascendency?—By Protestant ascendency I mean Protestants up and Catholics down. Protestantism made the religion of the State, established and endowed by the State; Protestantism made the door to all employment, civil or military, in the country, and to every position under the Crown.

11661. Does it mean anything more in your opinion than that the Protestant religion is the established and endowed religion of the State?—Protestant ascendancy means a great deal more than that; there were a great many evils connected with Protestant ascendancy. For example, it meant that a man could not be a magistrate, could not be a juror, could not be a sheriff, could not be a member of Parliament, or a member of a town council, except he was a Protestant. That was Protestant ascendancy a few years ago. These fetters have been cast off our limbs one by one; they were the fetters of Protestant ascendancy; but the whole fabric is not tumbled down yet; there is a great deal of it still standing.

11662. In fact, it introduces almost everything that is connected with the social system of Ireland?—Yes; Protestant ascendancy, I think, did go through the whole of the social system, and poisoned it all.

11663. Chairman.] You mentioned large canvassing parties going about the city of Limerick; were those parties in any cases so large that they might be called mobs?—Yes; by a mob I mean a great gathering of non-electors, who came for the purpose of accompanying the candidates and cheering them, and giving an appearance of popularity to their side of the question.

11664. Were those canvassing parties large, and somewhat disorderly assemblages?—The canvassing parties were very often not disorderly at all; but sometimes, when adverse canvassing parties met, a conflict occurred between them; that has happened from time to time.

11665. When they were so large as to be as you describe them, "mobs," they were sometimes disorderly, were they not?—Yes; I think that disorder sometimes was the result, especially when they met in the streets.

11666. Were those canvassing parties frequently accompanied by priests?—Yes.

11667. Do you think it desirable that priests should put themselves in the position of canvassers, accompanied by disorderly parties of this sort?—I think it is most undesirable for the priest himself that he should be obliged to take that action; nevertheless, I am sure that the priests believe they are conscientiously bound to do so; but I think it is not at all a disadvantage to the public that the priest should take that part. I know, whenever an election is coming on, and a contest is apprehended, the leading Liberal electors, the leading Liberal laymen, invariably invoke the assistance of the clergy; and, if the clergy are holding back, as they very often do, urge them forward and insist upon their coming out to assist them. They say, "Are you going to desert us?"

11668. You think that it does not tend to raise the character of the priest?—To the priest himself it is a most distracting and annoying, and unhappy occupation, to be engaged in electioneering contests.

11669. You would be very glad if the necessity for their acting in that manner could possibly be done away with?—I should be delighted if it could be done away with.

11670. Do you think that the adoption of a secret mode of voting might render it less necessary for the priests to interfere?—I think it would render it much less necessary for the priest to descend from his own sphere into the uncongenial arena of politics.

11671. Have you ever taken any notice of the municipal elections in the city of Limerick?—Yes.

11672. Have there been any features about them, such as have been described in connection with Parliamentary elections?—There has been only one civic election, that I recollect, at which any scenes occurred which might be compared to the scenes at Parliamentary elections.

11673. Was there the same rioting?—There was a great deal of rioting, and a good deal of mob work in the town during that election.

11674. And the same drinking?—I should think there was a great deal of drinking indeed.

11675. Was it generally understood that there was some bribery?—Yes, it was believed throughout the city that there was a great deal of bribery at that election.

11676. At what election was that?—It was the election at the time that Mr. Tait became mayor of Limerick. I think it was the year 1865.

11677. Was that supposed to have any reference to the future Parliamentary contest?—No, I should think not in the least.

11678. Did it turn upon politics at all?—Not at at all; it was rather a personal contest between him and another citizen who sought the mayoralty.

11679. From what you have seen, therefore, should you be in favour of adopting secret voting for municipal elections, as well as for Parliamentary?—I should not think it at all so necessary; for I never saw any serious evils occurring at any civic contest, except on that one occasion. I do not know however what occurs elsewhere; but I should not think it likely that it would occur again in Limerick.

11680. Have you ever taken any part in any of the county elections?—Not exactly a part, further than taking a great interest in them.

11681. Have you watched what has gone on in the county elections?—I have had a pretty good knowledge of what was going on in the County Limerick elections generally, whenever there was a contest.

11682. You said something about the influence which was attributed by the people to the use of troops, but, as I understand, you refer to the borough elections?—No, I refer to the borough and the county both.

11684. Is it generally understood that that escort is merely for the purpose of protection, or is it supposed that in any cases it is for the purpose of coercing the voters?—It is generally supposed that the troops are employed for the purpose of hindering the great body of the people from having their natural influence upon individual electors. Those electors are gathered together, and brought in under an escort upon cars, with military about them. The people are not allowed near them at all, and it is supposed generally that that action is taken in opposition to the people; the people are in the habit of looking upon the army as opposed to them, as something belonging to the Government, and they say, and feel, that the Government is against them.

11685. Supposing that people were allowed to come into closer proximity with those voters, would they be allowed to vote against the popular party?—I think if the voters were allowed to get amongst the great masses of the people, they would vote according to their own convictions, and not against their convictions, with their landlord; they are sometimes brought in over night and housed in the city, and kept there all night, and then brought out in the morning to the polling places under an escort of military or police.

11686. But supposing the possibility of its being the intention of some Catholic voters to vote with their landlord against the popular party, would the people, if it were not for the troops, allow them to give their votes in that way?—Yes, I think they would; I should think they would often vote with their landlords, and against the people, without any assistance of the troops; but there would be the danger, of course, that the voters would go with the crowd, and vote according to their own convictions, if they were not kept in batches apart from the people, and polled under military escort.

11687. But would there not be a danger of such voters being violently prevented from reaching the poll?—There might be such a danger in cases of great political excitement, when the passions of the people are very much stirred; I think it is quite possible that individual voters, if they were known to be going to vote against their own convictions, and against their neighbours, might be molested, and probably jostled about, and hindered from voting.

11688. Do you think that, under the present system of open voting at elections, it is possible to dispense in Ireland with the use of the military?—I could not answer that question.

11689. Would you not apprehend very serious breaches of the peace, if the troops were not present at elections in Ireland?—I think that if the landlords persisted in forcing their tenants to vote against what everybody knows to be the tenants' own convictions and interests, probably casualties might occur if there was not a public force at hand to keep the peace and hinder violence.

11691. Mr. Bright.] Have you ever seen that?—I have experienced it myself more than once, not since I have been bishop; but before I was bishop persons came to me again and again, complaining in the most bitter manner, of the restraint the laws put upon them, and in fact offering to vote against their landlord even at the risk of being turned out of their places, and I, myself, often counselled persons to vote with the landlord against their convictions in order that their families might not be injured; I said, "You are not bound to vote with us, under these circumstances, and we can do without you."

11693. I may tell you that that was done, and therefore do you not think that a Roman Catholic voter might conscientiously vote with his landlord although against the majority of his fellow religionists?—I do not see how he could properly do that, if he looks upon the elective franchise as a trust, which he has for the public good; I do not think it tends to the public good, to have him vote according to his landlord's opinions, and against his own convictions.

11694. Do you not think that if a Roman Catholic priest in England could be found to vote for the Conservative candidate against the Liberal candidate, it was not also possible that in Ireland, a Roman Catholic voter might conscientiously vote with his landlord, and against the priest and the popular party?—I think that at the last election a Catholic might, under certain circumstances, have voted with his landlord, and against the popular party in Ireland; and I have said just now, in reply to Mr. Bright, that I myself sometimes counselled people to vote against their own convictions with the landlord, for the purpose of avoiding the penalties that would ensue, and in cases where we could do without them.

11695. But you think that it is impossible, that if he was not biassed in some way or other, he could conscientiously vote against the popular party?—If you speak of England, I will not answer for the conscience of the people of England; but in Ireland, I do not see how a Catholic who had no pressure of any kind put upon him could think of voting for the Tory party, when the question in hand was whether Protestant ascendancy or religious equality should be the law of Ireland; I do not see how he could possibly think of voting for the Conservative candidate in such a case.

11697. But without denouncing him from the altar, are not meetings held outside the chapels, after mass, very frequently?—Sometimes meetings are held outside the churches; it is customary, if a Sunday intervenes between the nomination day and the polling day, for the candidates to go to the Catholic churches in the liberties of Limerick, and they get an opportunity of meeting the country electors after mass; they assemble in the churchyard, and the candidates and the priest address the people.

11698. Would it be wrong for the priest on such an occasion as that to say, So-and-so and So-and-so are going to vote against their party, and to hold them up to the indignation of the people?—It would not be right at all for the priest to do that, and the priest would not do it, I think.

11699. Do you feel sure that that never is done?—I do not know any instances where the priest brought forward the name of a particular person beforehand in that way, and said, "This man is going to vote against his conscience and against the Catholic cause." I am not aware of any case where that has occurred.

11700. But, without naming any name, would it be wrong for the priest to say on such an occasion as that, that those Roman Catholics who were going to vote against their party were going to disgrace themselves, and otherwise hold them up to public indignation?—I should think that that is a thing which might have often been said; that any Roman Catholics who would vote against their party and against their convictions, in so important a question as this, were belying their convictions, and betraying the public cause.

11701. You contradict the statement that you had taken a very active part in the last election at Limerick?—I stated exactly what occurred.

11702. Did you take a more active part in any former election than you did at the last election?—I took a more active part in elections in Limerick before I was bishop.

11703. Mr. Villiers.] Do you consider that vote by ballot would dispense with the necessity of the employment of troops?—I think it would altogether.

11704. Mr. Hunt.] Would you like to see an extension of the number of polling places in Ireland?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with that question, so far as it affects other places outside Limerick, but as far as Limerick is concerned, I think there was always an abundance of polling places.

11705. With regard to those voters who live in what you call the liberties of Limerick, do you think it desirable that they should have an opportunity of voting without coming into the city?—No, I do not think it would be at all necessary.

11706. That would avoid collision, would it not, with voters to whom they were opposed in politics?—They do not live far from the city; they are just in the environs.

11707. How many miles have they to come?—I should suppose two or three miles.

11708. Supposing they could vote nearer their own homes, do not you think that would be an improvement?—I do not know; it is so near the city, that I think if there were polling places set up, the very same influences which now are brought to bear upon them in the city, would be brought to bear upon them at the polling places in the liberties.

11710. Mr. William Henry Smith.] In your evidence you stated that the difficulty of the priest was to get the voters to act at all, and you went on to say that the clergy often found it difficult to make the people even sign a petition, and subsequently you said that if the ballot were established the priest would be able to withdraw from politics; how is it that the ballot would induce people to discharge their duty as voters, and exercise the trust which you speak of, so as to enable the priests to withdraw from political contests?—When I said that the establishment of the ballot would enable the priests to withdraw from politics, what I meant was that it would enable them to withdraw from those scenes of turmoil and excitement in which they are now obliged to mix; but I should not think that it would exonerate them from advising the people as to how they should use the elective franchise by ballot, if the ballot were conceded.

11711. Nor from the necessity of getting them to act at all?—No; the priests would be still obliged to urge upon the people the duty of exercising the franchise, for the doctrine had been extensively propagated that it was utterly useless to send Members to the British Parliament, and that looking to England for any radical cure of the evils of the country was looking in the wrong direction. That doctrine had been freely preached, and had entered very much into the minds of the people, and it is only quite recently, since Mr. Gladstone's Church Bill was introduced, and passed by such large majorities through the House of Commons, that the people have begun to look with any hope to the Imperial Parliament. In their present temper of mind, produced by the remedial legislation that is in progress, it would not be as difficult as before, or at all difficult, for the priests to induce the people to exercise the franchise, and to take a lively interest in Parliamentary elections.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Right Honourable the Lord STRATHNAIRN, attending by permission of the House of Peers; Examined.

Rt. Hon. Lord Strathnairn.

9 July 1869.

11712. Chairman.] YOUR Lordship is Commander of the Forces in Ireland, I believe?—Yes.

11713. You were in Ireland, were you not, at the time of the last general election?—Yes.

11715. Was the distribution of the force in Ireland altered on account of the elections which were taking place?—Yes, entirely over the whole country. Whenever there was a contested election anticipated or actually taking place, the troops were sent according to the requisitions of the Government.

11716. The requisitions proceeded from the Government?—In all cases; it is laid down in the instructions that the Government require, and the officer in command makes the military dispositions consequent as to number and position, and so forth.

11717. What instructions were those?—Those are the only instructions we had (handing a document to the Chairman). They have been recently amplified and altered.

11718. Those are general orders for the guidance of troops in affording aid to the civil power in Ireland; under whose authority are those published?—This is under the authority of the government of Ireland and the Commander of the Forces; it is a common accord and agreement between them.

11719. I see it is published by order of General the Right Honourable Lord Strathnairn?—Yes, that is the order to the troops, but it is approved by the Government, and the Government have copies of this.

11720. The troops, I believe, are frequently used for the purpose of escorting voters, are they not, to the poll?—Yes, whenever a riot or an attack upon them is anticipated.

11721. Is any special provision made for that service in these orders?—It says whenever they are called upon to aid the civil power.

11722. In this order it is directed that the officers are to escort and protect voters at Parliamentary and other elections, and to aid the civil power with respect thereto; that is so, is it not?—Yes.

11723. But no more detailed instructions are given to officers in the execution of that duty than what appears here?—None whatever, except in the cases that I have mentioned, of attack.

11724. Has your attention been called to the evidence which was given by General McMurdo?—Yes, it has; and I am sorry to say that I am obliged to contradict his evidence by his own written report.

11725. What part of it do you refer to?—I allude particularly to that part of his evidence where he states that the troops were not required at Balbriggan, and in another place he comments upon the quantity of troops employed upon that occasion, and the bad effects of their being so employed; whereas his report to me, dated the 22nd of November 1868, entirely approves of that arrangement (producing the same).

11726. At Question 7545, General McMurdo is asked, "You stated that several cases have come within your knowledge where an inordinate number of troops appear to have been employed, and where there appeared afterwards to have been no necessity;" to which he replied, "Yes, at Balbriggan, which was one point where I placed myself in the county of Dublin election; at one time I estimated that the force of armed constabulary and military exceeded that of the mob at the polling place. Q. In that instance, were those troops sent down at the application of the magistrate?—A. It was upon the order of Government, and I have no doubt that that order was induced by the application either of a magistrate or of one of the candidates, but that I do not know; I only got the order from the Government through Lord Strathnairn." Is this

Rt. Hon. Lord Strathnairn.

9 July 1869.

General McMurdo's report?—Yes, this is his report; he was asked specially about Balbriggan, and the advantage of the number of troops employed upon that occasion; and he says, "Aid to the civil power.—Dublin county election, 21st November 1868.—Military Secretary.—In accordance with his Lordship's instructions, I proceeded to Balbriggan by the first train yesterday morning, having sent orders, by telegraph the previous evening, for a company of infantry (on cars), and half a troop of dragoons, to proceed before daylight, or at such hour as the magistrate might appoint to Garristown (eight miles), to escort voters. At 9.30 I moved with a small detachment of cavalry (and accompanied by a constable) along the road towards Naule to reconnoitre the country, and to create a diversion in case any opposition to the progress of the convoy was contemplated; but I met the expedition moving quietly, and without interruption of any kind. The arrangements for bringing the voters from the special train to the polling place were equally fortunate; these being set down at a crossing short of the station, and unobserved. Lieutenant Colonel Clayton commanding the post made these arrangements with the magistrate with my approval; and I attribute the entire absence of even a disposition to rioting on the part of the people to the judicious concentration in this part of the country of an overwhelming force, both civil and military. The value of this principle in dealing with civil commotions may be estimated from the fact, that though the occurrences at Drogheda on the previous day (and only a few miles distant) were calculated to increase the excitement of the people; and even to tempt a truculent mob to visit Balbriggan, yet the number of the people did not at any time exceed the police force on duty in the town. This was so remarkable as, at one time to rouse my suspicion of some mischief being organised outside the town; and I caused the country in the neighbourhood to be reconnoitred by my staff in several directions, before being satisfied that the calm was real. I have called for reports from the officers who commanded the posts at Kilmainham and Kingstown; but as these are not yet received, and I am about to proceed to Tipperary, the officers will be instructed to send them to you direct.—McMurdo, Major General.—Dublin, 22nd November 1868."

11727. I will call your attention first to Question No. 7510, where General McMurdo states that the troops "are made to take a very active share in the proceedings of an election, and so must vitiate the principle of the freedom of election; I allude to the service of escorting voters, principally rural tenant voters, great distances under military escorts. It is very well understood by the officers of the army that the majority of those voters go under the escort very much against their own inclination, in order to vote according to the wishes of the landlords;" do you agree with that?—No, not at all, not if you mean that officers conceive that they are to coerce voters to the poll, although, of course, they frequently know the sentiments of the candidates; I do not know an instance of an officer having reported that; and his direct orders do not bear out that conclusion at all. They are simply to escort the voters, as they are to escort rioters, or judges; in short, any person required by the civil authority to be escorted; and there is no order whatever given to them which bears that interpretation. I have called for a return from Colonel Armstrong, the deputy adjutant general, acting also as the military secretary, to make a dilligent search, both in his office and the military secretary's office, to see if there has been ever any report addressed to either of those officers, of the instance cited by Major General McMurdo, where an officer or soldier had in any way coerced voters to remain under their care; and here is his answer; it is straightforward: "Royal Hospital, Dublin, 7th July 1869. (Confidential.) My Lord, I have the honour to state, for your Lordship's information, that there are no orders in existence from the Commander of the Forces in Ireland to officers employed in aid of the civil power at elections, to consider voters whom they may be engaged in protecting in the light of prisoners; and that no instructions conveying such a meaning have been issued. After diligent and frequent search amongst the records in both the offices of the adjutant general and of the military secretary, I cannot discover any report made by an officer so employed, that he has treated voters as prisoners, or prevented them from quitting the convoy when they desired to do so.—I have the honour to be, my Lord, your Lordship's obedient humble servant, J. W. Armstrong, Deputy Adjutant General." He speaks in the name of two departments, the adjutant general and the military secretary. There are three departments, and this, which I will now read, is the third from the quartermaster general: "I never heard anything as to either officers or men having prevented voters from getting off the cars (of which the troops had charge) in order to avoid voting. This is the first time I ever heard the subject mentioned." This is dated the 22nd June 1869, and is signed by Colonel Mayo, Deputy Quartermaster General to the Army in Ireland. I can only say, with regard to this subject, that if any officer had presumed to coerce voters to stay upon the cars, I should have considered him totally deficient in the judgment which is necessary for an officer in the command of a detachment, and should have reprimanded him very severely, and never have employed him again to command a detachment.

11728. Have you ever acted in Ireland in any other capacity than Commander in chief?—Under Lord Anglesea's Viceroyalty; on account of the distracted state of Tipperary, and the strength of the illegal confederacies there, all the elements of law and justice were paralysed, and officers were frequently entrusted with the commission of the peace; and it so happened, that whilst I commanded the detachment in Tipperary I held a commission of the peace for the same county; and more recently I have, as an Irish privy councillor, commanded the forces during the Fenian period.

11729. The object of my question was whether you had acted in a military capacity in Ireland before you were appointed commander of the forces there?—Yes, as a subaltern, as a captain, and as a field officer.

11730. And as such have you been present with troops at Irish elections?—Yes; once I was at Kilkenny under Lord Anglesea's Viceroyalty; that was, I think, when Lord Duncannon contested the county with Mr. O'Connell.

11731. Have you ever been employed personally in escorting voters?—Yes; I never dreamt of such an idea as coercing them at all.

11732. But still may it not be the fact, as stated by General McMurdo, that the majority of those voters voters may go under escort very much against their own inclination, in order to vote according to the wishes of their landlords?—It is perfectly possible, and it very often happens, I have no doubt.

11733. Are you able to express any opinion whether that is the case or not?—The reasonable conclusion is that they very often do. They are very much under the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy; but then again there is a subdivision of that, because a great many of those men do not coincide with their clergy in many points. Some are not at all of opinion that they ought to bear the burden of paying their clergy, and would be very glad to be free from it; and, especially at the last election, that entered very much into the question. Therefore it is impossible to judge altogether; but you may take it as a fair presumption that when they vote on such Roman Catholic matters they do not adopt the views of their Protestant landlords.

11734. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Will you tell us what is the machinery employed in getting those voters up; whether they are brought forward by the agents of the candidate, or in what way they are brought to the escorts?—The agent generally canvasses, or the landlord himself, or the friends of the landlord, very much as they do in England.

11735. Then is there a written requisition made out and sent to some resident magistrate?—Those parties represent to the Government, if it is so, that they think there will be a breach of the peace, and then the Government directs a similar requisition to the officer to furnish troops in aid of the civil power.

11736. Then the requisition in the first instance comes to you, not from the voter, but from some one individual speaking on behalf of him?—It comes from Government or from the representative of the Government in the counties.

11737. In the shape of a resident magistrate?—Yes, exactly.

11738. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know what puts the Government in motion in that case?—The representations that they receive from the police authorities principally, from the constabulary officers, and from the magistrates and the resident magistrates, and they also receive any letters from any landlord or any other quarter, and they act upon them as they think it is entitled to attention.

11739. Mr. Edward Egerton] Have you known any cases where an officer has declined to form an escort?—I never heard of an officer declining to do it; he cannot do it. It is a responsibility which no officer could take upon himself.

11740. He has no discretion in the matter?—No discretion whatever; it is given with the utmost impartiality. Lord Kimberley used to give it to parties who must have been considered opposed to himself; the Duke of Abercorn and Lord Spencer the same; the question of which side it is never enters into the calculation; they come into the office perhaps 20 in a day when a contested election is going on; you hardly know who the parties are in many cases.

11741. Mr. Hunt.] The orders to the troops have not varied with the change of Government?—Never in the slightest degree. I have been under three different Governments, and the impartiality is perfect in that respect; there is no question of it.

11743. Do you consider them judicious instructions?—I thought them too voluminous, and that they rather embarrassed the troops in consequence of their length. I have altered very little the instructions, which he had not received when he issued his, and to which I referred him, and I cancelled his instructions, and begged him to act upon mine; they were in some sense cautions against strategical obstacles by the Fenian leaders.

11744. Did you issue any instructions that escorts were not to be granted in any case, except they were accompanied by cavalry?—I gave that order when cavalry could be had.

11745. I think we were told on Tuesday that an escort was refused in one or two cases, because it could not be accompanied by cavalry?—I do not know of any special case; as well as I remember, my instructions were that whenever cavalry could be had, cavalry should be always sent. Now, and since Sir Edward Blakeney's time, infantry are never to be employed without cavalry, if they are available; and the shameful occurrences at Drogheda showed how wise that instruction was. The mob struck with bludgeons the horses' heads there, and forced them back upon the infantry, threw the infantry into confusion, which was the signal for a general attack by the rioters, who had posted themselves on both sides of the bridge, they threw volleys of missiles, broken quart bottles, and large stones at the troops; the officer was struck down senseless, and the rioters were almost amongst the troops, and I believe if the shot had not been fired which was fired, they would have closed upon the infantry who had been thrown into confusion by the falling back of the cavalry, on account of the attack upon the horses' heads with bludgeons; this was a critical moment, either the troops would have used their arms indiscriminately, the quick-loading Snider, when there would have been a frightful massacre of the people; or the people would have overpowered the military, and then the fate of the military would have, no doubt, been that they would have been thrown into the River Boyne. That is all stated in Judge Keogh's charge; he described it even in stronger terms than I do, and he said that it was a scene of the utmost peril. Five officers, and 29 men of the troops, besides numbers of voters, and several horses, were hurt or wounded.

11746. You differ from General McMurdo, in his opinion that it would be useful to arm the troops with sticks?—Yes; here is a letter which I wrote to him on the subject:—"The Commander of the Forces Office, Royal Hospital, Dublin, 2nd December 1868.—Sir, I am directed by Lord Strathnairn, to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 25th ultimo, enclosing copy of orders issued by you to the officers commanding posts at the recent election in Tipperary, and to inform you that as orders for the guidance of officers on such occasions had already been issued by his Lordship, he begs that you will be good enough to recall your circular of the 23rd November last. With respect to paragraph 10 of that circular, and with regard to the future, I am to acquaint you that his Lordship does not consider the use by the cavalry of sticks to be desirable; as, independent of other objections, it would be considered a sort of provocation to a conflict, which would not be the case with the regular arms appointed for the troops.—I have, &c. L. Smyth, Colonel, Military Secretary.—To Major General McMurdo, Royal Barracks."

11747. Do you know whether, in some instances, escorts for the protection of voters were granted, and the voters conducted to the polling-place some days before the election?—Yes, that happened, I believe, at Sligo, and that is alluded to in a report which I have drawn up for the Government. It was a verbal communication from Colonel Wilson Patten to me. The O'Conor Don made a complaint of that nature, that they had been carried off, and the defence set up on the other side was, that if they had not taken them off, the other party would have done so.

11748. Is that a report which you have made to the Government?—A report which I have written for the Government, but (from various causes, the Drogheda election riots, the elections generally in Ireland, the coroner's inquest, and the examination by Judge Keogh) I thought it more prudent to defer it until those examinations had taken place; afterwards I was away, and it has never been sent in; but I told Lord Spencer that I intended to send it in. That very circumstance is alluded to in my report, where I say that, generally speaking, during the late election in Queen's County, and throughout Ireland generally, the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy, and the violence of the masses, was so great, that the proprietors withdrew in many cases from contesting at all. That happened in Mayo, King's County, and Queen's County, and other places, and I have had very remarkable letters upon the subject from people asking for aid; and they showed that the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy on that occasion, backed up by the masses, was quite overwhelming, and put out of the question all chance of success on the part of the other side, who gave up the elections in those three cases, and in others also.

11749. Is that a confidential report?—Yes, the nature of it makes it confidential.

11750. Could you read the passage which refers to the Sligo election?—"If landlords use their influence to coerce the right of franchise of their tenantry, they are highly culpable; but in this last general election, in several instances, the landlords would not enter on, or, if they did commence abandoned contests which, besides entailing on them all the evils of intimidation, left them and their supporters no chance of success against the commanding influences which have been mentioned. Lord Strathnairn only heard of one complaint of illegal interference of landlords with voters, which was that in Sligo. Voters had been carried off and kept in a state of quasi imprisonment, to vote for the Conservative candidate. The defence set up to this accusation was, that if this had not been done, the rival candidates would have abducted them." This report refers to the elections in general. It is a report on the Drogheda election, and then it goes on to notice generally the leading features of the late elections.

11751. Do I understand you to say that that has never been sent in to the Government?—No, it has not been sent in, but it will be sent in.

11752. Would there be any objection, on your part, as representing the military authorities, if the Irish Government saw no objection, to laying that report entirely before the Committee?—No, none whatever; I have not the slightest objection. I only headed it confidential, because I thought it was more according to rule, but it is the property of the Government; I cannot give it up without their sanction.

11754. What is the duty of an officer in command of an escort, on arriving at the place where he is expected to act, with regard to reporting himself?—He ought to be accompanied by a magistrate; but in cases of emergency the Government dispense with that, and allow the presence of a sub-constable; generally two, if it is possible; he reports himself to the magistrate, and acts entirely under his orders; he cannot fire without his orders. It has been always understood that, as regards military arrangements, that is the duty of the officer; but in anything regarding the use of the military towards the people he can do nothing like coercion without the authority of the magistrate.

11755. You would say that it is the practice for a magistrate to accompany the troops?—It is the order that he should do so, or a civil officer of some sort.

11757. Would it be at the option of the officer as to what magistrate he would apply to?—On that point there is an unlucky shortcoming. The position between the resident magistrate and the local magistrates is not very clearly defined, and I begged the Government very much to have it settled and defined, but they found too many difficulties in the way. It is left to the discretion of the officer where there are stipendiary, or resident magistrates, as they are called, and local magistrates; that is, country gentlemen magistrates, as to whom he is to obey; and, of course, that might place an officer in great difficulty. It is not defined; but the stipendiary magistrate, generally speaking, is considered the senior, and the more responsible authority.

11758. My question pointed to this, to which magistrate ought the officer to apply on arriving, with his escort, with the troops under his command, in a district?—He applies to the senior magistrate on the spot. Sometimes there are three resident magistrates, and one of those magistrates is the senior, he takes charge of the civil and military force, and the two or three or four other magistrates must obey his directions. But so far from there being any partiality, I have had letters from leading landlords of the opposite interest, asking me for assistance. In Drogheda and the north of Ireland the military are often called out to protect the Roman Catholics from the Orange men.

11760. Is it your opinion that in some districts of Ireland it would be impossible for an election to be conducted with freedom without the presence of the military?—Perfectly impossible; and I think that General McMurdo admits that equally; because, when he was asked what he would propose to substitute for the troops, he said, the ballot, and an increase of the polling places. Therefore, it is evident that he conceived that if troops were not employed, there must be some substitute for them, in order to ensure the safety of the voters.

11761. Have you been present as an officer commanding an escort, when there has been any considerable mob violence at an election?—Yes; I have been knocked down senseless, and my sword broken on one occasion; and at another time I was very sharply hit with stones; and, certainly, the feeling generally of officers is that they would rather have recourse to anything than kill a countryman.

11762. When there has been a violent mob at any election at which you have been present, have the ministers of religion endeavoured to quiet the mob and restrain them from acts of violence?—In the case I mentioned, the priest behaved remarkably well; it was many years ago, when I was a subaltern. I had only eight men, and about 3,000 or 4,000 men set on a gauger, a very ill-conducted man; but I was obliged to protect him. He excited the people very improperly, and there the priest behaved remarkably well; he had a hunting whip, and he knocked them down in every direction.

11763. Chairman.] Was this at an election?—No; it was a still-hunting party, who got drunk at the fair, and could not control themselves; and they got upon the tops of the houses when driven from the streets, and threw down stones. In that case two men stood over me when down, and fired, and then, as usually happens, which proves the moral effect of arms and their advantage over sticks, they instantly dispersed.

11764. Mr. Hunt.] Is it the practice of the priests to endeavour to discourage the mobs from committing acts of violence?—I am sorry to say that at the late election it was exactly the contrary. I presume you have read Judge Keogh's charge where he refers to three clergymen, who did not deny the evidence against them taken by a shorthand writer, to the effect that the riot was chiefly owing to the violent harangues that they held, in which they encouraged and called upon the people to go to the railway station and attack the voters; and, in fact, to throw them into the river. That is in evidence, and nothing can be severer or more illustrative of the state of Ireland than that charge of Judge Keogh's from begining to end. That was the Drogheda election.

11765. I suppose that was an unusual case, was it not?—No, not all; it was the same throughout Ireland. I have a letter here from a landlord, holding a very important position, and of very Liberal opinions, in which he says, for instance, speaking of the last election, "Mr. So-and-so" (that is a Roman Catholic clergyman), speaking in a district of mine, and alluding, of course, to me, said, "We must have a bloody deed here to set things right; we must imitate Tipperary." That was the Ballyhooly affair.

11766. The O'Conor Don.] Could you mention upon what authority that statement was made by the landlord; did he hear it himself?—He heard it from a policeman who was in the chapel.

11767. And did he make any inquiry as to how far that policeman's evidence was reliable or borne out by others?—He said that he had perfect confidence in the man.

11768. This is merely a statement made by a policeman without any investigation as to its accuracy?—Without anything else; that is as I understand it; but it was perfectly believed by this person. If this policeman's name were to appear he would be assassinated immediately by a confederacy in some way. There are so many assassinations in different counties of Ireland.

11769. Mr. Hunt.] Was it stated that those expressions were used at a place of worship?—In the chapel; because the policeman was there on Sunday.

11770. The O'Conor Don.] I understand that there was no further investigation, but the policeman's word was immediately accepted as an accurate description of what took place?—I wrote to my correspondent, and said that it would be very desirable if this could be brought forward; but he said that he could not do so, which I could perfectly well understand, because I know from experience that anybody who gives evidence against the popular feeling is almost certain either to have some outrage committed on him, or to be assassinated. I was obliged to send away a soldier of the Royal Artillery who simply gave evidence against a Fenian who was convicted. This illustrates the state of things in Ireland; I could multiply this instance. I inspected a battery; I asked if they had any complaint; this man stepped out and said that he had no complaint, but he wished very much to leave Kilkenny, as he had given evidence against a shopkeeper there who was to be brought to trial, and the soldier felt that his life was not safe. From my experience of Ireland, I considered it a just representation, and I took the man up with me to Dublin, and transferred him to a battery there; but the man came again, and represented to his officer that his life was not safe, as he had heard from his friends that he would be attacked there. I therefore recommended the Duke of Cambridge to transfer the man to a battery in England. His Royal Highness had been in Ireland, and he knew that it was a necessity. An illustration of how rightly the man had complained, and how rightly his transfer had been allowed, occurred very soon afterwards. Two gunners of this same battery were going home to barracks at Kilkenny, a mob, headed by a soldier on furlough, of the 17th Regiment, of the name of Manning, crying out "Down with the Traitors!" "Hurrah for the Fenians!" and so forth, attacked those two gunners, whose crime was merely to have belonged to the same battery as this man; they set upon them in the most brutal way, beat one man senseless, when they thought they had killed him, they erected a stone upon him as a sort of cairn, or a mark of victory; the other man lay for some time for dead, but at length contrived to crawl to the barracks and gave information. The police were very active, and this man Manning and three others were detected, brought to trial, and sentenced to penal servitude. So that there could not be a more complete case.

Rt. Hon. Lord Strathnairn.

11771. Mr. Villiers.] Do we understand you that this mob was led by a soldier?—Yes, by a soldier on furlough, of the name of Manning, his sister is a servant maid to the resident magistrate there; this man took his belt off, said, "Down with the Queen," and laid about him with his double belt, which is a dangerous instrument.

11772. Do you give that as an illustration of the state of the army, or of the state of the country?—No, I give it as an illustration of the mob intimidation in Ireland. Another soldier, who had given evidence, was set upon on the quays of Dublin, coming out of a public-house, and five shots of a revolver were fired at him, two of which took effect and wounded him very dangerously, he was taken to hospital. And then comes another curious case; soon afterwards a bricklayer, who was working there, said to the man, "Why do not you walk out in the Phœnix Park, it is very fine weather and the fresh air will do you good?" It appeared afterwards that the intention of this man was to allure the soldier to the Park, and there have him murdered.

11773. That is not the result of any inquiry, is it?—It is the result of inquiry; I go very much into these things. The man reported this case, and I had it inquired into, and I have no doubt that it was true; all the other parts of the story was perfectly true about his being fired at and wounded in consequence of his having given information. The soldier was fired at in the streets of Dublin, and not a man would assist in arresting the person who fired at him.

11774. The O'Conor Don.] All those instances of intimidation that you have mentioned I understand were in connection with Fenianism?—Not at all, but is the same spirit; there is the same spirit now in Ireland; my military secretary, Colonel Smyth, has a property near Dublin, but he cannot go out to visit it without being watched by the police. He married an Irish lady of some property in the county of Westmeath, as he has a great deal to do with me, he could not attend much to his property, he therefore let out the demesne, or park, to a very respectable young man, named Bolton, who is the son of a wealthy farmer of about 2,000 l. a year; because he let out for grazing this demesne, Mr. Bolton received a death notice; Colonel Smyth complained to Lord Spencer, who immediately, with his usual good feeling, took up the matter very warmly, and sent police there; whenever this man walks out he has one or two policemen to attend him.

11775. That is in connection with Ribbonism, is it not?—It is the same spirit as guides the Fenians, of lawlessness and disaffection.

11776. In consequence of the state of Ireland preventing an open and public inquiry into statements of this sort made by policemen, do you consider that they should therefore be taken always as true without any investigation?—When you receive a statement of that sort, if the state of the country does not bear it out, you might consider it extremely doubtful and not believe it at all, but where everything around you bears it out you attach much weight to it.

11778. Do you take the Drogheda case as a corroboration of this statement of the policeman?—No, not as a corroboration, but coupled with the state of the country at the last elections.

11779. I cannot see myself what the general state of the country has to do with this particular statement?—Then we differ in opinion, that is all.

11780. The general state of the country you consider to be in some way attributable to the addresses of the Roman Catholic priests to their congregations?—No, I did not say that; you put those words into my mouth; I was talking of intimidation at elections, but not of Ribbonism or Fenianism.

11781. What connection is there between an address made by a Catholic priest to his congregation, and those instances of intimidation connected with Fenianism and Ribbonism to which you have referred?—I consider that the Ribbonmen were the rank and file of Fenianism.

11782. The question that I asked is what connection do you draw between the address of a Catholic clergyman in Drogheda and this supposed address of another clergyman somewhere else, and Ribbonism and Fenianism?—The address of "another clergyman" relates to an election. I did not connect the Roman Catholic clergy with Ribbonism and Fenianism. I consider that the Catholic clergy took up a very improper and unconstitutional position as regards those elections; they were certainly under the excuse of very vehement party feeling. But there are numberless instances that I can furnish the Committee with; I have a file of newspapers where there are printed addresses which I suppose will not be denied; one is of a Roman Catholic clergyman of the name of Shea in the Queen's county, which also brings forward the case of Ballyhooly. I shall be most happy to send every document I have to the Committee confirmatory of what I have said, and I have a great many; but I should certainly recommend the study of Judge Keogh's charge, because nothing can be more instructive than it is.

11783. Mr. Villiers.] Was any action of any kind taken in consequence of that report of the policeman of what he had heard, or had heard of, in the chapel?—No, it is not possible unless you protect the man. You must give the man a pension and remove him from the country.

11784. Was that policeman removed after he had made that disclosure?—That I do not know. I should think not, because the answer that was made to me was, that they could not take it up, because it would imperil the life of this man.

11785. I think it came second or third hand to you that the policeman said that he was at the chapel, or that he had heard the clergyman state "There must be a bloody deed done here, and the example of Tipperary must be followed"?—Yes.

11786. Chairman.] You heard of it on the authority of that policeman?—Yes.

11787. Mr. Villiers.] I wish to know exactly what the authority is; did the policeman say that that he heard the clergyman say so, or did he report that he was told of it privately in the neighbourhood, or did the landed proprietor show you any letter from this policeman?—Perhaps it is a rather more important communication from the policeman than a mere report. This gentleman was a magistrate, the policemen had orders to report everything of that nature that they heard to the magistrates, therefore it was an official report; but it is given of course, upon the good faith of the landlord.

11788. But the clergyman was not put upon his defence?—Not at all.

11789. Why, did they know what he would say?—No, he might have denied it completely.

11790. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that it would be safe for persons to come and give evidence with respect to such language used by a priest in the disturbed parts of Ireland?—Certainly not; it would be utterly impossible.

11791. Do you think that that fact prevents persons coming forward and giving evidence before this Committee?—Entirely so. I can remember particularly the views of all the Irish Administrations on this point.

11792. Mr. Edward Egerton.] As the result of your experience not only upon this occasion, but from all that you have known of Ireland for some time, would it be impossible to conduct elections without the presence of troops to protect the voters?—Utterly impossible.

11793. Do you think that the ballot and additional polling places would not afford sufficient protection?—I do not think that the ballot would be fair, because certainly the Roman Catholic clergy would know, and take action upon the sentiments of the people in the way that no other influences could be brought to bear. I think the increase of polling places would be an excellent measure. It is urged as an objection to an increased number of polling places, that it would give the landlord an undue influence. I do not agree in that, because whether the voters voted against their landlord at the village where they lived, or went to a distance, I do not see that the landlord would have more power over them in one instance than in the other; the landlord would be equally aware of their having voted against him. Or that if a voter wished not to vote, he could not say I will not vote with you directly, as those voters are generally of a better class. I know that in the last elections tenants, in numerous instances, used this language to their landlords. If there had been a polling place at the railway station at Drogheda, the whole of this disaster would have been avoided, for it was nothing but a disaster, to see the people in the state that they were in; really it was more like an insurrectionary movement than anything else.

11795. And which was rejected, I think?—Yes.

11796. Mr. Villiers.] I think you did not complete your answer with respect to the ballot; you said that it was not fair, because the clergy knew the sentiments of the people?—I mean if you have the ballot in order to leave the mind of the people perfectly free of all undue and unconstitutional influences, that I believe is the reason for advocating the ballot, that there would be equality in that case, because the unconstitutional influences, whether of the landlord or of the clergy, are what are dreaded; and I think that the unconstitutional influence of the clergyman would be exclusively dominant. In short, this precaution of the ballot would have no effect, that the Roman Catholic clergyman, by his knowledge of all the actions and thoughts of his parishioners, would have, and just the same undue influence as he has now.

11797. Chairman.] But do you think that if the ballot were in operation in the Irish elections, it would be necessary to employ troops to preserve the public peace?—That I really cannot answer; so many things occur as to a measure that is not in existence with regard to futurity, that it would be rather difficult to say that it would not, but certainly at first sight I would say so.

11798. Do you think that there would be the same amount of rioting?—No, I think there would not, but I do not think that it would increase the purity of election; that is to say, if the purity of election consists in freedom from undue influence.

11799. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that under the system of the ballot persons of known politics would be likely to be attacked by mobs, the same as they are at present, even though they were going to vote by ballot?—It has been argued, and it is a forcible argument against vote by ballot, that a clever solicitor would have the means of buying up the constituencies as they do now, but through the leading man.

11800. What I want to know is this: at present the mob violence is directed against rural voters coming up to vote; supposing that parties of rural voters, whose politics were known, came up to vote under the system of the ballot, do you think they would be attacked by the mob?—Certainly, if the mob had reason to believe, or indeed had any vague idea that they were going to vote hostilely to their views, there is not a doubt that there would be the same violence offered. I think an increase of polling places would be certainly a great step towards freedom from intimidation.

11801. The O'Conor Don.] You stated at the commencement of your evidence that General McMurdo had given in a report to you immediately after the Dublin election, which contradicts the statement that he had made before this Committee?—Yes.

11802. I find that the statement alluded to in your answer, is the statement at Question 7545, where he was asked this: "You stated that several cases have come within your knowledge where an inordinate number of troops appear to have been employed, and where there appeared afterwards to have been no necessity;" and he said, "Yes, at Balbriggan, which was one point, where I placed myself, in the county of Dublin election; at one time I estimated that the force of armed constabulary and military exceeded that of the mob at the polling place." Is not that statement substantially borne out by his report; does he not state in his report that the troops were overwhelming?—If you will read his evidence, and then his report, I certainly think, as I said before, that his report contradicts his evidence, in which he comments, generally speaking, upon the disadvantage of employing very large bodies of troops, and cites Balbriggan as an example [Vide paragraphs 7545 and 7550 of General MacMurdo's evidence]; whereas, in his his report to me, he praises the arrangements of the concentration of the troops at that place, and attributes "the entire absence of even a disposition to rioting on the part of the people, to the judicious concentration in this part of an overwhelming force." These are General McMurdo's own words.

Rt. Hon. Lord Strathnairn.

11803. Does he not state in this report that the number of troops was overwhelming, and that it exceeded the number of the mob, exactly the same as he stated in answer to that question?—But he praises it in his report, and in his evidence he condemns it.

11804. The discrepancy which you see between the two statements is, that he praises the overwhelming force in one case, and he dispraises it in the other?—Exactly.

11805. But as regards the fact of the force being of this overwhelming character, the two statements are substantially the same?—Overwhelming is rather an excessive epithet; but this has nothing to do with the discrepancy between the evidence and the report.

11806. But is not that the word used, not in his evidence, but in his report to you?—All I say is, that he contradicts it.

11807. Does he not state in his report to you, which you gave in, that the presence of an overwhelming force, both civil and military, accomplished so-and-so?—He says so.

11808. And his statement before the Committee was, that the force exceeded that of the mob at the polling place?—Exactly; I can only repeat again, that what he dispraised in his evidence he praises in his report to me; I cannot go from that statement. As you have brought on the subject again, he states as another and a very valid reason of the wisdom of this concentration, or as he calls it in his evidence, an inordinate and overwhelming force, an account of the dreadful occurrences at Drogheda the day before. Information was received by the Deputy Quartermaster General from the Conservative candidate (I must tell you to be perfectly fair, that it was from the Conservative candidate), that a large body of those Drogheda rioters, who only the day before had attacked the troops with such determination and cruelty, were going to transfer themselves to Balbriggan, which is only a few miles, as General McMurdo says, from Drogheda, and therefore nothing was more probable than that so wicked a mob would have carried out so wicked an intention; therefore, he gives a reason in his report why the concentration was inordinate, as he says. We merely differ about the word "inordinate." I should not call it inordinate; I should call it necessary. It was reported that there would be an attack from Drogheda, which was perfectly feasible, because it is only a few miles off; Colonel Taylor, the Conservative candidate, reported to the Quartermaster General, and said that he had received the same information; therefore, Colonel Taylor's evidence perfectly corroborates that of General McMurdo.

11809. You also differ from the statement made by General McMurdo, that the officers in the army understood that the majority of the voters under escort go very much against their own inclinations, and as a proof of that you gave two reasons, first, that no orders to the effect that soldiers were to escort voters contrary to their inclinations had ever been issued; and, secondly, that no report had ever been made by the officers that voters had been so escorted?—My evidence shows my opinions on this subject, but I deny entirely that the troops coerce the voters to go against their will to the poll.

11810. Is it not quite possible that notwithstanding the fact that no order had ever been given to the troops to escort voters against the will of the voters, or that no report had ever been made to you that the officers believed that the voters went against their will, yet still the officers might have believed it?—I really cannot tell what the officers imagined, but there are their orders, and if officers chose to imagine that they are going to carry out anything but their orders, it is a most dangerous principle, and if any officer did so I should reprimand him severely, and never employ him again on that duty.

11811. General McMurdo states simply, that many officers believed that the voters were going unwillingly; are you in a position to contradict that?—I have said that they go unwillingly very often. I said especially that it might be fairly presumed that the Roman Catholic tenants would not share the views of their Protestant landlords, more especially when the influence of their clergy was brought to bear upon them, with the exceptions I stated. I particularly stated that, and I perfectly agree with it.

11812. When officers are sent down to the country with troops, do not they report themselves to the person to whom they are directed in Dublin to report themselves?—Yes, of course they ought to do so.

11813. And if they get orders in Dublin to report themselves to a person who is not a magistrate, of course they would obey that order?—They cannot obey anybody but a magistrate.

11814. But supposing they get orders to report themselves to somebody who is to name the magistrate for them, of course they would obey?—I never heard of such a case.

11815. But if such an order were issued they would obey it, I suppose?—I believe in the case that you suppose, the officers commanding the troops would obey whatever orders he got; but in no case are officers ever ordered to report themselves to any one but a magistrate.

11816. Mr. Villiers.] You state distinctly, I think, that the force never act without the authority of a civil magistrate?—No, they never ought to do so.

11817. The O'Conor Don.] Do they consider themselves under the command of that magistrate, and bound to do everything that he tells them?—The soldiers consider themselves under their officers; but the officer, of course, considers himself under the magistrate.

11818. If the magistrate or the police officer in the country directed them to prevent any voters from escaping, they would, of course, do so?—I say that that case has never occurred.

11819. Supposing the magistrate or the police officer who is immediately in command of the troops directed them to guard those voters, and bring them safely in to a particular place, would not the soldiers consider themselves bound to do so?—Yes. When you say to bring them safely in, that means to prevent them from being hurt or hindered by the people; but it is a mistaken notion to suppose that the soldiers would prevent a man going off the car, if he said, I do not wish to go any further.

11820. That is your idea; but supposing that such

Rt. Hon. Lord Strathnairn.
9 July 1869.

such an order were to be given, "I deliver up to you those voters now, and you will deliver them in such a town;" what would the officer do?—You might find an ignorant officer who might do so; but any man of intelligence would say to a voter, who expressed a wish to go, "Very well; go wherever you like."

11821. In spite of this command from the magistrates?—Yes; because nobody could give that command; no magistrate who was selected to be a resident magistrate would give such an order; it is quite incomprehensible.

11822. You stated that there was a general movement of the troops at the last election; could you give the Committee any idea what the last election cost the country in consequence of the movement of the troops?—No; I inquired, but I did not hear; it must have been a considerable sum.

11823. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Those duties of appearing at elections are regarded by the military as extremely disagreeable, are they not?—Very much so.

11825. Mr. Brand.] I observe that the general orders issued under your authority for the guidance of the troops affording aid to the civil power in Ireland bear date the 2nd of November 1868; were the instructions, having reference to the escort of voters, varied in any way under those general orders?—No, there was no variation in that respect; there was merely a variation about cavalry and infantry, and one or two points, as I said before, relating to attacks of Fenian organisation.

11826. Do I rightly understand that it occasionally happens that the civil authority accompanying those escorts is represented by a sub-constable?—That may be in cases of emergency, where there is not a magistrate.

11827. If any of the voters were leaving the escort, and the sub-constable were to desire the officer in command not to allow the escape of those voters, would not the officer in command be bound to obey the order of the sub-constable?—Certainly not, if the voters said they wished to go.

11828. But supposing the voters expressed no opinion, the officer in command would be bound to obey the order of the sub-constable, would he not?—The officer then would ask the man, "Do you wish to go?" or "Are you afraid?" but whichever it was the man is a free agent and he would go if he chose; the officer has nothing to do with that. If a man wishes to go I do not see that the question could arise, because if the man says "I do not want to go any farther, and I want to go away," the officer knows that he has nothing whatever to do with that man, because he is a perfectly free agent. I cannot conceive of any officer preventing the man leaving the escort if he wished it.

The Right Honourable Colonel J. Wilson Patten, a Member of the House; Examined.

Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P.

11829. Chairman.] Have you heard the evidence which has been given relating to the Irish elections?—Yes, I have heard some of it, but not all.

11830. Have you seen copies of the remainder?—There are two witnesses who have been before the Committee whose evidence I have seen, that of General McMurdo, and the Reverend Mr. McDermot. I have heard the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, who gave evidence the other day, and Lord Strathnairn, and Major Percy.

11831. Have any statements been made which you wish to qualify or contradict?—I would first allude to a part of the evidence of General McMurdo, which has been already contradicted by Lord Strathnairn, and I wish to add my testimony to its being entirely erroneous, as far as I can ascertain it to be. General McMurdo states that he considers voters under escort to be prisoners; he states that decidedly, in answer to Question 7516, and to the following Question, 7654, by Mr. Gathorne Hardy, "But I presume that if any one of those persons were to tell the escort, or the commander of the escort, that he wished to be left, he would be left?" his answer was, "No, certainly not." That is so contrary to any directions which General McMurdo can have received that I wish to add my testimony to its being entirely unfounded. Everybody is opposed to the military being employed at elections, and it can only be justified by peculiar circumstances; it could not be justified if the least control was to be put upon the voters under escort.

11832. Mr. Villiers.] Has the civil authority anything to do with the orders issued by the commanding officer?—The civil authority only sends a requisition to the Commander in Chief to send troops down to the districts where disturbances are supposed to exist, and those escorts and the officers can only act under orders which they get. There is no such thing as an order to interfere with a voter from any quarter.

11833. Chairman.] Is there any order that an officer is not to interfere with voters?—I should think it was totally unnecessary that there should be one. I do not suppose that any Englishmen can believe that where a man is under escort to protect him from intimidation, they are obliged to take care that he does not escape. I cannot believe it.

11834. There is no order one way or the other?—No, there is no order one way or the other. I should think it was totally unnecessary.

11835. The O'Conor Don.] What did you mean by saying that this statement of General McMurdo's was so contrary to the instructions which he had received?—I mean by contrary to the instructions, that he has no instructions to that effect. It is merely on his own authority that he undertakes to say that he would not allow a voter to escape. He says that if a person under escort expressed a wish to be left, he would not leave him. General McMurdo says that the opinions which he gives are the opinions of officers of the army; but since I heard of that evidence being given I have taken great pains to ascertain from officers who have been in Ireland whether they were of the same opinion as

Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P.

9 July 1869.

General McMurdo. I may have been unfortunate, but I have consulted a great many, and I have not found one officer who does not deny that to be the case; and some of them express themselves very strongly indeed with regard to it.

11836. Chairman.] Are there any other points to which you wish to refer?—General McMurdo gives the Committee to understand that the military are not required, or at least not in the numbers in which they are sent to the different districts. I would refer to his own instructions in answer to Question 7521 to show what his opinion was before he gave his evidence on this Committee. He gives instructions for escorts in the district which he commands, that they are to take entrenching tools, spades, axes, and a cross-cut saw; and I think, in answer to the next question that is put to him, he says that he takes the same precautions as he would in an enemy's country. I think that a General of his experience must have some good reasons for giving instructions of that kind which emanate entirely from himself; those instructions are given entirely by himself to those under his command.

11837. Would you consider that that is inconsistent with what he states?—He is opposed to the military being employed; he says it is unconstitutional to employ the military at elections, but he remarks that, in one case, where an unnecessary number were employed, Lord Strathnairn approved of it himself. The fact is that he himself approved of the number of troops that were sent, and made a report to that effect before he gave evidence here, in which report he said, that he thought that the disturbances at Balbriggan were prevented altogether by the judicious arrangements which had been made with reference to the troops. That was his written report to the Government, and yet his evidence leads one to believe that he considers that the troops were too numerous. He alludes to the troops being more than the crowd that were assembled, and therefore he leads the Committee to believe that there were too many troops employed at that election.

11838. As to the instructions to which you refer, it is possible, is it not, that it might be injudicious to employ soldiers at all, but that, if they were to be employed, such precautions as he ordered should be taken?—Yes; but I think that the orders which he gave when the troops were employed show that there must have been some very serious necessity indeed. It is impossible that such directions as those could have been given if there was not some very serious necessity for them in the country; the fact being that some of the counties in Ireland were in a very disturbed state at the time. I can only say for myself that I was under great anxiety with regard to several of the districts, and that I believe that in no district in Ireland were the precautions taken to keep the peace excessive.

11839. What guided the Government in the directions which they gave to the military authorities for the distribution of troops previous to the election?—Of course, as you know, I had no great experience of the system, but the first inquiry I made was what precautions had been taken by other Governments, and I believe it will be found that the precautions taken by the late Government at the last election did not vary in any respect whatever from the precautions taken by other Governments of every political opinion. I may add that I believe that, owing to the time which elapsed between the dissolution of Parliament and the elections, at no previous elections had the disturbances been so serious, owing to the prolonged agitation that was going on.

11840. Did you receive special reports from each district previous to the election, and were you guided by them in the distribution of troops?—In some cases we had information. We made a list of places where there were to be contested elections. When we heard that the election was not to be contested we immediately withdrew the order for the troops going down; but where there was a contested election we took care that there was a supply of troops ready, in case of necessity.

11842. You have heard it stated that voters in that county were escorted from the country into the polling place four or five days before the election; do you think that, under any circumstances, the use of troops in that way could be justified?—That was brought to my knowledge, by a letter which I received from The O'Conor Don. I immediately made inquiries into it, and I called Lord Strathnairn's attention to it under the impression that the escort had been a military one, but I found that it was not; it was a constabulary escort, and I directed an answer; I forget whether I wrote the answer myself or directed it to be written to The O'Conor Don; and I think my expression was that no escort could be justified except for the protection of the voters. I can undertake to say positively that the constabulary force of Ireland at the last election, in no instance, was used to influence an election. There are 12,000 constabulary in Ireland, and in one case only did a constable, so far as I was aware, take part in an election, and he was immediately dismissed under the rules of the force. Great pressure was brought to bear upon me to re-instate him under very peculiar circumstances; but I thought it essential to the independence and character of the force that he should not be re-instated, and I did not do it 11843. Mr. Villiers.] Was this statement correct, that voters had been brought in some days before the time of polling, in order to be kept safe for polling?—All I know about that is a letter which I received from The O'Conor Don. I made inquiries into it, and I was informed that an escort went out to bring in those voters, but they did not bring in any. I was only interested as to the conduct of the police force. I had no interest in the election beyond that.

11844. But the statement was not correct that they did not bring in any?—I was informed that they did not bring in a single voter.

11845. The O'Conor Don.] In that particular instance?—In any instance that I am aware of of a similar nature; if there is any other I do not know it. In the instances that you call my attention to I was informed on inquiry that not one single voter had been brought in.

11846. Mr. Villiers.] As I understand, you speak from the result of your own inquiry upon information received? — Yes; the only instance in which it was brought to my attention was by a Member of this Committee. I made inquiry the very day I received The O'Conor Don's letter, and I found subsequently that no one voter had been brought in by that escort.

11847. Chairman.] Supposing that no voter was brought in, did you find that the escort was sent out to bring them in?—The way in which the constabulary is managed in Ireland is this, that when an election is to take place a stipendiary magistrate is appointed to take charge of the district, with directions to keep the peace. He has no other directions whatever from the Government, but to look to the peace of the country. The stipendiary magistrate of that district exercised his own discretion in affording protection to voters coming in to the election, and was only subject to the Government if he did wrong. May I venture to make one suggestion? There is a return which has been moved for by The O'Conor Don, and has been presented to Parliament, which gives a very erroneous idea, not intentionally on the part of The O'Conor Don, of the mode in which escorts are conducted. In one column those instances are stated in which no magistrates accompanied the escort. There is no necessity for a magistrate accompanying an escort of constabulary, and it is seldom done. The stipendiary magistrate of the district has the control of the constabulary, and he gives his order for an escort to go out upon any duty. It is a total impossibility that a magistrate should accompany every escort. It appears by that return that there has been an omission of duty; but it is not so.

11848. Let me refer you to this case in Major Percy's evidence, at Question No. 11132. I pointed out to Major Percy a letter signed by N. Lionel Townsend, in these terms: "County Sligo, Tubbercurry, 26th November 1868.—Sir, I beg to inform you that about 20 of Colonel Cooper's voters arrived in this town on last night previous to starting for Chaffpool; but a mob of several hundreds having seen them, put a guard on the house and paraded the streets during the entire night; they made several applications to me for an escort, but owing to the smallness of the force at my disposal, and not having sufficient authority, I declined doing so. The houses are still guarded by the mob, and I fear may be attacked at any moment (signed) N. Lionel Townsend, Third Sub-Inspector. To Major Percy, R.M., &c. &c., Ballymote." Then I asked him, "What did you do on receipt of that letter?" and his reply was, "On receipt of that letter I sent an order to the senior sub-inspector, at Ballymote, to re-inforce Mr. Townsend by a few men, until I could make arrangements to bring them in with one general escort for the whole of the parties." It appears then, that the escort was previously given for those voters who were being sent for on the 26th of November, the election taking place on the 30th; is not that so?—I never saw that case, and never heard of it till I heard it in evidence here.

11849. Do you consider that that was a proper use to make of either the military or the police?—I think that the state of that county was such, that it is quite possible that the electors might wish to be taken in some days previous to the election, to prevent their coming in contact with the mob; but, of course, it is a very strong measure to take voters into a town several days before the election, especially if it is against their will. I presume that it was by their wish, and that they wished to be got into that town before the election to keep out of the way of intimidation; and under those circumstances, I should think it was perfectly justifiable.

11850. Mr. Villiers.] But you do not know anything of the case?—No, I never heard of the case before Major Percy mentioned it in evidence.

11851. Chairman.] Are there any other statements which were made to the Committee, and which you wish to contradict?—I wish to bear my testimony to the character of the police force in their conduct during this election, which has been rather impugned, I think. It is commanded by Colonel Wood, and I can only say for Colonel Wood that I was in constant communication with him during the elections, and I am quite sure that not only his inclination, but his determination, was that the police force should not be used in any way whatever on one side or the other, politically; and, as far as he himself is concerned, though I was in communication with him for three months, I left Ireland without the slightest idea of what his own political opinions were. He showed me his directions for the police force, and I venture to say that every effort to prevent the police taking part in those elections was made. When the Duke of Abercorn left Ireland he felt it his duty to compliment the police upon that particular point; and, in his address to them, he stated that if they wished to maintain the high character which they enjoyed in Ireland, they had only to pursue the same course; or something to that effect.

11852. You have heard it stated, have you not, that an impression exists among the Roman Catholic voters that the distribution of the military and police was intended by the Government for purposes of coercion?—I heard that stated, and I am not at all surprised that such an impression should exist to a certain extent; nothing irritated me so much during those elections as to see the endeavour that was made to instil that idea into the minds of the people. During those elections I scarcely ever took up a local paper in which I did not see some speech or other made, either by a candidate or the supporter of a candidate, impressing the public with the idea that the troops were used for the purposes of coercion. I, of course, felt that very strongly, because I was confident that the greatest possible pains had been taken to prevent any such influence being used.

11853. However erroneous the impression may be, was it altogether an unnatural one?—I think it was a very natural one. When educated gentlemen at public meetings instilled it into the minds of the people, a great many of them being uneducated and very impressible, as the Irish nation is, I think it is quite natural that such an impression should be made upon them.

Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P.

9 July 1869.

11854. Do you attribute that natural impression to the instigation of the candidates or their friends?—I do not think that the impression was natural on their part, but simply because such very great pains were taken to instil it into their minds.

11855. You think that without its being put into their heads it would not have occurred to them?—I cannot interpret their feelings, but I certainly think that such a feeling could not have existed to any great extent unless it had been instilled into their minds by others.

11856. Without meaning the slightest imputation upon the Government, did not the people see that the troops, when they were used, were used entirely on one side?—That is a most erroneous impression. The troops are used on one side, just according to the state of the district in which the troops are. What Lord Strathnairn has stated is perfectly true, that in certain parts of Ireland they were used on the Liberal side, and in certain other parts they were used on the Conservative side, simply from the unfortunate state in which Ireland is, and from the parties being so divided. Wherever a political party is in a minority, military protection is asked for, whether the party is Liberal or Conservative.

11857. Could you give any instances in which in any part of Ireland military escorts were employed for the protection of other voters than Conservatives?—I should not like to give the exact facts; I think it would tend to no good at the present time, but I can say this, that the application for military assistance that gave me the most anxiety was one made from the Liberal side. There were circumstances connected with that which gave me great anxiety.

11858. And the troops were given in that case?—The troops were given.

11859. Mr. Villiers.] I think you said that it was the candidates or the friends of the candidates who had instilled this erroneous notion into the minds of the people?—I judged so from the local papers. I very seldom took up a local paper in which I did not see an instance where some person or other had instilled into the minds of the electors that the troops (always the troops, but sometimes it was even the constabulary), were employed to influence their votes.

11860. I think you said that it was the candidates, or the friends of the candidates, did this, showing that at least one of the two parties did not appreciate the protection that you intended to give them?—Yes.

11861. Chairman.] Have you reason to believe that the country voters in Ireland are permitted, as a general rule, to vote in accordance with their own wishes?—I should decline to go into that at all. I had so very short an experience in Ireland that I could not give evidence which would be worth having upon that point. I only wish to speak to whatever concerns the Government.

11862. In the representations which you received from the county of Sligo, was it represented to you that the voters who desired to vote for the Conservative candidates could not safely come in and give their votes, or was it represented to you that the landlords could not bring in their tenants without protection? — Representations came in from a variety of sources, as far as my memory serves me. A great many election agents stated that parties could not come in safely, and we had representations from the magistrates to say that the district was in so disturbed a state that they must have protection. I think in one or two instances I had memorials signed by various magistrates, saying that they must have additional protection to that which was given before.

11863. Mr. Villiers.] Is there any other erroneous statement which has been made which you wish to correct upon this occasion?—I see that the Reverend Mr. McDermot states at Question No. 8551, that an escort went a roundabout way; and he is asked why they went roundabout and he says that it was "for display." That would have been perfectly contrary to the duty of the police. It was a police escort; it was not a military one; and unless very ample reasons had been given to the Government for their going round, and particularly if it were for display, very serious notice would have been taken of it.

11864. You say that no such order could have been given, but you do not deny that the thing took place?—The thing took place as you heard from the magistrate who conducted the escort, namely this, he did it to avoid a town where he apprehended great difficulty from turbulence, and he went round to avoid that town. If he had done it for any other reason, notice would have been taken of it.

11865. I thought it was for display?—The Reverend Mr. McDermot said that it was for display.

11866. Chairman.] From your experience of the last general election in Ireland, what is your opinion, or have you formed any opinion respecting the employment of troops in Ireland at elections?—I have the same opinion that every Englishman must have, that it is odious to employ troops, but I do not see how you are to avoid doing it in the present state of Ireland. It would not be right here to refer to a speech in the House of Commons, but if it was not improper I would refer to Mr. Chichester Fortescue's speech upon the Party Processions Act the other day; it is the very best description of Ireland I ever saw given in a few words. The purport of it is that parties in Ireland, are organised, and not only organised, but recognised, and they meet and conduct their political operations by processions, and almost by forcible processions; and I do believe that it is impossible as long as that feeling exists in Ireland, that you can conduct an election without military assistance, or, at any rate, without increasing the police force very materially.

11867. Have you formed any opinion as to what would be the effect of the ballot in Ireland?—I have not come here prepared to give my opinions upon the ballot generally, but with regard to Ireland, I will state frankly what I feel about the ballot. With regard to what Mr. Chichester Fortescue stated with reference to parties in Ireland, I do not believe that the ballot would have the least effect whatever. All parties are known and recognised; they meet in hostile array, and whether there be the ballot or not, the Roman Catholics know that the Orangemen vote in one way, and the Orangemen know that the Roman Catholics vote in another way; and they oppose one another coming to the polling places with that knowledge, which would not be affected at all by the ballot. I would give as an instance of that, the Drogheda case. There was no landlord influence there, and there was no other other influence but party influence. The evidence at that trial, and which was given partly by Roman Catholics, was that the evening before the election three priests addressed a meeting, and told them that the Orangemen were coming in the next day, and that the Battle of the Boyne was to be fought again if necessary. The next morning a party arrived of gentlemen who were no Orangemen in a hostile sense, and I know that because one or two of them came to the office afterwards to complain to me. They were clergymen, medical men, barristers, solicitors, and others; and when they came in under escort, they were met by the mob as Lord Strathnairn described. It was a positive fight, and the opposition to those men was simply on the ground that they were Orangemen.

11868. Do you think that the introduction of the ballot in Parliamentary elections would not put an end to physical fights between Orangemen and Ribbonmen?—I think not, certainly.

11869. Were there any Orangemen in the county of Sligo?—There is a Protestant party in the county of Sligo, as I understand, but there again I must speak with great reserve.

11870. Was there in the county of Sligo anything of the same character that you described as existing at Drogheda?—Yes; I speak rather off book, but I believe that in every county in Ireland there is a Conservative party, and that party is thoroughly recognised by the opposite party; and it is known that they always do act in one direction. Generally speaking in the south of Ireland the Conservative party is in a minority, but in the north of Ireland it is in a majority.

11871. Does not that Conservative party usually consist of landlords?—I think not. I think there is a strong Conservative party in several towns, but I would rather not give evidence upon this point, because I am speaking without any certain knowledge.

11872. However, you have had your attention called, have you not, to a question of Sir George Grey's, as to what effect the ballot would have had in that election?—I think the parties were organised, and it was known which way they were going to vote, and that they would have been stopped.

11873. With regard to those Roman Catholic voters who were brought in under escort by their landlords, do you think that it was certain that they would, with the ballot, have voted with their landlords?—I think that the noble Lord himself knows that in another part of the country in which we have been engaged, I mean in the election for North Lancashire (although the state of the case was certainly different in Ireland from what it was in England) a good many Roman Catholics voted for me who were acting entirely without compulsion or influence of any sort or kind, and acting upon the highest principles. The great majority of the Roman Catholics voted for my opponent, but there was a degree of independence on the part of a number of most intelligent Roman Catholics, and upon the highest principles of policy they voted for the Conservative candidates.

11874. Mr. Villiers.] Has that any bearing upon the elections in Ireland?—I do not see why the same feeling should not exist in Ireland as exists in other countries. I will undertake to say this, that when I first went to Ireland, in talking to Roman Catholics, I found that there was a very strong feeling amongst very intelligent Roman Catholics against disendowment; and if I were at liberty to give the names of the parties, I am sure that they would be recognised as persons of very high intelligence.

11875. Chairman.] Do you think that under the protection of secret voting, those voters in the county of Sligo would have been attacked by the popular party, as it was apprehended they would be in this case?—As to individuals, of course I cannot answer; but as to parties, certainly; Ireland is so divided into parties, and parties are so well recognised, that the same feeling would be exhibited whether there was the ballot or not; that is my impression.

11876. Do you believe that a party of Catholic voters, coming in from the country to vote under the protection of the ballot to the polling place, would be, under the ballot, liable to be attacked by a hostile mob?—I do not know enough of Ireland to give a good opinion upon that; I should say that if the mob felt that those parties had a feeling towards their landlords, and were likely to vote for their landlords, it would be the same either with the ballot or without it.

11877. Mr. Villiers.] There would not be the same object for breaking a man's head before he voted that there is now?—No; but I would rather not go into that question.

11878. Chairman.] I think you were about to say something further about the ballot?—I happened to be in the room when the Roman Catholic Bishop gave his evidence the other day, and I think he proved most decidedly, that the ballot would not be advisable in the direction to which he alluded.

11879. Do you mean that the ballot would increase the influence of the priests?—I think so; from what I heard of the evidence of that Roman Catholic Bishop, I thought that that was pretty clearly shown.

11880. Do you think, on the whole, that the ballot would not increase the purity of elections in Ireland?—I would not say that it would not increase it; I do not think it would lead to pure election.

11881. But might it not promote tranquillity?—It might; but if you are to have the ballot in Ireland I think you must really educate the people, and get them into a state in which they are more able to judge independently for themselves than they are at present.

11882. Mr. James.] I suppose you agree in thinking that the military ought not to be used if it can be avoided, and ought only to be used in case of probable riot?—I think that the use of the military at elections is very objectionable, if it can be avoided.

11883. In the absence of the civil officer that you spoke of, what protection would the military have for their acts any more than private individuals?—That is a legal question which I am not able to answer.

11884. If there were not a magistrate there what power have the military to act more than 100 Odd Fellows or 100 Foresters, or any other number of individuals that happen to be banded together?—When I said that it was impossible to have a magistrate present, I said it was impossible to have a magistrate present with every escort that was sent out by the constabulary; the resident magistrate is in charge of the constabulary of the district, and he sends out a detachment of them whenever and for whatever he thinks proper; but troops do not act without a magistrate.

11885. I presume you would think it very inexpedient for troops to be acting as a body without having a civil officer with them?—Yes, certainly; I am not aware that that ever occurred; I believe the troops, as troops, always act under the direction of the magistrates.

11886. The constabulary are civil officers and the troops are not?—Yes; an officer of constabulary is a civil officer, and can himself call upon the troops to act if he is in difficulties.

11887. Mr. Raikes.] In case the polling places were made more numerous in Ireland would not the necessity of those military escorts be very much done away with?—I do not think there is anything upon which there is greater unanimity of opinion, as far as I can make out, in Ireland, than that an increase of polling places would be the best course that could be taken under present circumstances. There were instances brought to my notice of escorts that had to take voters through a district of 20 miles, that district being disturbed. I think General McMurdo, in his evidence, says, that on one occasion the distance was so great that he had to order a relief of escorts; I think he said it was 23 miles that he had to conduct the voters to the poll; and of course that makes it a very serious matter, especially in a disturbed district. In my opinion the best step that could be taken in Ireland would be to increase the number of polling places.

11888. The O'Conor Don.] How long were you in Ireland?—I think I was there three months.

11889. I suppose you were quite new to the duties of secretary?—Yes.

11890. And you were not very well acquainted with Irish affairs before?—Quite so, except that I had been in Ireland. I was only acquainted, as far as I could collect information, as a traveller through it.

11891, You were not in Ireland, I think, at the time that I made complaints with regard to the use of the civil force at the Sligo election?—I think I was; I am not quite sure; but I made instant inquiry on the receipt of your complaint.

11892. As a fact, you were not in Dublin when I called at the Castle; you were in England, attending to your own election, were you not?—Very likely; I had to go over very often.

11893. Was it not a fact that it was brought under the notice of the Government upon the 23rd of November, that the belief at least existed in the county that the civil and military forces were being used to coerce voters?—It was well known to the Government the whole time that such an impression was being made upon the electors.

11894. Were any instructions issued to the resident magistrates and others not to send out escorts to carry in voters into the town, as was represented to the Government was being done on the 23rd of November?—The orders from the Government were that escorts were to be used simply for protection, and nothing else.

11895. Then were special instructions sent down to the stipendiary magistrates?—I presume so; it would go through Colonel Wood.

11896. You heard Major Percy's evidence the other day, did you not?—Yes.

11897. You heard him distinctly state that he received no particular instructions with regard to the county of Sligo election?—But the resident magistrate never does; there are no instructions ever given. The resident magistrate merely gets his orders to go into a district and preserve order there. There are no other directions given to him.

11898. But it was represented to the authorities in Dublin that a system of escorts was being carried out in Sligo 10 days before the election, and that the voters were being carried in at this long date before the election, and those representations being made the Government was asked to issue an order to prevent it; was any such order issued?—I would not have issued such an order on any account. I should have been taking upon myself the responsibility of saying whether those men wanted protection or not, I being at Dublin and they being at Sligo.

11899. Do you consider that cases might arise where it might be necessary to escort voters in, 10 days before the election?—I think that 10 days is a long time; but I can easily imagine that a county in Ireland, might be in such a very disturbed state that people wishing for protection would like to get in to the polling town previous to disturbance, which is a very common thing on the polling day.

11900. But not so long before as 10 days?—As to the number of days, if my memory serves me right, the honourable Member's letter to me did not state 10 days. I think it was from the Tuesday to the Friday, if I recollect rightly.

11901. In my first letter to you I stated that an application was made on the 20th, and that the polling was to be on the 30th, that would be 10 days?—But is the honourable Member sure that the escort went out on the 20th?

11902. No. I am not referring now to the fact; I am merely asking you whether a statement was not made to the Government that an application for an escort had been made 10 days before the election, and whether the Government in consequence of that did not consider it necessary to issue some instruction, directing that such should not take place?—Nothing would have induced me to have issued such instructions as those. I should have been taking upon myself to decide the question, whether it was right or wrong, which I would not do. I think if the honourable Member has the letter which he received, it will show exactly what the feeling of the Government was.

11903. The answer is this, "I am directed by the Lord Lieutenant to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 23rd instant, and to state that your communication having been laid before the Attorney General, he has expressed his opinion that magistrates are justified in giving military escorts on information that breaches of the peace, or danger to life or property, are apprehended. I am to add that his Grace cannot give instructions concerning what has been done without more definite information"?—I think that that is a common sense answer to such a letter.

11904. But, as a matter of fact, it appears from Major Percy's evidence that escorts were sent out without any information that breaches of the peace or danger to life or property were apprehended?—I know nothing of that.

11905. You heard Major Percy state that, did you not?—I do not recollect it; it may be so. If he stated it of course it is so.

11906. Major

11906. Major Percy was summoned here, was he not, upon your suggestion?—I suggested that one of three magistrates from that district should answer the evidence that had been given in this Committee.

11907. Did you not suggest Major Percy by name?—Yes, I suggested him and two others, and that one of them should be brought here.

11908. Major Percy, whom you suggested should be summoned, stated that he considered it a sufficient justification to send out an escort if an election agent asked him?—Of course if that is the custom I can easily imagine that that would be justified. It depends upon the state of the country, of course.

11909. Supposing that to be the state of things in the country, do you wonder, irrespective of any speeches that were made that people should imagine that the police and military were being used on behalf of the landlords?—I can quite imagine that; I think it all depends upon the state of the country. The state of Ireland is so unlike any other at the time of an election. It is in a very disturbed state; there is such intimidation going on on all sides that I think you must leave it to the parties on the spot to judge how far they can protect themselves; and if people are dragged out of their beds at night by marauding parties going round and pulling them out of bed and ill-treating them, I can imagine almost any steps being taken to protect them under such circumstances.

11910. Did you hear Major Percy's evidence with respect to those outrages by night?—Yes.

11911. Did you hear him state that, in very many instances, he believed the people were what he called "humbugs"?—I believe he said that it was so in two cases.

11912. Did he not state that in other instances he thought they were humbugs?—I can only say that they were not all humbugs by any means People were a great deal too much maltreated to leave any doubt upon the point.

11913. Was there any serious injury done to anyone in that election?—I am told so.

11914. I am not referring to the borough or the unfortunate death of Captain King, but could you mention any single instance in the county of Sligo, outside the borough, in which any person was seriously injured on the Conservative side?—I believe there were many instances, although I cannot now call them to mind, and that was one of the reasons why we sent so large a force down.

11915. Was there a single person tried for any offence of that description?—I do not know; I am not acquainted with the fact, and, therefore, it would not be fair evidence; but, I think, certainly that it was so.

11916. You cannot mention any instance or give the name of any person who had been seriously injured in those night marauding attacks to which you have referred?—Individual names I cannot give; but I am quite sure that instances were mentioned, and Major Percy himself mentioned a case where they had sacked the house and had almost pulled down the house, and had broken all the furniture. That is rather a strong measure.

11917. But are you aware that it has been stated before this Committee that in some instances the occupants of the house wished to have their property seriously injured in order that it might be a proof to the landlord that they did not dare to vote as he wished?—I look upon that as quite an exceptional case. I suppose that the honourable Member wishes to argue that the county of Sligo was not in a very disturbed state, and great intimidation going on.

Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P.

9 July 1869.

11918. Certainly, I mean that it was not to the extent represented?—Then I have a very different opinion.

11919. I was in the county of Sligo the whole time, and you were not; therefore, am not I in a better condition to know the condition in which the county was?—I could not discuss that. I believe that you were very actively engaged on behalf of one of the candidates, and I suspect that my opinion is quite as independent as yours, with great submission.

11920. At all events, you cannot name an instance in which anyone was seriously injured?—I have not had the means of knowing individual instances.

11921. Were there no records of these offences kept at DublinCastle when you were Chief Secretary?—I believe that there were. The thing that strikes me most, is the case where a man had been pulled out of his bed, and well licked and well frightened, and made to swear on the Bible that he would vote for the Liberal candidate.

11922. When you say he was well licked, was he laid up because of his licking?—Of course I cannot tell that.

11923. You cannot give the name of that person?—I cannot from memory. I believe his name was given, but I am not sure how that may be.

11924. Major Percy gave a particular case where a man was dragged out of his bed, and stated that he was beaten, and this person's name was Tighe, the brother of the parish priest of Ballymote; but Major Percy stated that he considered that the case, upon examination, was not borne out, and that the man was a humbug?—Whatever Major Percy said, I will undertake to say was true. Those are quite exceptional cases, and do not at all exemplify the state of the county of Sligo.

11925. I only want to have it upon the evidence that you are not in a position to state any particular instance in which serious injury was suffered by anyone in that county?—I am only unable to state that, because I have not the materials upon which to make the statement; but that we had representations made that people were very seriously injured, I am perfectly certain.

11926. You stated that educated gentlemen instilled the idea into the minds of the people that the force of the country was being used against them; do you believe that those educated gentlemen believed those statements that they were making?—Of course I cannot.

11927. But supposing that educated gentlemen came to that conclusion, do you think that there would be any wonder that the people themselves should imagine the same thing?—But the honourable Member must know that at the time of a contested election statements are made at random, and that every argument is used to induce people to take a particular view. I am sure I know of few instances where that was the case, more than in the contest for the county of Sligo.

11928. I think you stated that you are not aware yourself of any other cases in which

Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P.

9 July 1869.

escorts were sent out, except that particular one to which I called your attention?—No; the only time that I had my attention called to it was by the honourable Member himself, and then I took the steps which I have described.

11929. There was no investigation into that until the 4th of December after the election was over?—No, I did not hear of any other case of that particular kind; in fact, I did not hear of any case of that kind, except that which was brought to my notice by the honourable Member himself.

11930. You stated that you were aware yourself personally of instances in which persons smuggled themselves into the polling places, and voted for a Conservative landlord?—Of that I have been informed since.

11931. When you speak of being smuggled in, were such men not escorted in by the police and military?—No, they got in by stealth, so my informant told me.

11932. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You have had great experience in English elections, have you not?—No, I have only had the experience of one contested election.

11934. Do politics run higher, or are the people more excitable?—I think there are a variety of causes for it. Politics run very high, the parties are more defined, and they are more organised. There are the Roman Catholics forming the majority, and there are the Orangemen, and the Protestants as a body forming the minority. All the distinctions are very strictly defined, and they entertain very strong views.

11935. In fact, it is generally a religious question, and not a political question?—Yes, I think that religion has more to do with politics in Ireland than it has in England.

11936. Do you think that an Irish election could be conducted as an English one?—There are instances of it. We had instances where we withdrew the troops because we believed that the elections were being conducted peaceably. I would not, upon any account, have sent troops knowingly to an election where disturbances were not apprehended. I should not have been justified in doing so.

11937. We know that you have a strong objection personally, as an Englishman, to employ troops at an election; but what would have been the consequences if no troops had been employed?—I think that there would have been great riots in certain places.

11938. Could not the constabulary have kept the peace?—No, there are 12,000 constabulary in Ireland, and they are divided into small parties all over Ireland; they have duties to perform in every parish and in every townland, and when all the elections were going on at the same time, you could not have got together any great force of the constabulary.

11939. Is not this the great difference, that in England the great bulk of the people always take the part of the law, but that in Ireland they are either indifferent to it, or go against it?—I would not say that; I think that the Irish are a very impulsive people, and they act upon impulse a great deal more than the English constituencies do.

11940. Is there any class in Ireland, so far as you are aware, that would take the part that is taken here by special constables, in the case of a riot?—I have too little experience of Ireland, to be able to give an opinion upon that point.

11941. Can you inform us what is the usual law, as to the number of polling places in Ireland?—I am not certain about that.

11942. Do you consider yourself as Chief Secretary, responsible for all the acts of the resident magistrates?—I think that the Chief Secretary represents the Irish Government, and I think that if any resident magistrate misconducts himself the Chief Secretary would be obliged to represent it to the Lord Lieutenant.

11943. You receive strict reports, do you not, from the resident magistrate as to what he has done?—Yes; the resident magistrates report to the Irish Office in Dublin anything that is of consequence; the constabulary report to Colonel Wood, the head of the constabulary, anything that they do; and a good deal of that which the O'Conor Don has referred to, would naturally go to the head of the constabulary, Colonel Wood.

11944. Did you receive any complaints against the conduct of those resident magistrates that were employed during the elections?—No; by-the-by my impression is that one of the witnesses gave it as his opinion, that the majority of the resident magistrates were Conservatives, and it rather surprised me; I believe that it is directly the reverse; that the great majority of the resident magistrates are Liberals; and it so happens that when I was in Ireland nearly all the chief incidents that occurred, Ballicohey, Drogheda, and others were under the guidance of Liberal magistrates; the Drogheda case was under the magistracy of Mr. Talbot, who, I believe, is not only a Liberal, but a Roman Catholic.

11945. Is there any selection of those resident magistrates, or do you take them by any order of rotation?—You send them just as you can get hold of them. At the time of a general election, you have really great difficulty in appointing magistrates to their places. I think that in the county of Sligo, if I recollect rightly, we sent down three resident magistrates. In the county of Monaghan, where there was not afterwards, I think, a contest, we had to send three. I think there are about 70 altogether, and we had to divide them throughout Ireland.

11946. You probably took those who were unemployed at the moment?—Yes; but I think that at the last election they were nearly all of them employed.

11948. Mr. Leatham.] You said that the ballot ought to be preceded by education in Ireland, in order to enable the voters to form an intelligent opinion before they voted under the ballot; do you think, therefore, that open voting is salutary, when the voters have not sufficient education to form an opinion?—I do not mean that that follows as a matter of course; but I do think that in Ireland, as far as you could carry it, better education is a very great necessity.

11949. Then, do you think that the pressure which is brought to bear upon them under open voting, and which induces them to vote contrary to their unintelligent opinions, is a salutary thing?—No, I do not say that at all. I think that with very uneducated parties, the influence of educated parties upon them, perhaps, is not objectionable.

11950. Mr. Brand.] I do not wish to ask you your opinion upon the ballot generally; but do not you think that the adoption of the ballot would tend to promote tranquillity, at least in the Irish elections?—I do not think so at all; I think that parties are so recognised, one party recognises the other as a party, and they act so openly, and in such a manner, that I do not think that the ballot would have any great effect upon them.

11951. The O'Conor Don.] Is that your opinion with respect to the whole of Ireland?—I could not say that; I think that what I saw most of was in the disturbed parts; my attention was chiefly turned to the disturbed parts, and the causes of those disturbances. Rt. Hon. Col. Wilson Patten, M.P. 9 July 1869.

11952. Is it a fact that in the three provinces, the west, the south and the east, there are those two recognised parties that you allude to, or is it not the fact that that state of things is confined to the north?—I think not confined to the north of Ireland; I should say that in Dublin the parties are thoroughly recognised, and in several other districts; I should say that in Limerick there are two pretty well defined parties, and in Cork there are two parties pretty well defined; there is, of course, a very great majority on the one side, but the parties are all well known.

Sir COLIN BLACKBURN, Knight; called in, and Examined.

11953. Chairman.] YOU were one of the Judges who were engaged in the trial of Election Petitions?—Yes, I went to eleven places where there were petitions; two of them were merely scrutinies, and there were nine where the question was whether there had been corrupt practices or not. Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

11954. You have read, have you not, the evidence which was given before this Committee by Mr. Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Willes?—Yes, I have seen a copy of the transcript, and have read it.

11955. Do you agree generally in the purport of the evidence which was given by them?—I can hardly say that; I should say, first of all that I had no knowledge whatever of elections beforehand; I never was a candidate for any place, and never held a brief in an Election Committee, so that all that I know about elections has been derived from what has been presented to me in those particular places, and I hardly think that that experience is enough to enable me to express any opinion at all upon what the general conduct of elections is in the country; the impression left upon my mind from the places that I went to, was that each individual place had its own peculiar manner of conducting its election, and that the rest of the country probably differed a good deal from them, that there was a material difference between an election at Staleybridge or in any of the Lancashire boroughs, and an election at Bridgwater or Taunton or the other Somersetshire boroughs.

11956. As a matter of fact did you come across any case where any corrupt practices had very extensively prevailed?—Yes, at Bridgewater it had extensively prevailed, and on my report there has been a commission issued.

11957. Was there bribery at Bridgewater?—Yes. At Stafford I was convinced that it was a very corrupt place, although the evidence convinced me that it was materially lessened, owing principally to the merits of one of the candidates, Mr. Pochin, whom I was obliged, much to my regret, to unseat, upon another reason entirely distinct from corruption; but I was convinced that it was a very corrupt place indeed. In other places there were a certain number of corrupt voters, undoubtedly, and a certain quantity of corruption was alleged; but there was no other place where I could say that the place was decidely corrupt.

11958. Did it appear that drinking or treating also prevailed extensively?—Yes; at Bewdley the treating was very extensive, at most of the places there was a good deal of drinking, and of course imputations were made as to this treating; but, except at Hereford and Bewdley, there was no case of treating made out to my satisfaction. I mean treating in the sense that I understand the Corrupt Practices Act to require, namely, the giving of meat or drink by some agent of the candidate, for the purpose of influencing the votes. I do not think, as I construe the Act, and I believe everyone else has construed the Act, that the mere giving of meat or drink in itself amounts to treating, so as to vacate an election, it must be given with that corrupt intention, which of course is a matter that is difficult to prove, sometimes it may be proved and sometimes not.

11959. Did the evidence in any case appear to you to show that though the treating was not corrupt the election was attended with a great deal of drinking and so on?—In no case. There was a good deal of drinking in one sense, but not to such an extent as would at all bring it within the principle which I understand to be pretty well established, that though you do not bring the corrupt practice home to the agent of the candidate, yet if you are satisfied that it showed that the election was not a fair and free election the seat should be vacated. No case amounted to that in any that was brought before me, I take it to be a question of degree, and no case came to that degree which I should have thought right to bring within that principle.

11960. Did any case of intimidation come before you?—Intimidation was alleged in every one of the petitions, I think; but there was no case in which it was made out, except at Stafford, where, as I said before, I had to unseat one of the candidates, Mr. Alderman Pochin, who had been quite free from any corrupt practice, but I had to unseat him because I was convinced that his paid agents instigated the mob to beat and terrify back electors from the poll.

11961. That was the only case of intimidation which was proved before you?—The only one that was proved before me; but there were several that were alleged.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

11962. And that was intimidation by a mob?—Yes, that was intimidation by a mob; there were several that were alleged, but I think they all came to nothing; they were very little cases, saying that a master influenced his servants; but they all came to nothing, except one which was at Oldham, where, upon taking the scrutiny, it appeared to me that a master manufacturer (I have forgotten on which side he was) had gone round amongst his men before the election with his overlooker to inquire how they were going to vote, to an extent which convinced me that he was not leaving his men free, and there were two or three votes struck off on one side or the other, I do not recollect which, upon that ground; but except that case, no case of intimidation was made out to my satisfaction.

11964. Did any question connected with municipal elections come before you?—Very slightly; I cannot say that absolutely nothing came before me in that way, for there was, both at Hereford and also at Hastings, an allegation that there had been bribery or treating on that principle at the municipal election; but the defence was, that they were not treating with any reference whatever to the Parliamentary election, but with reference to the municipal election. As you are aware that the two elections this year happened to fall very close indeed to each other, and in that way the municipal election came in in both those cases. It was suspicious their coming so close, but it was not made out to my satisfaction that the bribery was intended for Parliamentary bribery; that was the only way in which the municipal elections came before me.

11965. Has the law relating to corrupt practices at municipal elections ever come under your notice?—I do not think it ever has.

11966. I believe that in the case of municipal elections there is no provision, or no provision which is easily worked, by means of which a seat corruptly gained can be avoided?—No; I should think not practically. You might, no doubt, have a quo warranto in the Court of Queen's Bench to question the seat, on the ground that there were many corrupt votes, and you might ultimately succeed in a trial before a jury upon that; but by the time you had done so, in the ordinary course of things, the tenure of the municipal office will be up, or nearly so, and the expense great, so that I do not think that there is, practically, any remedy.

11967. The effect of the evidence which you have heard has been to show that proceedings are very seldom taken on account of any corrupt practices at municipal elections?—I do not remember any.

11968. Should you think that that is partly on account of there being no sufficient motive to put the law in motion?—Doubtless, a great deal.

11969. And that would rather confirm what you said with regard to Parliamentary elections, would it not?—I should expect that it would have some effect, only that my attention has not been called to it. As regards Parliametary elections, as far as my experience of the 11 trials goes, I should say that, practically, it does have that effect.

11970. Do I understand that you would recommend, that if Parliament wishes to check those practices, the only lever which it can work with is a legal provision by which the seat shall be lost?—Of course that would be the practical effect; but I should not like, by any means, to say that you are to make everything a cause of losing the seat, because if you introduce too many particulars, and oblige a judge, when he is satisfied, to adopt the harsh and rigid rule of saying this or that must vacate the seat, the judge would then be obliged to unseat Members in a way that would be felt to be frivolous and vexatious; tious; the feeling of the country, generally, would not go with him, and I think that it would be very inexpedient to make everything a ground for unseating a member; but as far as my experience goes, I do not think that anything else would have the effect of preventing those corrupt practices. The thing that has struck me as the most effectual of anything that has occurred to me in the nature of a suggestion, indeed the only improvement in the law that has practically occurred to me, would be this; leaving the direction that the expenses shall all be paid through an agent as they are now, and requiring that they should be returned, and that the vouchers should be filed as they are now, I would add this, and say that the period for petitioning should be extended until after those returns have been made and published. At present the law is, that the petition must be within 20 days after the election, and the return of the accounts is not rendered obligatory until two months after the election, and of course the disclosure then comes too late. Probably two months is too long a period, and I would shorten the time, but I would make it the law that the period for petitioning should be extended till after the return of the accounts; and, what I think is even more important, I would make it a substantive ground for unseating a member if he or his agents wilfully kept back any vouchers or any expenses which they had incurred or spent.

11971. What would you do in the case of charges bonâ fide incurred when paid subsequently to the return of the expenses?—If it was wilfully done, then, according to the scheme that I propose, the Member who either himself or his agents, had wilfully neglected to make that return, would be liable to lose his seat.

11972. But, supposing that certain expenses were not charged to the candidate until after that time, whose fault would that be?—The expenses not being charged would be the fault of the creditor, but the fault of not returning them as having been incurred would be either that of the candidate or of the candidate's agent who had incurred them.

11973. Supposing some doubtful kind of expenditure had been incurred, such as expenditure at public-houses; and, supposing that the publican, trusting to the honour of the candidate, but knowing that the payment of his bill might endanger the seat, kept back his account till after the time for presenting the accounts; what would you say in such a case?—The scheme that I propose would be that it should not only be a return of expenses paid, but of expenses incurred; and, in the case that you are supposing, if a bill had been incurred at a publican's, at the instance either of the candidates or the candidate or the candidate's agent, if that expense kept back from the return of the person who incurred the bill, it would be a question of fact whether he had kept back that expense wilfully; I should say in general that he would have kept it back wilfully. In such a case, if the person who incurred the debt, the agent, did not return that he had incurred it, it would be generally speaking what I should call a wilful keeping of it back; and, if he was an agent of that Member within the rule of agency, I think that the Member should then lose his seat. The law, as I propose it, may seem a little harsh; but if you recollect the object that I am supposing to be attained is, to enforce that expenditure shall not be incurred and kept back under a false notion of trusting to the candidate's honour for paying it afterwards. It should all be disclosed, in order that there may be no corrupt expenditure, and I think that that would be essential.

11975. I infer from what you said, that you regretted very much the decision that you were obliged to give at Stafford?—I did regret it on this ground; and I may state that the inquiry which happened at Stafford is very strongly illustrative of the inefficiency of the present law about corrupt expenses. It appeared on the evidence that at the last election, and I take it at all the elections before, but certainly at the last election preceding this, when Mr. Bass, the present Member, I think, for Stafford, was one candidate, and Colonel Meller was the other; and they were returned, that there was great corruption. Mr. Bass was not a candidate at the present election, and consequently was not called before me upon this occasion; but when Colonel Meller was called before me, the first questions that were asked him were about the former election; and he with great frankness told us that he had expended more than 5,000 l. on the former election; and he seemed to be under the conviction that this sum had been honestly spent, and he was simple enough to believe that it was so. It appeared when we got the returns of the former election, that the agents who were conducting the present election for Colonel Meller, were the same agents as before, and that they had returned the expenses at 1,300 l., and that the odd 3,700 l. had escaped their notice altogether; and according to what they said, they could not account for how it was spent at all. That was clearly a wilful infringement of the Act of Parliament; it was a clear misdemeanour, and I had intended to have reported it to the House of Commons, with a view to have made him an example, and instituted a prosecution; but unfortunately, there is a section in the Act of Parliament, which says that no prosecution whatever shall be entered into, except within a year after the matter has taken place; so that by the Act of Parliament, there is an indemnity for all this. I mention that specially, because it seemed to me to be an important point in the case at the time; and thinking that it was a matter which might be amended when the time came to reconsider the Corrupt Practices Act, and the amendment which I should prefer is the one that I have already suggested. Had there been on the former election at Stafford, when Colonel Meller and his agents did this, an opportunity for petitioning some time after the accounts were returned, they would not have dared to do it; or if they had dared to do it, and it was made a substantive ground for avoiding the threat that there was any expense wilfully kept back, it must have been within the knowledge of the inhabitants of Stafford, and one would think that some would be willing to start the question that the seat was voidable.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

11976. But with regard to the decision which you arrived at in Mr. Pochin's case, what was the cause of your regret?—My regret was this; Mr. Pochin, when he came down to Stafford the second time, having found out from experience that there was that corruption existing which I have mentioned, bonâ fide desired to stop it, and he very sensibly indicated what his view was by refusing to trust any local agent, or any of the old agents, with any of his expenditure. He brought down, I think, from Manchester, a man of his own to conduct the expenditure; and the result was that I was satisfied that really he did conduct it so that there was no corruption on his part, and that it was a consequence of his so conducting it that there was no corruption, that the other side were deterred from entering into extensive corruption; for it was unquestionable that they were prepared to do it, only they got frightened when they saw that the other side was pure. I thought it very meritorious on Mr. Pochin's part, and I was very anxious that he should have preserved his seat; but unfortunately he employed a local agent who was pretty well known in the district, whom he paid to pay for a mob of roughs that were under his control. I was convinced that that agent did use them for the purpose of intimidation, and therefore I could not then help unseating him, because the case was clear when I was satisfied that it was within the terms of the Statute.

11977. You would not desire that greater discretion should be entrusted to the judge?—No, I think not; it is impossible to prevent a great deal of discretion being vested in him unless you draw the hard and fast line of saying that something or other shall absolutely unseat a man whether it be guilty or whether it be not; but if you make it depend upon intention, as it does in the case of treating, you must inevitably trust to the judge at the time to use his common sense and his discretion to see whether or no the fact is sufficiently proved; undoubtedly there is great risk, indeed almost certainty, that one judge may draw one line and another judge draw another, which must be destructive of any rule in such a case, but I do not think you can help it; it is the nature of things. You must either make one rigid law, which would often work with great hardship, or you must leave it to the discretion or common sense of the tribunal, whatever it may be, to decide the matter.

11978. As to the law of agency, are you satisfied with it as it stands?—It is an instance of what I say, and I have mentioned it in two or three judgments; it will be found in the Staleybridge case, where I had first occasion to speak upon it; and also in the judgment which I delivered in the Taunton case, you will find my reasons for the conclusions I came to as to what was agency; but I came to the conclusion that it was impossible to lay down a hard definite rule of what was agency; you must, to a considerable extent, leave it to the discretion of the judge; leaving the consequent evil that the law must seem uncertain, or rather must be uncertain, because the common sense of the judge must be an uncertain unit of measurement; I think I cited Mr. Seldon's "Tabletalk," where he talks of equity as then administered according to the conscience of the Chancellor, that the equity must necessarily be as uncertain as a measure of length, the unit of which was the measure of the Chancellor's foot, for the Chancellor's conscience was as variable as the Chancellor's foot; it is a well-known instance which illustrates what I mean; if you trust a thing of that kind to the discretion or the judgment of the tribunal (whether it is a judge, or a jury, or a Committee of the House of Commons, it is all one), it must be variable and uncertain.

11979. I think that Mr. Baron Martin told us that in his opinion the law of agency, as it had been agreed upon by the judges, and administered by them, was a harsh law; do you agree with him?—I do not think I should say that exactly; I think that it is absolutely essential that you should have the Member, so far as losing his seat is concerned, liable for the acts of his agents, or else you would never have any hold over corruption at all.

11980. I understand him to say that, in his opinion it was a necessary, but at the same time a harsh, law?—It sometimes is harsh, there can be no doubt about it; sometimes when a Member has intended to be as pure as pure can be, and has employed agents whom he has intended to be as pure as pure can be, one person who is undoubtedly an agent gets into a state of excitement and will do something that amounts to treating and bribery; no doubt it is a hard case, but I do not see how it can be helped.

11981. Are there any other general observations that you would wish to make to the Committee?—No, I think none; nothing else that I could suggest that would be of any use; of course I would be happy to give any information that I am asked about it.

11982. Have you formed any opinion as to whether it would be possible to make mere lavish expenditure a ground for unseating a Member?—My difficulty there, is the fact of being unable to satisfy myself how you would determine the question of fact, whether the expenditure was lavish and the very great uncertainty of it; there is no doubt, more especially if you adopted what I have just been suggesting, if you could secure that the election expenses should be really returned, and if you could secure that a lavish expenditure should be a ground for turning a Member out, you would do a very great deal to check expense; but I should have very much difficulty in saying how you would define lavish expenditure.

11983. You would not like to be placed in the position of having to decide what was lavish, and what was unnecessary?—I have decided as difficult things as that, but I should feel that I was striking in the dark a good deal, and it would be very uncertain, I think; if you could establish, as it were, a common tariff to say that no man should spend, say more than 5 s. a head for every registered voter in an election, or something of that sort, then the question would be very simple; I think I saw in the newspapers that the return for the Durham county election was something like 17,500 l., and it is clear enough that if there were to be a very small tariff for the registered voters, it would prevent the possibility of going so high as that.

11984. Such a rule as that would work very unfairly, would it not?—It might.

11985. The expense of an election must depend very much, must it not, upon the time during which the contest lasts?—I feel that it would be very difficult indeed to get a satisfactory decision upon upon that; there is no doubt that if you could do it, it would strike at the very root of the evil, because if you prevent there being a lavish expenditure, of course you would cut off at once the source of corruption.

11986. Mr. Hunt.] If such a tariff were laid down, I suppose the candidate would be expected to go up to the limit?—That would be the case, undoubtedly.

11987. Mr. Villiers.] Has not any trial brought under your notice that question of lavish expenditure?—I do not think that there was any case brought before me in which that was alleged.

11988. You would not consider that you had jurisdiction over such a matter as that?—Not as a mode of unseating a Member at all; but it would, of course, be important evidence as bearing upon the question, whether or no the expenditure had been applied to corrupt purposes. I will explain what I mean. If there appeared considerable doubt whether or no drink had been given for the purpose of corrupting voters to the extent to which it had been; if it appeared that there had been a very large expenditure on the part of the Member, it would afford pretty strong enough light to show that he must have intended it for such a purpose as that.

11989. I think I understand you to recommend that the time should be extended after which a Member could not be petitioned against; would you propose to fix the time within which all the vouchers should be brought in?—Yes.

11990. At present you think that the time is too limited, which is 21 days?—At present the petition must be within 20 days, and the return of the expenses has not to be made until two months; so that in the very large majority of cases, except at the beginning of Parliament, when there are a large number of cases, and petitions are not tried so speedily, they have the benefit of this, that the petition has been presented, and the trial is all over before the election expenses are returned.

11991. From what you observed, did it occur to you that there might be a large expenditure incurred during the election, and only defrayed after the petition had been tried?—Probably a great deal is done in that way, although I do not know it; but the great evil is rather that the return as to what the expenses were, and the evidence of what the expenses were is not made public till after the trial.

11992. That is to say, they take care not to have that evidence till the trial is over?—That would be the case wherever it is a single election.

11993. How would it be any security to extend the time, because where there is a disposition to evade the law it would only be farther postponing the payment of those expenses which are illegitimate?—I do not quite understand that; what I would propose would be to extend the time of petitioning till say a fortnight after the expenses had been returned, and to make it a substantive ground of unseating the member if he wilfully neglected to return all the expenses which had been either paid or incurred at that time.

11994. But supposing an auditor is appointed, or some officer who may be required to collect all the bills of the election, and they profess to have been all returned before the petition is presented and tried, what is there to prevent further payment being made after the trial of the petition?—The petitioners would find it out. I may give as an example the first case I tried at Bewdley, where the election agent avowedly refrained from returning the vouchers and other things until the day after the trial had begun, and he avowedly refrained from returning them, because he said that they would furnish evidence upon the trial. There was amongst other things omitted a bill for 80 l. to a particular public-house, the "George," which had never been paid, and never would have been sent in, but the petitioners knew of it and said, that they were not all the expenses which were incurred at the "George;" and the respondents were obliged to admit it; the "George" people one after the other were got hold of, and then it appeared that there was a bill incurred at the "George" of 80 l., which had been purposely kept back in order that there might not be evidence of it.

11996. So then, in your opinion, security can be taken against illegitimate expenditure being defrayed, after all danger of unseating the Member has passed away?—Nothing, I should say, that would do it perfectly; you may increase the probability of detection. You are aware, by the law as it at present stands, if a payment is made at a future time it never is too late to petition, if it is only found out. You may petition always upon the ground of a corrupt payment that it has been freshly made, if you can find it within 21 days after it has been made. But of course, I suppose, no Member who was going to make a corrupt payment would be foolish enough to do it under such circumstances as that the other side could find it out if he could help himself.

11997. I want to ascertain from you whether there are not modes of evading the law in the way of spending money which make it almost impossible to prevent it under the present system?—I have not the smallest doubt that there is a great deal of corrupt expenditure that escapes detection; but I do not think it is possible to have a corrupt expenditure without some risk of detection.

11998. At present it is necessary to establish agency, is it not, in order to establish the corrupt character of the expenditure, so as to have any effect upon the sitting Member?—Yes; subject to the exception where the corruption is so general and so extensive as to show that it is not a fair election; but, as a general rule, you are correct.

11999. You have no doubt whatever, have you, that payment may be made that is quite illegal, and it may be almost lavish in character without your being able to connect it with any agency, or with the sitting Member in any way?—I have no doubt that such a thing may be; and, besides that, I agree with what both Mr. Baron Martin and Mr. Justice Willes stated, namely, that there may be illegal, and even lavish illegal payments that are not such as to invalidate the election at all. Those payments which are made illegal, such as giving meat and drink to voters for having voted on the polling day, would not invalidate the election unless the judge who tried the case was satisfied that it was done with the intention of influencing those votes. Consequently a person may incur a great deal of illegal expenditure if he keeps it only amongst friends of whom he is perfectly secure, because no one would suppose that he wanted to influence their votes, because their votes were already safe.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

12000. In that case it would depend very much upon the discretion of the judge, would it not, as to whether it was done with a legitimate object?—It must do so; I have had to consider it in a good many places, and in the North Norfolk Election Petition, I explained, as I always do when I come to the decision, what the reasons for my decision are, and you will have there an illustration of what I mean.

12001. I think that the judges are not quite agreed upon the matter of the purpose of treating?—I think that they are all quite agreed upon the test, namely, that it must be done with the intention to influence. I suppose that no two men would be always quite sure to agree to the letter in a particular case, that the intention was proved or not.

12002. I thought that Mr. Justice Willes took a peculiar view of treating; because he told us that refreshments are required upon an occasion of this kind, and that in consequence they are not illegitimate?—No, I do not think so, exactly; I rather think what you refer to is this; I forget where it was, Mr. Justice Willes or Mr. Baron Martin in some case had heard that a good deal of drink had been given to committee-men and to people who attended the different committees, and that he did not think it was intended to influence their votes, if it was only a reasonable quantity for the purpose, as he would then think that it did not show the intention. The other judges might not take exactly the same view; in some cases they have come to the conclusion that it did show intention; but there would not be difference as to the law, but rather as to its application to the facts.

12003. However, there is nothing certain about the matter; it depends upon the amount of refreshments that the judge might think the voters required under the circumstances?—It depends, according to my view, upon all the circumstances together. The question is as to the intention to influence the vote. It would be more likely than not that it was intended to influence the vote by the refreshment; but it is just probable that it was not. You must look at the quantity, the time, and the place, and all the circumstances, and then say, do you think, as a matter of fact, bonâ fide, that this was intended to influence the vote.

12004. The view taken being as to whether there is a corrupt object, and not as to whether the expenditure is lavish, or one that imposes a heavy expenditure upon the candidate?—Precisely so, the extent of the expenditure being only important according to the view that is taken of the Corrupt Practices Act. In the definition of "treating," the extent of the expenditure is evidence of intention, and of course it is very important as evidence of intention.

12005. According to the view taken of the law, at present, by the judges, a person may spend any sum of money, unless it shall be spent in a way that they think corrupt at the time of the election?—I should not vacate the seat unless that be so.

12006. Have you any opinion, from what you have observed, as to whether it might not be expedient to restrict the expense altogether of elections?—I think it would be very desirable, but I do not see my way to making it practicable.

12007. Have you considered at all what might be the effect of relieving the candidates altogether from any expenditure, and throwing it upon the district or upon the country?—No, nothing of that sort came before me so as to lead me to form any opinion upon it at all.

12008. But are you of opinion that while you allow the candidate to incur the expenditure of an election, there is really no practicable means of preventing any lavish or corrupt expenditure?—You cannot absolutely prevent corrupt expenditure, I think you do throw very considerable difficulty in his way, and I hope that by degrees it may come to be more and more difficult; but at present, you cannot practically prevent it perfectly. And there is another thing which should be remembered, that a judge cannot know anything about the matter except what is brought before him; and it does not always follow that the persons who impugn the election are willing to bring it before him; on only one occasion I had some suspicion, that the case was made purposely mild for fear I should report that the borough was bad.

12009. Then I understand you that the inquiries are very imperfect as to the real character of a place, seeing that you can only decide upon the facts that are submitted to you by the agents on each side?—Yes, they are necessarily imperfect on that account.

12010. Do you mean that unless a place was throughly corrupt and had been so for a length of time, you would not feel yourself entitled to report upon the character of that place?—I should not, except that there is a clause in the Act of Parliament which says that a judge may report to the House any matter which comes before his notice at the time of the election, which he thinks it is desirable that the House should know; and if there was a case made that satisfied me, not merely led me to suspect, but satisfied me that there was ground for thinking that the borough was corrupt, I should under that clause probably state to the Speaker that I thought it right that the House should be made aware of the fact, and leave the House to deal with the persons as they thought best.

12011. But your impression was, that in several cases, there was a much more general system of bribery or corruption in the place than had been submitted to you formally?—I came to the conclusion that I mentioned at Stafford; and in that case I specifically reported that there had been preparations for extensive corruption there, but, as I said before, owing to the merits of Alderman Pochin, they were not carried into effect; I did mention that, and I mentioned also, that there had been corruption at the former election; but, nowhere else was there any evidence to prove to me that such a thing had been in existence.

12012. You would not attach much importance, would you, to a candidate making a declaration of purity before he commenced to canvass, and urging upon his friends not to do what might be necessary for his election?—I never have tried a single case in which the candidates have not come come and have said that they had done that; I need not say that I do not attach very much importance to that profession.

12013. Did I understand you to say that you had but little evidence submitted before you of what is called undue influence used by people of property over persons dependent upon them?—Very little indeed; I mentioned the only case in which it was proved to my satisfaction, and that was only as to the influencing of three or four votes, which I struck off on the scrutiny at Oldham. In other cases it was alleged in all the petitions; but I think in every case it broke down, the evidence being very contemptible; in fact, the cases of intimidation might be fairly said to be frivolous and vexatious, all of them.

12014. May I ask you what would be the view taken by the judges of a kind of influence, of which we hear a great deal; such as a customer going to a shopkeeper, and saying, "You must vote for So-and-so, or I shall withdraw my custom"; or, "You must vote so-and-so, or else you cease to be my tenant"; what effect would that have in law?—I can refer you at once to what I said on the North Norfolk petition, if you will look at the shorthand writer's notes which have been printed in the Blue Book, you will find that I dealt with that expressly, and I can repeat it now. My own impression, and I believe it is the construction which was put on the law by both the other judges, is that although the thing itself is a perfectly lawful thing to do, such as a landlord choosing to say, "I will give notice to quit," to a tenant, or a master choosing to say to a servant, "I will no longer employ you," although it is perfectly lawful, yet if the master does it on account of the vote, it comes within the Act of Parliament, and would be undue influence, and is a threat of harm or loss, or an infliction of harm or loss on account of the vote. I think such a thing as a landlord giving notice to quit to a tenant, or a master dismissing a servant on account of his vote, would come within the Act, and would be undue influence within the definition of the Act; I have found a difficulty where a person who has been in the habit of having some custom at a shop, says, "I want you to vote for So-and-so," and vice versâ; but there it would come to be a question of degree, whether it was done to such an extent that you could fairly ask a jury to say, "This is a crime." I think that that ought to be considered within the Act also; but I do not think that a mere trifle would properly be so considered.

12015. Chairman.] If it were proved to have been done by an agent, would it unseat the Member?—Yes.

12016. Mr. Villiers.] I want to know your view of the case I was putting; when that is practised by persons not in the relation of agency to the candidates, persons who may be friendly to his views; but whom you cannot in any way look upon as agents?—The question of whether or no a person who is guilty of corrupt influence is an agent or not, is a separate question. If a landlord threatens his tenant, and says, "If you do not vote, I will turn you away," he is guilty of a misdemeanour, and the vote of the man which was procured under that coercion must be struck off upon a scrutiny, but the sitting Member would not be unseated for it, unless it were shown that the person who was guilty of undue influence stood in that relation which constitutes him an agent within the meaning of the Parliamentary Law.

12017. Then it is the general apprehension of the law, is it not, that if the person who influences the voter is not connected as an agent with the candidate, it is not illegal, or at least will not affect the seat of the candidate?—No, it is illegal; it subjects him to be tried for a misdemeanour, and fined and imprisoned; but, as I have already said, and as I dare say most honourable Members have experienced enough to know, people are not afraid of that.

12018. That which is familiar to everybody, and is known to be constant in practice, has not apparently been submitted to the judges upon late trials; but do I understand you now to say that it would not unseat a Member if it were proved to any extent that landlords or customers had gone to tenants or shopkeepers, and threatened them that if they did not vote for A. B., their friend, they would lose the advantage of their connection?—It would not go quite to the extent that you now put it, but at least very nearly so. But, as I have already said, I think there is a principle established in Parliamentary Election Law, that where any of those practices are carried to such an extent that you can say that the election is not a fair and a free one, then, although the corruption may not be brought home to the Member or his agents, it would avoid the election. But then the degree to which that must be proved in order to show that the election is not fair and free, must be very considerable. It is difficult to define, but it must be evidently very considerable.

12019. In fact, voters may hardly be free agents, from the influence used, and there may be a great deal of intimidation without its being brought before you upon such inquiries as you have lately conducted?—There might be, certainly; the only case in which there was intimidation in the sense which we are speaking of, where it was made a real subject of inquiry, was in the Norfolk case, and there it was investigated; but, although they had nearly five months to get the case up, and had spared no expense, it came to nothing whatever. There was a great deal made of the influence that landlords have over their tenants, but of landlords coercing unwilling tenants, they utterly failed to bring any evidence before me.

12020. In all cases where there has been an attempt to prove intimidation, there must always be agency, must there not, to serve any purpose?—It would have been necessary to serve the purpose in such cases, to establish the agency of the offender. There was a decision of Mr. Justice Willes, at Westbury, which I think was a perfectly right one; which was in substance this, that where a particular manufacturer had been asked by the sitting Member or the sitting Member's canvassing agent, to canvass his men in his manufactory for him, and had been, in fact, entrusted to be the person to manage for him, and had been guilty of oppression and tyranny in the the course of it, Mr. Justice Willes held, and, I think, perfectly rightly, that he had been made agent for the purpose of obtaining votes in that particular manufactory, and having been guilty of oppression and undue influence in the course of doing it, the seat was vacated.

12021. That was a case of agency; but have you any suggestion to make to the Committee by which treating and intimidation by independent persons, being only partisans, could be prevented under under the present law?—No; I do not see how you could do it better than you can now.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869

12022. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] With regard to treating, do you think it would be advisable to alter the law so as to make the seat void if any treating was proved?—If I understand you to mean any giving away gratis of meat or drink, with intention, I fear that that would frequently operate with excessive harshness. The very first thing that I tried at Bewdley, in the first case, before they got to the real matter, they showed that when the candidates came there first, they went to a certain election agent; and the election agent had got together a number of people to stand at his door, and to shout as he passed, and the election agent's wife gave them bread and cheese and beer, which they eat and drank. There the agency might not have been made out completely at the time, but it came out afterwards; but then, if you were to lay down the rule that giving meat and drink, though without the intention to influence, was to upset the election, the question would be whether you would upset the election because of this indiscreet act. I have no hesitation in saying that the giving of bread and cheese and beer at that time was not with the intention of influencing the voters. It was not of such an extent as led me to the conclusion that it was, although afterwards it clearly enough was so.

12023. Does not the law, in requiring the proof of corrupt intention, leave a very large loophole to great expenditure in treating?—No doubt it does; I do not see how you can help it. You must either have a rigid rule that the giving of any meat or drink shall upset an election, which would frequently work very harshly, or you must leave the question of intention to be determined by some tribunal or other. I do not see that you have any alternative.

12025. Would it be held that if a landlord had been on the committee of a candidate, or had acted with him and canvassed, he would be accounted an agent?—That would be a question, I apprehend, of the extent to which he had acted. I came to the conclusion in the Norfolk case, that it was not even a case of intimidation, but there was a Mr. Scott-Chad, a considerable proprietor there, who had been asked to be a member of the committee for the sitting Member, but refused to do so, but he said he would ask his own tenants, and answer for them, and he did bring all his own tenants up. There was not the slightest imputation that he had used any intimidation. He seemed to be a very popular landlord, and they all came without any intimidation; it was not needed; but he had given meat and drink to them, which was said to be treating; I considered the case very fully, and following the same rule which Mr. Justice Willes had done in the Westbury case, I came to the conclusion that if any corrupt practice had been brought home to Mr. Scott-Chad he had been constituted an agent as far as regarded his own tenants; but I came to the conclusion that there was no corruption, so that of course it became immaterial.

12026. In that case you would have concluded that the mere fact of his undertaking the canvass of his own tenants would have constituted him an agent to that extent?—The mere fact of his being requested and authorised to do so.

12027. I suppose that anyone who would take so active a part in an election as to coerce, or unduly influence, anyone, would be constituted an agent under that holding, would he not?—No, hardly so far as that; it would be a question of degree, of more or less. The first case where I had to consider carefully the law of agency, was in the Staleybridge case, where this much was proved, and indeed not disputed, with regard to a very subordinate member of a volunteer committee. There were several volunteer committees of workmen who were acting together, and there was a sort of head man of one of the committees who had a brother at Manchester who would probably come over and vote if they would send for him. The headman said, "That it was not worth while to send for one voter;" but later on there came another person living in Manchester, who had a vote, upon which he said, "Now, since there are two of you, I daresay it is worth while, and my nephew, probably, has promised to lend us his cart;" those two men, who were working men, went off in a cart to fetch the two people from Manchester to vote, so that they were clearly requested to go and get those votes, and so far that would not be agency, their trying to bring over their two friends to vote. But the two men said, "We cannot leave our work and lose our day's pay for the purpose of voting;" whereupon the volunteers took upon themselves to say, "Oh, of course Mr. Sidebottom, the sitting Member, will make it good to you." The men were not quite satisfied with that, and at last the others promised distinctly and said, "Mr. Sidebottom shall make good your day's wages if you will come and vote," That was clearly bribery, but then came the question, is Mr. Sidebottom to lose his seat because this under deputy agent, as I may call him, has committed such an act of bribery as that? After considering the matter a great deal, I thought I could not bring it within the spirit of what was called agency; so that it is not merely a question whether a man in so acting he goes so far as to do a corrupt act; it must be a question of more difficulty than that.

12028. I think the Norfolk election was the only county election that was tried upon petition?—The only one that I tried.

12029. Was there much evidence upon that petition given as to any great extent of paid agency in the county?—No, I do not think there was; it did not come out that there was any; it was not relied upon. I think that the petition was against the sitting Members; and except in the Yarmouth district, which was peculiar, I think the committees were all what we may call volunteers. I said, as far as I could observe, that it was more a case in which the parson of the parish, naturally enough, thinking the Church was in danger, and the squire, naturally enough, thinking that he was the great man, were acting in each particular parish as a sort of committee. I do not think there was much paid agency there.

12030. In any petitions which you tried, did any cases come before you in which it had been the custom in the constituency for the Members after their election to wait or to put off paying the expenses of the election until perhaps the next election came round?—No case of that sort came before me. Of course I heard of such things, things, and for aught I know to the contrary, such things may have happened, but there was no case in which any evidence led me to think that that was the state of things in any of those places.

12031. In any place in which that had become the custom, would it not rather interfere with your proposal as to returning the expenses?—No; of course it would be difficult; but that is one of the things that would be prevented by my proposal, and one of my objects is to prevent it. My proposal is that a candidate shall return all that he or his agents may have become liable for, and if he do not, it shall be a ground for unseating him. If he postponed the payment until after the next election, and any of those who were seeking to attack his seat could find out that he had incurred an expenditure in such and such a case, and it had not been returned, that would be enough to unseat him.

12033. Mr. Fawcett.] Have you any suggestion to make with regard to a Member who has been unseated, not sitting again for a certain time?—No; I think that, as it stands, as far as I can perceive, it is very fairly done.

12034. You would not make the law more harsh?—No, I do not think I would. There is a clause in the late Act, which says, that any Member who personally retains as his agent a person who has been scheduled, shall lose his seat; but it is carefully worded, so as to make it personal. The only case in which that was brought before me at all, was the Norfolk case, in which there was no doubt that one of the persons who had been scheduled at Yarmouth was employed as an agent; he proposed or seconded Sir Edmund Lacon at the election. He was a gentleman of respectability and influence in the town, and they got his influence, and he did act as chairman to one of Sir Edmund Lacon's committees, so as to be within the spirit of this enactment. But then that enactment is very carefully worded, and it carefully requires that it should be personally brought home to the Member, and Sir Edmund Lacon contrived to be as ignorant of the fact that this gentleman had sat upon his committee, as he had formerly been ignorant that he had spent 1,000 l. for him.

12035. Does not the case where agency is proved, imply to your mind, more or less, the consent of the candidate to the act of his agent?—No, not by any means. I have no doubt that in a great many cases there is really consent, though it may be intentionally kept back. I believe that very often a man spends money, knowing right well that the Member would not permit him to lose the money, although he will take care not to say so; but the man may be an agent, without any intention of that sort on the part of the Member.

12036. Considering that sometimes, as has occurred in these election trials, a man is turned out through acts of intimidation committed by his agent, and he immediately goes, and stands for another place, would it not be desirable to give some option to the judge to report that, and for the judge to express in his decision whether the acts were done with the consent of the candidate, or not?—If you mean to extend what I expressed is the law as to bribery, intimidation, and other things, there would be no possible harm in that, but I do not think it would do very much good. I do not think it would be harsh to say that where intimidation, or undue influence, or treating, was done by the personal instigation or consent of the Member, he should not sit at all for any other place during that Session.

12037. Have you any suggestion to make as to the desirability of limiting, or altogether forbidding, the number of paid agents who should be employed by a candidate?—I do not see how it would be practicable to enforce it; I think myself that paid agents are a nuisance, and an evil, and I would wish that they were done away with; but I strongly suspect that a great deal of the lavish expenditure which people naturally assume has gone in corruption is intercepted by paid agents; I think it is highly probable that where a candidate had expended some 1,700 l. or 1,800 l. on an election, it will be found that where 100 l. went in corrupt payment, many hundred pounds were intercepted by the canvassers and other paid agents.

12038. Do you think that any practical evils would result from altogether forbidding paid agents?—I have hardly considered that point.

12039. It has not struck you that it would interfere with the due conduct, of an election to forbid the employment of paid agents?—No; I have really not considered that question enough to give an answer that is worth having.

12040. You said just now that if you forbade treating altogether, it might act with great harshness, and in order to illustrate your argument you quoted the case of Bewdley, in which bread and drink were distributed by the wife of the agent; do you consider that there would have been anything harsh if the candidate had lost his seat through that act, supposing that the law had been well known?—I think it would be a little harsh, I must acknowledge, if a candidate were to loose his seat simply because, when he had been canvassing some man, and the man pressed him for something to drink, and he had given him a shilling, I think the candidate, and certainly all the candidate's supporters, would say that it was very harsh.

12041. Even if the law was well known that it was illegal?—Even if it were, they could not reasonably blame the judge for putting it in force, but they would blame the law I am sure.

12042. Do you not think that unless something like that is done, there will probably be a great deal of money spent in treating which does not come under the category of corrupt treating?—More or less there must be; and a great deal in that case must depend upon the view which the judge takes of what is sufficient evidence of intention.

12043. I think you laid it down as the law, that any money corruptly spent in treating, either before, during, or after an election, vacates the seat?—Yes, those are the words of the Act, it is not my law.

12044. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Have you given your attention to the expenses of prosecuting or of defending a seat under the present system?

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

system?—No; I know that they must be very considerable, but I have no knowledge of what they are. I have no opinion, and no means of forming an opinion, upon the subject, except that they must be heavy.

12045. Under the rules which are framed by the judges, I believe it is necessary that the person obtaining a seat shall furnish particulars within so many days of the day of trial, but those particulars are of a vague character usually, are they not?—They have proved in practice so. The rules have the force of an Act of Parliament, but the practice which we establish under them may be varied. I must, however, admit that they have proved, to a very considerable extent, illusory. I endeavoured to check that in one instance. In the Hereford case, where the particulars would have given no information at all, I refused to give the petitioner his costs upon that ground. I know nothing else that can be done to check it.

12046. I believe those particulars, such as they are, are only delivered four or five days before the trial?—Yes; one set of particulars were, I think, six days before, and the other particulars for bribery, and so forth, were limited, I think, to four days before the trial.

12047. The result is, that a person who has to defend a seat must employ a very large number of agents, and be prepared to rebut any statement that may be made upon the strength of rumours that may be circulating through a large constituency, and the time that elapses between the delivery of particulars and the day of trial in a large constituency, will not permit him to defend the seat in the way in which he would defend an action at common law?—That, no doubt, to some extent, is the case. You are aware that, formerly, the practice in Election Committees was, that there was no information at all given, and the first time that anything was known about it was when the counsel got up to make his speech. I had myself a very strong feeling, and from the tone of your question you share in it, that it was not fair, and that we ought to give them more notice. Then, on the other hand, very strong representations were made to us when we were considering the question, that if we gave too much notice beforehand, the people who were necessarily relied upon as witnesses were persons who were very liable to be got at, and if you let it be known too long before, you would have no evidence, and the fixing it at four days, which was what was done, was a compromise between those two opinions. I think, as far as my own experience has gone, I have not seen any cases that have led me to the conclusion that witnesses were fetched away. I have not found that that evil existed.

12048. In fact, your experience has gone to show that the danger which was apprehended, and which prevents the ordinary custom in matters of law from being applied to the trial of petitions, does not exist?—I think so; at the same time I should say, in candour also, that I have not found the benefit to arise from giving particulars which I should hope for, for I am afraid Parliamentary agents prove too strong for us in that way; they contrive to give particulars which do not give very much information.

12049. Mr. Locke.] The analogy is hardly clear, is it, between an action at law, as it is conducted, and a petition as to giving information?—The analogy would not be in all actions at law, because there is generally an isolated issue; but in the cases where you would give particulars, such as the set-off of a debt, the analogy is pretty close. You want to know what persons are asserted to have been committing bribery in the other case; you want to know what sums have been asserted to be spent.

12050. But you do not give any information as to the witnesses that you are going to call?—No; nor do you do that under any rules that we have established with regard to Parliamentary elections.

12051. I understand that the rule which you lay down is, that the names shall be given of the particular persons whom you allege to have been bribed?—Yes. What we have generally required is this: that the particulars delivered shall state who it is that you assert to have been bribed, and, as far as practicable, who it is that you assert to have bribed them, and where and when; and with regard to treating, whom you assert to have been treated, and the time and the place where such treating is alleged to have taken place.

12052. That would hardly appear in any proceeding in a court of law?—Yes, it would, I think. If the judge, in ordering the particulars, so worded it, it would; he, of course, discriminates.

12053. I think you said your attention had not been called to municipal elections?—No, it has not.

12054. Do you think that a system might be adopted similar to that which exists at the present time in the City of London, that an inquiry should be made by somebody belonging to the municipality itself, as to corrupt practices at an election for the town council?—I was not aware that there was such a practice in the City of London. I must only say that my attention has never been called to the matter; and I can give no opinion upon it that is worth having.

12055. Are you not aware that the court of aldermen exercise that power?—No, I was not aware of that.

12056. Do you think that some tribunal, such as the justices, for instance, in a borough, might have the power of inquiring?—I doubt their determining it very impartially; but I really know nothing about it; it is mere speculation upon my part.

12057. At the present time there is very great inconvenience, is there not, in arriving at any mode of setting the matter right where there has been corruption in municipal elections?—Yes, of course, there must be.

12058. And no remedy has suggested itself to you?—No, I have not had my attention called to it.

12059. I think you said that in the case which you had decided no question arose as to bribery or treating at municipal elections, as affecting the Parliamentary elections?—It did arise to this extent, that there was alleged bribery or treating at the municipal elections for Parliamentary purposes; but the defence was, that as far as there was any bribery or treating it was for municipal purposes, and, of course, it was a question, and it must be in all such cases a question. If you buy a man's vote for the municipal election, and the Parliamentary election is coming on at the same time, is it not an understood part of the bargain that where you buy a yellow vote at the municipal election, that yellow vote at the Parliamentary menary election is to be thrown into the bargaining —Of course, that is a question of fact.

12060. Have you not had any cases of that description?—I think not exactly in that last shape. There was something little like it alleged at Hastings, but they failed to show that there was any corruption at the municipal election there, so that it came to nothing.

12061. Mr. James.] Will you kindly state to the Committee what was your decision in the second Bewdley case, as to voters who had been reported guilty of bribery with regard to their right to vote?—There was but a small number of them; but I thought upon the reading of the Statute, that the scheduling of them by the election judge was not within the terms of the Statute, as he had not had an opportunity of being heard. That was the conclusion which I came to; but I thought that that was a question which, if it turned the scale alone, ought to be submitted to the Court of Common Pleas with regard to voters being allowed to vote who had been scheduled by myself on the former occasion. There was a small majority, I forget on which side, and I said if it turned out that they turned the scale I would reserve the question for the Court of Common Pleas. It did not turn out that they turned the scale, therefore the question was never decided and never brought before the Court of Common Pleas.

12062. Did your judgment in any way turn upon the question whether the voter had or had not been examined as a witness, or upon the fact that he could not be heard in defence of his vote by cross-examination or pleading?—My judgment did not turn upon that; but the question arose in this way. There was one voter who had been scheduled by me who had not been called as a witness at the former inquiry, and when counsel were raising their objections at the scrutiny and came to this man, he said since he was not called as a witness, and therefore was not in any sense heard, "I will not raise a question as to him; it will only apply to those who are actually witnesses before you"; and he remained unobjected to. That was no part of my judgment; of course that would be a stronger case than the one in which I actually decided, namely, that those who had been called as witnesses were not in my judgment disqualified; but that I reserved for the Court of Common Pleas, and no doubt whatever, after the next registration of the revising barristers, it will be brought before the Court of Common Pleas in one shape or another, and then it will be known what the law really is.

12063. Mr. Hunt.] The question must be raised, must it not, in the registration court before it can come before the Court of Common Pleas?—No doubt it must be raised. The revising barristers may possibly decide in different ways; but you may be sure it will be brought before the Court of Common Pleas from one or the other of them so as to decide the question.

12064. Mr. James.] Supposing that at the time of sending in the account a candidate and his agent have no knowledge of the debt which has been incurred by a qualified agent, and after the legal period of sending in their accounts that a claim springs up, if the candidate pays it, what course would you then suggest should be taken?—I have stated what my special act would be; it would be that if they wilfully kept it back.

12065. But in the case supposed, there was no keeping back; they never knew of it?—I have a difficulty in seeing how a debt which was incurred by a duly qualified agent can come not to be returned unless it was wilfully kept back by his agent or unless he bonâ fide forgot it; and in that case it would not be wilfully done.

12066. Take for instance, a debt incurred by a ward manager who may be an agent, but not an agent for election expenses, the agent or the candidate may have no knowledge of that debt having been incurred by the ward manager; because no money would be paid, and he says nothing about it until two months after the election, and it then comes forth. The candidate and his election agent might truly say that they never had incurred that debt?—I think in that case it would not have been a wilful keeping of it back.

12067. Would not your view be limited in what you call wilfully keeping back, to a certain class of agents?—When I said wilfully kept back by an agent, I meant by such an agent as would by any other corrupt act have upset the election. I do not mean in the very conceivable case, that a candidate's groom would be his agent for the purpose of buying corn; if he were to go and buy a quantity of corn for election purposes, that that should upset the election.

12068. I have taken one instance of a ward manager who may be an agent for bribery; if he bribes, probably he would be a qualified agent; but, on the other hand, no money being authorised by the candidate to be paid through his hands, and no special instructions as to incurring debts, yet he may incur that debt so as to make the candidate liable at law; would that ward manager's default to make known the debt, be a ground for disqualification?—I think the ward manager, though he would be an agent, as you describe him, to upset the election by a corrupt practice, would hardly be an agent to bind the candidate to a debt at law. If you merely mean this, that where the candidate, and the candidate's people, do not wilfully keep it back, I think it should not bind him; but I think that where the candidate afterwards discovers a thing, and ratifies it, it would be very much the same as if he had known it before; but the subsequent discovery and ratification would not operate back to say that it was a default to tell it at the time when he was in ignorance of the wilful default.

12069. I am putting the case of a wilful payment by a candidate of a debt which he did not know of (or else he would naturally have paid it) at the time when he sent in the account?—That could only be a matter of evidence; one would not say that it should be conclusive one way or the other.

12070. Do you see any objection to making the test of treating rather a middle course between the two propositions; for instance, if the drink or food which was given, would not have been given except it had been for the election taking place; would not that be a middle course, and that the treating so given, because the election was taking place, should disqualify the Member?—If you were to take that as the test, it would include a great many things which it was never meant to apply to. If a candidate were to ask his sons, who were voters, to come and stay with him and have a day's shooting before you go away; you could not say that that meat and drink to the sons never would have been given but for the election, and I think you would pause before you would upset an election for that.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

12071. Any person may ask another to come and have a day's shooting with him, but of course that would not affect the election; but in the case you have put, the case of the wife of an agent, she may have given meat and drink if there had not been an election, but directly you find the fact that it was given, because of the election which was taking place, would you not hold that it was given for the purpose of corrupting the vote, and why should not that disqualify?—I will give you an instance of what actually did occur, and which, as I understand, will answer your question. It appeared in the Norfolk election, and in a dozen different instances, that something of this sort took place. The parson of the parish had gone canvassing through the parish, and had got some eight or nine voters, and he agreed with some large farmer, "You shall bring your cart, and we will carry the parishioners together to the polling place to-morrow; I will start with you;" and the clergyman, when the people came in the morning, in a great many instances, gave them some breakfast. In one case I think it was tea which the parson's wife poured out and gave to them, but more generally it was bread and cheese and beer that they drank together, in the morning while they were waiting. It would have been a question of fact, would it have been given if they had been going to a flower show, or was it merely given because there was an election? If I had thought that it was given especially to produce an influence upon them, because they were going to the election, I should probably have said that it was corrupt treating, and might very possibly have come to the conclusion that the intention was wrong. I held that it was really very much upon the same principle as you put it, that it was the sort of thing that might be done for any gathering.

12072. I think you will see that there is a difference between meat and drink being given because an election is taking place, and being given expressly in order to obtain a voter's vote at the election?—No doubt; but it is rather difficult to draw the line, it would be introducing another subtlety into the law which it is desirable to have as clear as you can.

12073. Mr. Whitbread.] I want to ask you a question with regard to this return of expenses; it divides itself into two heads, the delay in the return of the election expenses, and not returning them at all; do you think that there would be any hardship in an Act which should say that any payment made on account of an election by a candidate, or his authorised agents, and not included in the return, or in a supplementary return, should void the election?—Practically, I think it would be very nearly what I propose, the practical difficulty would be to detect the fact that there had been a payment made which was not returned.

12074. As far as I gather from your suggestion your plan would be this, that the time for petitioning should be extended so as to include the limit of time allowed for returning the expenses?—To that extent.

12075. And that any of those expenses would then form part of the evidence to be adduced upon the petition?—That was one part of my proposition, but I also propose to add to it, that if the return was wilfully imperfect in any way, if there was any expense either paid or incurred which was wilfully kept back from the return, that alone should be a ground for avoiding the seat.

12076. Have you observed that where a new election followed upon the unseating of a Member or Members for bribery or corrupt practices, it has very generally followed that Members upon the same side of politics are elected for that place by still larger majorities?—I have had so little experience that I cannot say, it has happened that the cases that I myself unseated, not quite in that way. In the case of Hereford, Members of the same politics were returned by a larger majority. In another case, Bewdley, a Member of the same politics was returned by a smaller majority; and in the third case at Stafford, the election changed the return; one was for bribery, and the other was for intimidation. I suppose the effect of your question was that the corrupt voters resented the election being upset on account of corruption.

12077. Not only the corrupt voters, but the general feeling of the town?—I cannot say.

12079. Have you formed any opinion as to whether it would be desirable to prohibit the use of public-houses for committee-rooms?—I think it would be very desirable, but rather impracticable. It would be a very good thing if it could be done, but I do not see how it could be enforced. I do not see my way to any scheme which I could suggest to the Committee by which you could hinder it. I agree that it is a very desirable object.

12080. Supposing you made it a corrupt act to hold a committee-room in a public-house, would that do?—If you make it to vacate the election, then the principal objection to it would be the great danger of having people turned out for some innocent act. But, however, it would be a very desirable thing indeed that there should be as little of the business of elections done in public-houses as possible.

12081. You do no not see the force of the argument that it would be impossible to procure other places to hold committee-rooms in, do you?—I confess that, as far as I can see, I do not think there is any great object or necessity for having so many committee-rooms as people seem to think. In a country place I should imagine there may be an object in having committee-rooms scattered over the country as they are, although there they do not seem to have them; but in a town I cannot see the object of having so many committee-rooms.

12082. Having had the experience of 11 trials, should you desire to have any assistance in the direction of determining matters of fact upon those trials?—It would be an excessive relief to me to have it, if any system could be devised by which two respectable laymen, I mean laymen, as distinguished from lawyers, might sit with the election judge in the same sort of way as the two

Elder

Elder Brethren of the Trinity House sit with the Judge of the Admiralty Court upon maritime questions; no doubt it would be a very superior tribunal, but I do not know where you would get your two assessors.

12083. Chairman.] Two Members of the House of Commons, for instance?—If they would come, no doubt it would greatly improve the tribunal, and be an immense relief to me. The odium and disagreeableness of thinking over the evidence, and saying, "Now, this is evidence upon which no one can say that I am wrong, if I conclude that it is corrupt; and no one can say that I am wrong, if I conclude that it is not; and what shall I do?" The necessity, I say, of doing that all alone is one of the most disagreeable things imaginable; and it would be an immense relief to have two respectable men to whom one could say, "What do you think about it?"

12084. That would be infinitely preferable, would it not, to any form of having a jury?—I think a jury would be quite impossible; you never could get an impartial jury; and that is one reason, which I think is quite enough.

12085. Mr. Brand.] Have you ever considered whether it would be desirable to appoint a public prosecutor to watch the proceedings at election trials on behalf of the public?—I have thought that it would be very desirable, but I have always felt that the thing would be impracticable, for this reason, that a public prosecutor would be supposed, whether rightly or wrongly, to be biassed; I do not think you would ever be able to get a public prosecutor in election matters who would not be supposed to be a partisan of the one side or the other, although I dare say you might get one who was not really so.

12086. Setting aside the question of bias, you think it would be very desirable?—I think it would; it would remove one very considerable imperfection in election petitions at present, namely, that you can only get the evidence which the party chooses to produce.

12087. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to having persons to sit with the judge to try the matter, would you prefer having laymen to lawyers?—Yes, I think so. What I want to have is to supply what a jury would supply in an ordinary case, namely, a knowledge of the manners and customs of the people, and to know how much of this is a probable story, and how much of it is not a probable story. I consider that two country gentlemen would be able to tell that much better than two of the most acute lawyers in London. If you brought down two barristers to sit along with the judge, you only supply him with what he has himself, and not with what he really wants.

12088. Do you not think that those two laymen would be inclined to throw the responsibility upon the judge in every case?—No doubt, to a very great extent, they would; and it would be rather desirable, and an immense relief where the judge told them the law was so-and-so, that he should influence them; but where it is a question of fact upon the evidence, and he says to them, the point is whether you think that so much has been made out, I think that laymen would be as good, probably, in answering that question to the judge as the judge himself would be; and no doubt their opinions would influence him very much; but where it was not a question of fact, but a question of law, about which there was any difference of opinion, I should think they would say, "The judge is right, and we are wrong, and we will leave it to the judge."

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

12089. Have you had any difficulty yourself in coming to a decision upon questions of fact?—Frequently I felt that it was very doubtful, and when I have thought that the case has not been sufficiently made out for me to act upon it, I have acted upon the principle that the matter has not been made out, and therefore I leave things as they are.

12090. Have you been able to ascertain whether the expenses of trials before a judge have been greater or less than before Committees?—I have no knowledge of that whatever. I do not know what the expenses before Committees were, and I do not know what the expenses before us have been.

12091. Do you agree with Mr. Baron Martin that the apprehensions of greater strictness with regard to bribery before the judges led to a diminution of corruption at the last election?—I saw two or three cases where there was an indication that they had been frightened at the thought of the new tribunal, but not much; I do not think there was very much came before me to lead me to form an opinion upon it. I think it is very probable that it was so, but I cannot say that it was so proved.

12092. With regard to having a person in the position of the Queen's Proctor when an election petition was going on, to follow up any indications of bribery that might transpire on behalf of the public, do you think it might be possible to avoid partiality by having two persons put in that position, one on one side of politics, and the other on the other?—I do not think, as a general rule, that it is judicious to divide responsibility. You had better have one person responsible; but I fear there would be very great practical difficulty in that. If you could have a proper independent inquiry of that sort, it would be a good thing; but I should think there is great difficulty in it.

12093. Have you considered the question as to whether it is fair to throw upon the losing candidate the expenses of the petition?—The rule which I have acted upon, as a general rule, has always been to say that the cost should await the event. I think it is like ordinary litigation.

12094. Have you thought whether the expenses of petitioning ought to fall upon the party in the contest, or whether they ought to fall upon the public?—I suppose that, if you threw them upon the public, the danger would be that they would be rather without stint and very lavish.

12095. Do you think it right that a petition should be treated as a suit between two private parties?—That very much involves the other question of the Queen's Proctor or public prosecutor. If it is to be managed as a suit between two private parties, and the petition is left to be managed by them, I think it is but reasonable that it should be at their cost. If it is to be treated as a public inquiry, then the management of it, as well as the expense, should be taken by the public.

12096. Do you think it would be possible to let one of the parties at the contest make out a primâ facie ground of proceeding, and then to let some public officer take the matter up, supposing that a primâ facie ground was made out?—I should think it would be difficult; but I have not not considered that enough to give an opinion which is worth anything.

Sir C. Blackburn, Knt.

9 July 1869.

12097. Did you find that much perjury was committed in the cases that came before you?—A good deal. There were a good many witnesses whom I did not believe, and who, I thought, were wilfully stating what was not true; but I do not know that there was very much more than I have seen in other trials.

12098. Mr. Whitbread.] I suppose that with the view of arriving at the truth, you consider that it is of great importance that the trial should be on the spot?—It gives very considerable advantages.

12099. There was an answer of Mr. Justice Willes, I think, in which he rather doubted whether, after a petition had once been tried, and judgment had been delivered, supposing that a corrupt payment were made, it would be possible to petition over again; do you share that doubt?—I saw that in his evidence, and I was inclined to agree with him; but, like him, I say that that is a difficult question, arising upon the construction of the Act; and when it arises, I would like to hear it argued and decided. My impression at present agrees with that of Mr. Justice Willes, that where it was a fresh payment, a corrupt payment for the first time made after the petition, you might petition again.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. FRANCIS TAYLOR, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Taylor.
13 July 1869.

12100. Mr. Leatham.] HAVE you had much experience in elections?—Yes, I have been connected with elections in Manchester and Salford, more or less intimately, since the Reform Act of 1832; in fact, since Manchester and Salford have had Members.

12101. Did you take an active part in making the arrangements for the test ballot in Manchester?—I was chairman of the office committee of the united Liberal party; that is, a sub-committee of the general executive, which had the management of the last two general elections, and the management of the ballot subsequently.

12102. That was a preliminary ballot, was it not, to test the comparative claims of two candidates of the same politics upon the Liberal portion of the constituency, in case a vacancy had occurred in the representation?—It was thought probable that a vacancy might occur in the representation, and a considerable number of the party were of opinion that Mr. Ernest Jones, as the defeated candidate, was the proper person. A number of others, an influential section of the party, thought otherwise, and it was ultimately determined to go to a ballot, as between Mr. Ernest Jones and Mr. Milner Gibson.

12103. Was there a good deal of excitement in the city at that time, in consequence of that contest?—No, there was not much excitement during the ballot.

12104. I mean was there much excitement in the public mind with reference to the contest?—Yes, certainly, personal feeling was very strong as between the two sections of the party, but the excitement at the general election was very great indeed during the polling.

12105. Speaking of the test ballot, I asked you whether there was much excitement in the public mind as to the probable results of that ballot?—Yes, certainly.

12106. But the ballot itself was conducted with perfect order, was it not?—With perfect order and regularity; in fact, the polling booths during the whole of that ballot were as quiet and orderly as this room is at the present time.

12107. What plan of ballot did you adopt?—We adopted the plan in use in the Colony of Victoria, the Australian plan. We considered a great many plans; in fact, we went into it with the view of affording a test of the working of the Australian ballot on a large scale in this country, and we determined that all our arrangements should be made exactly as the arrangements would have to be made for a real election, and we went to very considerable expense in consequence.

12108. What precautions did you take against the use of forged voting cards?—Had there been time we should have had a water-mark in the cards, but as we had not sufficient time to have a water-mark upon the cards we had a die cut, which I will show the Committee presently, which was known to none other than myself as chairman of the committee and the person who executed it, and every card was stamped with this die, and no other cards were used; and as it would take probably from 10 days to a fortnight to cut a die such as this, it would be exceedingly improbable that it could be forged.

12109. Did you give any instructions to the voters?—We issued a circular to the electors, which, perhaps, I may be allowed to hand in to the Committee, giving a description of the plan of voting, and also a drawing of the ballot-room (handing the same to the Chairman); and in addition to that circular, this voting paper was enclosed (delivering in the same). The Committee will observe that on that paper which we call the voting paper, the name of the voter, his number on the register, and the place at which he was to vote, are given. It certainly, however, is not in the strict sense of the term a voting paper, it simply answers the purpose of the ordinary voting card which is now sent to every registered elector to instruct him where to vote, and also to facilitate reference to his number on the register when he presents himself at the polling booth.

12110. The Committee have been informed that the voters were required to sign this paper; is that so?—No, certainly not. When the voter presented that paper to the returning officer he had no further connection with it at all; he was not called upon to sign it; it was simply to enable the returning officer to turn at once to his number to see whether he was entitled to vote, and on his claim being ascertained he received a voting card in exchange.

12111. If the circular was not produced, was the vote rejected?—If the circular was not produced, the vote was not rejected; but the returning officer and the representatives of the candidates examined the man very closely as to his identity; but the vote was taken.

12112. When the voter presented himself after receiving his voting card, what was the course pursued?—When the voter presented himself, he gave his circular to the returning officer, and if his name was duly registered, and he was entitled to vote as being a voter for the Liberal party at the previous election (because the voting was confined to the Members of the Liberal party), he then received a voting card, a copy of which I will hand to the Committee (delivering in the same).

12113. What did he do with this card?—He took it into one of the recesses; each booth had five recesses, similar to the recesses in this room, and he marked off the name of the person for whom he did not vote.

12114. Did he deposit the card himself in the ballot-box?—The ballot-box was placed immediately in front of the returning officer and the representatives of the candidates, and the voter, after depositing the card in an envelope, put it in the ballot-box.

12115. What was the special object of using an envelope?—To guard against the possibility of two cards being put into the ballot-box by one voter. If you have a water-mark or a die on a special card, the risk of a person putting in two cards is exceedingly small; but still some persons thought that it was very possible that that might be done as they had never had any experience of the ballot, and knew nothing of the nature of the die that was to be used; and as an additional precaution we used the envelope, but the envelope was no essential part of the plan.

12116. Was any voter allowed to carry the card out of the booth?—Certainly not. Positive instructions, both printed and verbal, were given to the returning officers, not on any account whatever to allow a card to be carried out of the polling booth, and the policeman in charge of the booth would instantly have stopped any voter leaving the room with his card, and would have demanded it.

12117. What number of persons were entitled to vote?—As I said before, the ballot was to determine the Liberal candidate, and therefore the voting was confined to those who had voted for the united Liberal party. The total number of persons entitled to vote on that ground was 18,589; and that number of circulars, a copy of which I have put in, were sent out.

12118. What number of persons actually voted?—The total number of persons who voted was 11,475, or 62 per cent. of the whole number entitled to vote; 80 cards were rejected as informal, and 1,500 circulars were returned through the Dead Letter Office, leaving about 5,500, or 32½ per cent. who did not vote.

12119. Have you formed any opinion as to why so great a proportion of the voters did not vote?—If it had been an ordinary election, the proportion who voted would have been a very fair one, and it would be regarded as a very fair proportion in any borough in the kingdom, but I have no doubt that a large number of persons entitled to vote, both friends of Mr. Ernest Jones, and friends of Mr. Milner Gibson, abstained from voting because they did not wish to be committed to support the result of the ballot in case an election took place upon it.

12120. Do you think that those were opponents to the ballot?—No, not opponents of the ballot at all, but many persons thought thus: if we vote in this ballot, and an election takes place in consequence of it, we must support the successful candidate. Many friends of Mr. Ernest Jones thought that they might be committed to support Mr. Milner Gibson, if he was the successful candidate, and vice versâ, and as they wished to be left perfectly free, they did not vote; many persons expressed that opinion to me.

12121. It has been told the Committee that the higher class of voters refrained from voting, is that correct?—No; that is a mistake altogether; and I will give the Committee the statistics of the voting in the different wards, in order to show that it is a mistake. We have 17 wards in Manchester, and the voting in the different wards varied from 54 per cent. to 68 per cent.; the lowest, 54 per cent., was the poorest ward in Manchester, which is composed exclusively of the lower section of the working classes, and the highest, 68 per cent., was in a ward where the classes are about equal, and the next, 67 per cent., was in a ward where they are all the higher class of voters, large shopkeepers and professional men.

12122. Is that the Exchange Ward?—That is the ward close to the Exchange, St. Ann's Ward, containing St. Ann's Square; but in the eight purely working class wards, the per-centages were, one 54 per cent., two 58 per cent., two 61 per cent., one 62 per cent., one 63 per cent., and one 64 per cent. In the five mixed wards, where the classes are about equal, two were 57 per cent., one 62 per cent., one 64 per cent., and one 68 per cent.; and in the four upper and middle-class wards, they were 62 per cent., 63 per cent., 65 per cent., and 67 per cent., so that in the higher class wards, the average per centage is considerably more than in the lower class wards.

12123. Did the number of cards used, unused, and rejected, balance the number originally sent out?—Each returning officer was debited with a certain number of cards delivered out to him; and each evening he was required to fill up a form, of which I will hand a copy to the Chairman, showing the number of cards that he had received in the morning, and the number remaining unused; and the balance, of course, was supposed to be the number of cards in the ballot-box (handing in the same). That return he was instructed to deposit in the ballot-box before it was sealed up. When the box was opened the number of envelopes were counted, and checked off by that return, in order to see that the number corresponded. In every case they agreed exactly. At the close of the poll the votes were counted by four persons appointed as returning officers, of whom I was one, and the unused cards delivered up by the returning officers were found to balance within eight; and doubtless we could have traced those eight cards had the matter been gone into at once. I only had the exact balance in each ward taken in preparation for the evidence which I should give before this Committee; but they balanced within eight. With regard to the 80 cards that were rejected, when the votes were counted, 32 of them had had no name crossed out; either they were entirely blank, as delivered to the voter, or the pencil-mark was so run across them that you could not tell which name it was intended for; 32 had no name crossed out; 12 had both names crossed out; 20, instead of having either crossed out, had a cross put opposite Mr. Milner Gibson's name; 14 had a cross put opposite the name of Mr. Ernest Jones; and one card put in, in favour of Mr. Ernest Jones, had a blank card put in along with it. That was the only case in which we found two cards in the envelope. It was perfectly clear that in delivering the cards two had stuck together, and one blank card was in along with the vote; but according to the principle that we had laid down before, that card was rejected. Perhaps it would be satisfactory to the Committee to see the informal cards (producing the same).

12124. At what speed did the voting proceed?—It was very much more rapid in every case than under the present system. You could take 200 votes an hour without any difficulty whatever. The votes were, as a matter of fact, taken faster than that in a few cases in the Manchester ballot, but rather too many persons got inside the booth at one time; that is to say, more than five. There were five recesses. and when the voting was taken beyond 200 an hour, there was a liability to get more than five persons inside at once, and therefore that regulated the speed.

12125. You tested the fact, that the votes could be taken at the rate of 200 an hour easily?—Yes, easily. At the general election in November we had 104 polling-booths in Manchester; and at the rate of 200 votes an hour we could poll the whole constituency of Manchester in 20 to 25 booths.

12126. Mr. Villiers.] That was by the open voting?—Yes; but by the ballot we could poll them in from 20 to 25 booths, as rapidly as we polled in the 104.

12127. You mean, judging by the rate at which they voted on the occasion of Mr. Ernest Jones and Mr. Milner Gibson being balloted for?—Yes.

12128. How many polling booths had you with the ballot?—Forty-one. The poll was open two days, but in one or two cases we found that where we had four booths we could have done very easily with one, and in every case we could have done with half the number.

12129. But is the voting more rapid, when it is voting by the ballot, than in open voting?—Yes, four times the speed.

12130. Mr. Leatham.] Does the ballot give greater facilities for personation than open voting?—Certainly not. Many persons thought that there would be greater facility for personation, simply because they did not understand what the ballot would be; they thought that, because it was secret, there must necessarily be greater facilities for personation. But every check upon personation which you have in open voting, you have in the ballot. Under the present system the voter presents himself at the polling booth, and the only check upon personation is the knowledge which the representatives of the candidate may have of the individual. We had precisely the same under the ballot; but the mode of voting makes no difference whatever, because the bonâ fide nature of the man's claim is settled in both cases before he tenders his vote. But in the Manchester ballot we had an additional check upon personation, which was this. We did not allow any information to leave the polling booth as to who had voted. Personation is practised now successfully, just because information leaves the polling booth, which enables persons to know who has voted, and therefore to know whom to personate. We allowed no information whatever to leave the polling booth, and therefore a person who wished to personate could not tell whether a man had voted or not.

12132. Have you heard of the Tasmanian dodge?—I have. I was about to say that, with regard to personation, I have no doubt whatever that, particularly in the Lancashire county elections, at the last elections in November, there was a great deal of personation; I do not mean more on the one side than on the other, but there was personation on both sides, I have not the slightest doubt. Had the information not been allowed to leave the polling booth as to who had voted, that would have been checked to a very large extent. Cases came under my own personal observation which I had not the smallest doubt were attempts at personation. Of course, I had no means of proving it; but I heard, during the election, inquiries as to whether such and such a number had voted, and I had strong suspicions that it was intended for an improper purpose. As a matter of fact, we know that there was a very large amount of personation in all the divisions of the county, because when the real bonâ fide voters presented themselves the votes were marked off as given; the returning officer had marked off the voters on the register as if they had voted bonâ fide, and the bonâ fide voter was rejected because some one had taken his name.

12133. Do you consider that the Tasmanian dodge could be prevented?—Yes, certainly; it has been practised once I believe, and it was discovered, and the man was very severely punished.

12134. Have you any plan to suggest by which it could be prevented?—It could be prevented by various plans. The Tasmanian dodge consists in No. 1 voter putting a spurious card into the ballot-box, and bringing out with him his bonâ fide card blank, then the person who is working the dodge sends in the next voter with a card properly marked, with instructions that he is to bring out another blank card, and so on; in the first place that requires a very great amount of publicity; you must have your succession of voters pretty near the polling booth. I suppose that the honourable gentlemen know from inquiries before election committees that in practising any bribery under the present system a great deal of secrecy is required, whereas if a number of voters have to be collected together ready to go in one after another with those forged voting cards, a good many of them must know what is going on, and that in itself would be a very considerable check. The Committee must bear in mind that, according to the plan upon which the ballot took place in Manchester, the voter was in full sight of the returning officer, the policeman, and the spectators, during the whole of the time he was in the polling booth, and anything like an attempt to take a card out of his pocket and put another in would have been impossible; I might just as well attempt to take a paper out of my pocket and put another in without any of you gentlemen seeing me, as to suppose that a voter in Manchester could have done it: the thing was utterly impossible; one clumsy fellow explodes the whole trick. Another thing must be borne in mind, that if it were possible the ballot-box contains the evidence of the thing having been done, the spurious card is there, and the moment the ballot-box is opened it is found that that has been practised, and inquiry instantly takes place into it, and with the amount of publicity which had been given to the thing it could not possibly escape detection; then, again, the person who may be working what is called the Tasmanian dodge, has no security whatever that the voter will not cross out the name on behalf of whom he is working the dodge before he gets to the polling booth, and therefore render it altogether nugatory; so that it is the greatest moonshine in the world, and the clumsiest possible dodge that could be practised. It may be urged as a theoretical objection, but as a practical objection it will be found to be utterly worthless.

Mr. F. Taylor.

12135. In your experience of Manchester, is there any deviation from the Victoria system which you would recommend?—The only thing in which we deviated from the Australian system, was the use of the envelope; the card was deposited in an envelope by the voter before he put it into the ballot-box. As I said before, the envelope was merely to prevent the use of two cards in voting. We had originally determined upon another plan of avoiding that, which was to have perforated cards, so that the voter could double the card up and conceal the vote, and deposit it in the ballot-box, and the returning officer, before he delivered the card to the voter, putting a stamp upon it, in order that he might see that it was the same card. That would effectually prevent the working of the Tasmanian dodge, and it was adopted in the ballot at Stafford; those are the cards which were used at the Stafford ballot (handing in the same).

12136. Mr. Villiers.] How long before they were used, were those cards given out?—They were not given out at all before they were used; they were in the possession of the returning officer.

12137. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Was this stamp put on the card at the time?—That die was cut and known to no one until the morning of the election.

12138. Was the stamp put on it after the voter had scratched out the name?—No; before the returning officer delivered it to the voter. In the Stafford ballot the returning officer stamped the card; he then delivered it to the voter, and when the voter deposited it in the box, he simply held it up to let the returning officer see that the stamp was on it.

12139. Mr. Leatham.] Do you consider that the returning officer's expenses would be very much decreased under the ballot?—Very considerably decreased; if in Manchester we had 25 polling booths instead of 104, our expenses would have been very much below what they were. The expenses of the Liberal party at the last Manchester election amounted to 2,702 l. 10 s. 10½ d., that is to say every farthing that was spent, and out of that, 657 l. was for the returning officer's expenses alone, which is a very large proportion of the whole. The amount expended was a little below 1 s. 5 d. for each recorded vote. But the committee determined that they would put a stop to extravagant expenditure in every possible way. We had not a single committee-room in a public-house from the beginning of the election to the end. I accompanied the candidates to over 40 meetings during an eight weeks' campaign, and we never entered a public-house to hold a meeting except once, and then the meeting had been adjourned to a club-room in a tavern, because the building in which they had assembled was thought to be unsafe; but with that exception, we never entered a single public-house.

12140. You mentioned that the returning officer's expenses were 657 l.; have you formed any estimate as to what extent they would be decreased if the vote were taken by ballot?—I should say that it need not be more than one-third of that.

12141. When you say that the ballot was taken on the Victorian plan, were all the ballot papers numbered to correspond with the numbers on the register?—No; the ballot papers were not numbered at all; I have already shown the Committee the card that was actually used for voting. What you call the voting paper, corresponding with the voting card, which is now sent to the voter, was numbered to correspond with the register, but that ceased to be used the moment the voter presented it; it was simply presented to enable the returning officer at once to turn to the voter's name on the register.

12142. Do you approve of taking the votes so as to give an opportunity for a scrutiny?—I should say that there would be no necessity whatever for a scrutiny under the working of the ballot on the Australian principle.

12143. Then, yours is a deviation from the Victorian plan, where all the ballot papers themselves are numbered?—In the Victorian plan a record is taken of the number of each card, so that afterwards, if a scrutiny is necessary, the numbers can be brought together; but as a matter of practice, that is found to be altogether useless. Besides, it appears to me that you are visiting the offence upon the wrong persons when you come to a scrutiny. If an offence has been committed, either by bribery or intimidation, which is a punishable offence, why punish the candidate, and why punish all the innocent electors along with the guilty, by declaring the election void? I might as well be called upon to answer for the defalcations of my clerk. Supposing that my clerk picks a pocket in the street, why should I be called upon to suffer for his offence? I say, punish him; and if a man bribes, punish him, and if he intimidates, punish him.

12145. I think we have had the same opinion expressed here by Sir Charles Wentworth Dilke, who went down for the express purpose of observing serving it; but I think that he saw something that was defective in it?—I have read Sir Charles Dilke's evidence, and I may observe that, in one or two particulars, he was under a little mistake. He was under the impression that the voting paper was required to be signed by the voter; but that was altogether a mistake; it was not a voting paper in any sense.

12146. It could not have been secret voting, of course, if he signed the paper and put that paper into the box?—Certainly not. Sir Charles Dilke also objected to the use of the envelope; he thought that it would facilitate the Tasmanian dodge, as he called it; but, as I have said, the envelope was no necessary part of our system at all.

12147. It seems that in this case a man must retire to some corner of the room to strike out the name which he wishes to exclude?—Yes, certainly, he must. I have handed in an exact representation of the ballot rooms, as we had them.

12148. Exactly so; but somebody must do it, and that is the voter?—Yes.

12149. And he must be able to read, must he not?—We printed the names of the candidates in two different colours, in order that a person who could not read might know for whom he wished to vote.

12150. What you have done is to put the names of the two candidates in different colours; but how is he supposed to read the name that he approves of?—Although a man could not read he would know that Mr. Ernest Jones' name was in green, and he votes green. I do not see the least difficulty in voting with the number of names in different colours.

12151. I take for granted that you have a number of voters who have not been educated, and do not read?—No doubt, whatever, unfortunately, a great many, particularly amongst new electors.

12152. Was there any difficulty experienced from that circumstance on this occasion?—None whatever.

12153. Was it observed that there were people who were puzzled to know what to do with the cards?—I visited all the polling booths, and I heard of no difficulty whatever, in consequence of that, I never heard of a single returning officer having asked any question.

12154. The colours seemed to obviate the difficulty?—Yes, they seemed to obviate the difficulty, but you must bear in mind that ours was a voluntary ballot, and therefore we could not swear the returning officer, or anything of that kind; but I see no objection whatever to the Australian plan, of allowing a sworn returning officer to assist a man who cannot read, if he wishes it.

12155. But that vote would not be secret if he had been assisted by another?—It would not be secret from the returning officer; I prefer the plan of the colours, but I see no great objection to the other in case of need.

12156. What proportion of voters did you say abstained from voting?—Thirty-two and a half per cent. out of the whole number, 18,000.

12157. Were the 32 per cent. chiefly the lower class?—No, I gave the per-centages in the different wards, and a larger proportion in the lower class wards abstained from voting than in the higher class wards.

12158. Is this the only experiment that has been made, or that you are cognizant of for the purpose of making the voting secret?—It is the only experiment on a large scale; but perhaps you are aware that the plan has been in operation in the town of Maryport for a considerable number of years, under an Act of Parliament, when they are electing the local board, or some local authorities, the vote is taken precisely on the Australian principle, and taken by ballot, and I believe that both the Conservative and Liberal inhabitants of the town urged very strongly upon Parliament the introduction of this plan o voting.

12159. For what office do they vote in this way?—I believe it is in the election of the local board, it is not the municipal election.

12160. How long has it been in operation in Maryport, do you know?—Several years; in fact the Maryport people find considerable fault that it has been called the Australian plan, they say that it is the Maryport plan, and that the Australians copied it from them.

12161. Does it secure secrecy?—Yes, certainly.

12162. And they are satisfied with the result?—Yes, certainly.

12163. Had there been any elections in Maryport before, under the open system?—Of course, there must have been.

12165. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Maryport has become a large harbour, has it not?—Yes.

12166. Mr. Villiers.] Have you ever seen the ball ballot in operation?—Yes.

12167. You have seen it in operation at the club, but has it ever been adopted within your experience at any place?—No; I read the evidence given before this Committee by Mr. Arnold, with reference to the plan adopted in Greece, but it was perfectly clear that the objection to that plan was precisely the objection which occurred to us in Manchester, when we were considering the various plans that we should adopt, that is, that you would have no check upon a voter voting for any number of candidates he liked.

12168. There is a limit to the number of boxes, and it is known who are the candidates, and everything is provided for a given number, is it not?—There must be a box for each candidate, and a man must have a ball for each candidate. Unfortunately, in Manchester, we are labouring under the penal consequences of the Minority Clause; we are only allowed to vote for two candidates, and if there had been voting by balls there would have been no check whatever upon a man putting three balls in for three candidates.

12169. That is accidental to Manchester; it is not every place that has got three members and the voters have only two votes?—The same objection would apply, supposing that you had two members and you had six candidates; there would be no reason whatever why a man should not vote for three or four, or he might vote for the whole six.

12170. That is assuming that he has no choice, is it not?—I will assume that there are four Liberals and two Conservatives, and he votes for the whole four Liberals in order to put them up, and give them a better chance than the two Conservatives.

12171. You assume that a man knows what he is

Mr. F. Taylor.

13 July 1869.

is about, and that he is an intelligent being, and has a preference for one candidate over the other, but are there any mechanical objections to a man putting his arm into a sort of funnel, and dropping in a ball in favour of the candidates of his choice?—I think he would know perfectly well what he was about; he would be voting for his party. If there are four candidates of his party and two of the opposite party, he votes "Yes" to all four of his party.

12172. It is a very simple arrangement putting a ball into a box if a man knows what he is about, the thing is complete for the purpose of secrecy, is it not?—Perfectly complete for the purpose of secrecy; but you have no check upon a man giving more votes than he is entitled to. For instance, in the plan laid before this Committee by Mr. Arnold there were 30 candidates for the district to which he referred, and a voter might have voted for the whole 30 if he pleased, or he might have voted for five of them, as there are only five of them to be elected.

12173. That would operate anywhere where that system was adopted; at a club, for instance, there might be 20 candidates put up, and if a man has a mind to do it, he might vote for everyone?—Certainly, and there is no reason why he should not. Every man who is put up may be elected, you are not going simply to elect four in a club; this objection would apply to every machine which I have seen yet, you must have a handle for each candidate, and unless you have some one in the ballot-room to watch the operation of the voter, which, of course, would prevent the vote being secret, you have the same liability of voting for more candidates than a man is entitled to vote for.

12174. A man does sometimes vote according to the directions of his party now, does he not?—No doubt he does.

12175. And that is considered beforehand, with a view to certain success; and I believe there is a good deal of arrangement which would not occur to individual voters where the Minority Clause is in operation?—I believe that in every place where the Minority Clause has been in operation, the system of working it has been different.

12176. But it requires some management to bring out a result that suits one party?—Yes, certainly; we tried to work it in Manchester, but we did not succeed.

12178. In both cases you think that he would abuse the privilege conferred upon him where there is all this manœuvring about the Minority Clause and manœuvring the balls?—Certainly not in violation of the privilege that is conferred upon him by voting for any two candidates out of three in order to promote the success of the whole.

12179. If vote by ballot was to be adopted tomorrow you would recommend the system which was tried the other day at Manchester?—Yes, certainly.

12180. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You have spoken of doing this by colours; supposing there were six candidates, three for each party, and a voter wished to vote for two of one and one of the other, which is not uncommonly the case, in that case, I presume, an ignorant man would not be able to do it?—Certainly he would; he would have six colours.

12181. But suppose you have six names upon this card, three in green and three in red, how would he know?—I would have every man have his own colour; not party colours.

12182. You would not put them in three of the same colour?—No, certainly not.

12184. That is very easy with two persons, no doubt, but when you come to six or seven candidates it would be very different?—It would be equally easy with six. If a voter cannot read he has some child who could, and who would read the circular to him, and tell him which was the colour of each candidate. I believe the reason that they did not adopt colours for the four names at Stafford was, that it was difficult to get any of the candidates to take blue; and if that difficulty could have been got over they would have had colours.

12185. Which of those two plans do you prefer, the perforated card or the envelope?—I prefer the perforated card; it is much less trouble; it is as effective as the envelope, and it has certain advantages which the envelope has not.

12186. Then, the ballot at Manchester was simply a test of the mode of voting and the possibility of secrecy; but it did not test the question of whether it would prevent intimidation by mobs or whether it would prevent bribery, or anything that seemed, from the new circumstances, more likely to arise?—I do not know that; personal feeling was quite as strong as we have ever known it in a general election; but the liability to intimidation by mobs would be very considerably diminished.

12187. That is your supposition; but there were no mobs I assume in Manchester upon this ballot at all; it was an arrangement by the whole party that this should be the means of taking the decision?—We have never been much accustomed to mobs during elections in Manchester.

12188. As a matter of fact, was there any mob?—No, certainly not.

12189. Nor any bribery?—No, nor any jostling at the polling booth, as is the case under the present system.

12190. It was done like a club would do business, was it not?—No, certainly not.

12191. It was done as quietly as a club would vote?—Yes, as quietly as the business of this room.

12192. And there was, of course, no treating?—No treating.

12193. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Do not you think that the old party colours of the two parties in a place might rather clash with the colours which you might choose for the names of the the candidates on each of the cards?—There is plenty of choice of colours without clashing.

12194. In Stafford, I presume, the Conservative colour is blue, and the Liberal colour is yellow; supposing that there were four candidates in Stafford, and you had to give to each man his separate colour, one of the Conservatives might be blue, and another might be red, do not you think that a good many voters, having been used to vote blue all their lives, might be extremely puzzled by the different colours?—Of course you would bring it into harmony with the previous practice to some extent.

12195. If every candidate had his own separate colour, that would be an additional element in puzzling an ignorant voter, would it not?—I do not think that practically it would have that effect; but at the same time colour is not an essential part of the system in any way whatever; they have no colours in Australia, and the colour is merely to get over the difficulty of a voter not being able to read.

12196. If you wish a man to distinguish for himself two names on a card, which he cannot read, it must be by colour?—Yes.

12197. Therefore, the colour is an essential part of the system as regards voters who cannot read?—Unless you adopt the Australian plan of allowing them to ask the returning officer.

12198. If you wish to secure perfect secrecy, and to secure ignorant voters being able to understand the card, you must have colours?—Yes; but we hope that the population will grow out of the inability to read.

12199. Even at Manchester it is hardly the case, is it, that all the voters would be able to read the names now?—No, I should say not.

12200. When you spoke of the diminution in the expenses of returning officers by the adoption of the ballot, I think you said that they would be diminished one-third?—That was merely a guess.

12201. In what particular points would they be diminished?—If we could work an election with 25 polling booths, instead of 104, it would make a very serious difference in the cost of erecting booths.

12202. And that you could do, because you think you could take the votes quicker under the ballot than under the present system?—Yes, much more quickly.

12203. Is there any other point in which the expenses would be diminished?—Yes; if you had 25 polling booths instead of 104, you would only want 25 deputy returning officers, and of course their fees would all be saved.

12204. But that all depends, does it not, upon the diminution of the polling booths?—Yes, certainly.

12205. How is it that you can take the votes so much more quickly by the ballot than under the present system?—In the first place, a great difference is in the absence of jostling and interruption on the part of the people who are bringing voters up, and inducing them to vote in a particular way; that interrupts the polling very considerably; and, in addition to that, there is no necessity to record a man's vote in the poll-book.

12206. With regard to the jostling, that might be avoided, under the present system, if the persons not voting were prevented from entering the polling booth, might it not?—But I want to know what the Right Honourable Member means by the polling booth.

12207. The place where the votes are taken?—The jostling takes place outside the polling booth.

12208. In the open air, for instance?—No, not in the open air; within the booth, in a certain sense, but outside that part of the polling booth, which is private.

12209. Do you think that the ballot would so much remove the cause of excitement among the bystanders, that there would not be that crowd?—Certainly.

12210. Do not you think that they would take the same interest in watching the polling?—As a matter of fact, they do not wherever the ballot is in operation.

12211. As a matter of fact, they did not feel the same interest in it, because it was merely a ballot between two sections of the same party, who had agreed to take it, and it was not like a regular Parliamentary election?—Personal feeling was quite as strong as it would be at a Parliamentary election; but it is not the case where the ballot existed at Maryport, and it is not the case where the ballot exists in Australia; and every country in the world where the ballot is in operation this excitement does not take place; whereas, in every country in the world where that ballot is not in operation, it does take place.

12212. Do not you think it takes place in the United States of America?—The ballot there is of a totally different character, and it is not a fair test in America.

12213. Why not?—It is not a secret ballot to a very large extent; you have all the evils of our system connected with it.

12214. The absence of jostling would so far render the votes to be taken more quickly, but some examination has to be made with reference to the capacity of the voter to vote?—Just so.

12215. Would not that take precisely the same time as it does now?—Yes, it would take the same time as it does now, which is a very insignificant portion of the time that a man is in the booth. The time is taken up by the jostling, and the interference, and by the recording of the vote, and the speed at which you can take the vote is limited by the speed at which the clerk can write.

12216. Would it not take a voter as long to get a card and take it into the corner of a room, and record his vote in a ballot box, as it does now for the clerk to record his vote?—Certainly not, because there is a stream continually going on; it does not interfere with the time; you might have five or six or a dozen compartments, if you please, and the persons may be passed into the ballot room as rapidly as their votes can be checked off at the table. Your speed is regulated by the speed at which they can be checked off, but that has nothing to do with the speed of the persons passing through the recesses.

12217. I suppose you have taken an active part in elections under the present system?—Yes.

12218. Therefore you can compare the ease with which votes are taken under both systems very fairly?—Certainly.

12219. Mr. Raikes.] I think that you said that Sir Charles Dilke was mistaken in supposing that those voting papers, as distinguished from the cards, were signed?—Yes.

12220. Would there be any objection to their being signed, supposing that it did not in any way way interfere with the secrecy of the voting?—There is no object in having them signed.

Mr. F. Taylor.

13 July 1869.

12221. Would not it be a security against personation?—Not the slightest.

12222. I should have thought it would have enabled you in a great degree to identify the voters, because I understand the voting paper is handed only to the returning officer, who in exchange gives a card which is dropped into the ballot box?—Yes, that is so. If the object of the honourable Member's question is to ascertain whether I think that if a man was called upon to sign it on the spot it would be a check upon personation, I do not think it would, because if people come to personate they will sign the name at once. If a man came to personate John Smith he would know that he was coming to personate John Smith, and he would sign John Smith upon the paper.

12223. Do not you think that, in the present state of feeling in the country generally, a man would shrink rather more from signing his name, knowing that it was a forgery?—Not a bit. A man who would come to personate a voter would do anything of that kind; it is a less offence than personating the voter.

12224. Do not you think it would be any security at all?—Not the slightest.

12225. Chairman.] Supposing a man had also to sign his name against his number on the register, would it not be a check then to compare the signature to the voting paper with his own signature upon the register?—If I understand you rightly, you mean that he signs the register on some previous occasion, and then the two are compared. Of course that would be a check, but practically it would be impossible; you could not take the votes with a register of 50,000 voters. In Manchester the thing could never be done, from the time that it would occupy.

12226. As it is now, may not an objection be taken to the identity of a voter?—Certainly.

12227. And some inquiries are made?—Yes, and there have been cases where voters have been given into custody at some elections. At the last election there were two or three voters given into custody on each side.

12228 As it is, in every case the returning officer has to turn to the register to find the number of the man who presents himself?—Yes, to the printed register; but if you had to turn to a manuscript register it would be a very different thing, it would take a very much longer time; it would take at least five minutes a vote.

12229. It is done in Australia, is it not?—I think not.

12230. Mr. Raikes.] Had you any objections on the score of personation in this test ballot?—I did not hear of any.

12231. Were there any persons placed there with the view of detecting personation?—Yes; each candidate had the option of sending a representative into each polling booth, and they did so.

12232. Have you had much coercion by masters or persons of influence in Manchester on previous occasions?—The working classes in our district are rather too independent to be coerced, that is not the class on which anything like coercion would be exercised; the small shopkeepers are the people who suffer most by that, and that applies to working class districts as well as to the districts in which the upper class of voters reside. I know, as a matter of fact, in some of the working class districts in Manchester, the shopkeepers say that they do not like to vote, because their customers all belong to the working classes, and thay might lose their custom. Then on the other hand, some of the larger shops are in dread of their larger customers.

12233. Do you believe that there would have been any material difference in the polling if it had been open voting on this occasion from what it was under the ballot?—I cannot possibly express an opinion upon that. All I can say on the subject is, that the opinion of nine people out of ten, before the ballot took place, was that Mr. Milner Gibson would have a very large majority over Mr. Ernest Jones, whereas the result of the ballot was just the contrary.

12234. Was it not a fair inference to draw from that, that there might have been influence employed if the election had been open?—There is no doubt whatever that there would have been influence employed; and there is no question that there would have been very strong influence indeed employed in favour of both.

12235. Mr. James.] It seems to be regarded as advisable to have some private mark upon those voting cards; does it not occur to you to be objectionable to let the returning officer have the selection of that mark?—It is not necessary that the returning officer should have the selection of it; it should be secret up to the time that it is used.

12236. Secret to whom?—Secret to anybody to whom the Act of Parliament gives anything to do in the election.

12237. To whom would you give the power of selection; would it be to the returning officer in each constituency?—I should not have the smallest objection to giving it to the returning officer.

12238. In some constituencies, particularly small constituencies, the returning officer is often a violent partisan, is he not?—I do not think that that would be found to be an objection to a very large extent.

12239. Do you see any objection to a mark being put on in the voting room in the presence of the agents of the different candidates, for instance, by a sort of perforating machine?—There is no objection whatever to its being put on in the same way as a mark is put on a railway ticket.

12240. Was this put on beforehand?—It was put on beforehand.

12241. You see no objection to the returning officer being consulted by the voter, if the voter wished to give up the secrecy of his voting, and consult him?—Provided he cannot read.

12242. But that would put the voter at the mercy of the returning officer, would it not?—No; the voter would simply ask which is Mr. Jones's name, or which is Mr. Gibson's name.

12243. That assumes that the voter does not know which was Gibson and which was Jones?—Yes.

12244. Supposing, as I was putting the case, that the returning officer is often a partisan, and he chose to say that is Mr. Jones, whereas it is Mr. Gibson, what would be the result?—I cannot believe that that would be done to anything like an extent to form an objection, or that the returning officer in any borough in the kingdom would deliberately tell a lie to a man who asked him which was the name of a particular candidate; I do not think that that is possible.

12245. At any rate do you think it would give confidence to the public that the vote should be placed as it were at the disposal of the returning officer; that a man should be able to tell an ignorant person which was the right name?—The public in Australia are satisfied with it. I have always said that I preferred the system of colours, so as to allow the voter to choose for himself, but I should feel no great objection to the other plan.

12246. In the vote at Manchester, did each card pass through the hands of the deputy returning officer; did one person in each booth only receive the card?—One person only.

12247. One person only checked off the vote as it was given?—He, and a clerk, checked off the votes, and each candidate had a representative to see fair play.

12248. Was there any attempt at personation?—I never heard of any.

12249. There was no case of a second person trying to vote in the same name?—It is quite possible that such a thing occurred, but I did not hear of it.

12250. None was attempted that you know of?—No.

12251. You also said that you would not let the penalty of any fraud fall upon the candidate; supposing that the votes were very nearly balanced, and you found that some fraudulent votes had been given, what course would you take with regard to that?—I would strike them off entirely.

12252. Supposing that their opponents chose to vote fraudulent apparently in their favour?—I do not see the point of the question.

12253. You have suggested, have you not, that any candidate should be dismissed on account of fraud that had been committed?—On account of bribery or intimidation, or anything punishable as a crime, I say, punish the parties who commit the crime.

12254. If the candidates' agent had done it, you would make them liable for the act of the agent; you would not alter that principle?—No, certainly not.

12255. What power would you have of scrutiny, or would you ever have under vote by ballot?—My answer to the question previously was, and now is, that there would be no necessity for a scrutiny.

12256. Except in the case of personation, you would be able to detect a fraudulent vote if a voter put in another card which was not the right card?—Yes.

12257. And there is no other suggested fraud except personation, I believe?—No.

12258. In the voting itself there would be no false votes saving in the case of personation?—No; and you are less liable to that under the ballot, as worked in Manchester, than you are under open voting.

12259. Mr. Howes.] How do you explain that there would be no necessity for a scrutiny?—I do not know in what respect you would think it necessary that there should be a scrutiny.

12260. I wish to know from you what is your reason for saying that there would be no necessity for a scrutiny; how would you detect a case of bribery, or intimidation, or any corruption?—I say that under the ballot you would be less liable to bribery or intimidation, simply because the thing would be useless.

12261. Neither bribery nor intimidation nor any form of corruption whatever?—Not that would affect the election, but as I have already said, punish it directly if it occurs, and not indirectly.

12262. Chairman.] Could you state what the cost of this test ballot at Manchester was?—I have not the particulars, but I can form a tolerable estimate; I should think it would cost the party between 400 l. and 500 l. altogether.

12263. Did it cost the candidates nothing?—The candidates never pay anything with us.

12264. Do you think that that 400 l. or 500 l. would cover the whole expense?—Yes.

12265. Mr. Villiers.] Do you mean that the candidates at Manchester do not pay the expenses of the elections?—Precisely so.

12266. Chairman.] You say that it would be impossible for the voter to change his card when he is in the act of erasing the name of the candidate for whom he is going to vote; how is it impossible?—Supposing he has a spurious card in his pocket, he has to take it out and to mark the spurious card, and to put the genuine one into his pocket and to carry it out; and I ask whether it is possible that I could in the presence of 15 or 16 gentlemen here, all looking at me, take one card out of my pocket and put another in.

12267. Where are the spectators looking at the voter?—Exactly in a place corresponding with the place for the spectators on the other side of the barrier, in this room.

12269. Are there persons watching the backs of those men who are engaged in scratching out the names?—Yes, certainly, but at a considerable distance; as far off as the recesses are from the spectators behind the barrier in this room.

12270. You would not allow a man to put his hand into his pocket while he is in those recesses?—If you saw that he was pulling a card out of his pocket and putting in another, you would stop him of course.

12271. Mr. Villiers.] He might pull it out of his coat sleeve, might he not?—I do not think the thing is possible; as I said before, I do not see how I could take a card from any part of my person and put another in without you gentlemen seeing it.

12272. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Not as you are sitting now; but if you had your back to us, could you not do so?—But the voter has not his back to everyone in the place; the policeman has his eyes upon him as much as I have my eyes upon the honourable Member now; it is utterly impossible. But I would repeat again that the die put upon the card, on the principle of a railway ticket, entirely obviates that.

12273. Chairman.] Is that die constantly changed?—There is not the slighest object in changing it.

12274. Mr. Brand.] That plan was adopted at Stafford, was it not?—Yes.

12275. Chairman.] If the die is not changed, what protection is it against a system of fraud?—You have a die cut specially for the returning officer, and nobody knows outside what die is being used.

12276. Are we not assuming that the voter

Mr. F. Taylor.

13 July 1869.

gets his voting card all right; but instead of using it, takes it out with him?—Yes; but he puts the spurious one into the box instead of it. If the genuine card has been stamped and the spurious card has not been stamped, he comes to the ballot-box to put his spurious card in, which has no stamp upon it, but it is immediately stopped, and that settles it at its initiation.

12277. Mr. Villiers.] You would discover the fraud, would you, before he has voted?—Yes.

12278. Chairman.] But with the envelope plan nothing could be easier?—By the envelope plan you could not discover it in that way; you simply discover it by seeing a man make changes in his pocket, and by general publicity; but the perforated card was a far better plan than the envelope plan, and it was the plan which we resolved to adopt in the first instance, only that some over-timid people were afraid that even with this plan there might be two cards put in instead of one.

12279. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] It would come to the same thing, would it not, if the returning officer wrote his initials upon the card at the same time?—Precisely the same thing, only that it would take a much longer time than the other, and would give no greater check.

12280. Mr. James.] Had you any case where a man said "I have mistaken the way that I wished to vote, and have spoiled my voting card, will you give me a second one"?—We had no case of that kind.

12281. You had no question arising whether you would or would not give him a second card?—Such a case never arose; supposing that we had a case of the sort, an arrangement might be made by which it might be done by counting the damaged card as an unused card afterwards, when they came to balance the cards of the returning officer, and it would be absolutely necessary that the cards of the returning officer should be balanced.

12282. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You would not allow a man, who alleged that he had lost his card, to have another in its place?—No; he would only have it in the room.

MR. JOHN W. PROBYN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. W. Probyn.

12283. Mr. Leatham] You have visited Italy very frequently, and resided there a considerable time, have you not?—Yes; I have been in Italy a great deal, ever since 1859. I went there just after the war of 1859, and stayed there the whole autumn and winter; and every autumn and winter since, up to the year 1867, I went again. My object in going there was to follow, as closely as I could, the political events which were taking place in the kingdom of Italy, and I took care, therefore, to make all the acquaintances I could, and which I did, with a very considerable number of political and literary men in Italy. I was present at the general election in January 1861, in the City of Milan, and at the general election of November or December 1865, in Florence, and one or two neighbouring electoral colleges or boroughs, as we should call them.

12284. Were the elections very quiet?—The elections were remarkably quiet.

12285. Do you know whether any canvassing is practised in Italy?—There is no canvassing.

12286. Is any pressure put upon shopkeepers and others to vote for particular candidates?—None whatever. During the years that I have mentioned, I spent 15 consecutive months in Italy, and therefore I was obliged to employ Italian tradesmen myself, and I used to ask them about political matters, and how they voted; and their reply always was "We vote as we like." I said, "Well, but do not gentlemen, or even ladies, go round and ask you for your votes?" And they said, "Oh, dear no, no one ever comes; what would be the use; they do not know how we vote."

12287. Had you any means of knowing whether there is any bribery practised at elections in Italy?—I was very careful to ask questions of gentlemen opposing candidates, and their friends, upon that matter; and as far as my experience goes, both parties refused entirely to accuse the other party of bribery. That was particularly the case in the contested elections which I saw at Milan and Florence. I knew gentlemen upon both sides, and I said, "Well, I am sorry you have lost your election; I suppose there was a little pressure or a little inducement put upon those voters?" "No," they said; "we have no reason to suppose that at all."

12288. In fact, it is notorious in Italy, is it not, that bribery scarcely exists?—It scarcely exists; indeed I may say that it does not exist.

12289. Are you aware, whether those elections are expensive to the candidates?—They cost little or nothing. A great friend of my own sits still as one of the Members for Milan, and he is a man of extremely small means. He is a literary man, and I should say that his election for the City of Milan did not cost him or his friends 50 l. I am speaking well within bounds when I say that.

12290. Do the elections take place by ballot?—Yes, they all take place by ballot.

12291. Is the ballot a strictly secret ballot?—Yes, strictly secret.

12292. Will you describe to the Committee how it is carried out?—It is carried out in a very simple fashion. The polling places at each of the elections are large halls or rooms, which they have in almost all the cities of Italy. They do not erect polling booths as we do; they are very much as this room might be; the mayor, or his representative, sits at a table, as the Chairman might be sitting there, with the ballot-box before him, into which the elector who comes in to vote is obliged to put one of these papers (handing a specimen to the Chairman). One of the papers he procures from the mayor during the week, or whatever is the specified time preceding the election. He goes to the mayor, and he says, "I am an elector of the city of Milan," for instance; "I reside so and so." The mayor then turns to the electoral list, and he verifies whether it is true or not; or whethere there be any reason to doubt it; and having referred to the list, and having found the name and the number of the house, he gives him one of those papers, upon which is written in fact that he lives in such and such a college or electoral district of the city, and that he is so and so, and that he has a right to vote. When he comes to the polling place he presents this to the National Guard, or whoever it is at the door, showing showing that he is an elector, and if he has not one he cannot enter. When he has shown it, of course that is substantial proof that he is a voter, as it is never given to a man excepting he is an elector. On one occasion I just went a few yards within the room, because they are very particular, indeed, about allowing none but electors to come in, and on that occasion I went with a friend of the candidate just at the fag end of the day, and I was able to walk up even as far as the ballot-box with him with considerable difficulty. The voter walks up to the returning officer, and the returning officer turns to his list, and he verifies the name; and when he accepts this paper showing that he is an elector he hands to the elector this blue paper, which I now hold in my hand, which is a blank paper, except what is printed on it, and on it he writes the name of the candidate for whom he votes. I must say that I think a better plan would be if the names of the candidates were printed on the paper, and he simply erased that one; however, as far as secrecy is concerned, it comes to very nearly the same thing. The great difference between the French ballot and this is, that in the Italian ballot, you cannot vote with any paper except the paper which the returning officer hands to you; if you take any other paper, and bring it in, and if it is found in the ballot-box, it is simply torn up.

12293. Do you place the ballot paper in the ballot-box yourself, or do you hand it to the officer?—No, you take it from the mayor; you turn aside to a little table, and you write the name of the candidate; you then return with it folded up, as I have seen it done over and over again, and you hand it to the mayor in that shape, and he drops it into the ballot-box.

12294. Is there any reason to believe that the ballot-boxes are tampered with in Italy?—I do not think that there is any reason to believe that that is ever done. A very simple mode of preventing anything like tampering is to have glass boxes, because then you cannot have any false drawers; and, so far as the counting of the votes is concerned, that is taken care of by its being done in public after four or five o'clock, when the poll is over. I have never heard of any instance whatever of the ballot-boxes being tampered with in Italy.

12295. Then, nothing else is done but giving him the paper desiring him to write the name of the candidate that he proposes?—Yes.

12296. There may be several candidates, may there not?—Yes; there may be several candidates.

12297. The intelligence of the man is relied upon; he retires to the corner, and writes the name down?—Yes; he goes to a table where everybody can see him writing, and he writes the name. I see on the back of this paper, which is a voting paper of January 1861, it says, "If the elector by an exception of the third article of the present law (mentioning the third article of the present law), or from some physical defect which is notorious or which has been shown to the officials, finds that he is unable to write, he will be permitted to allow the name to be written by some elector who is in his confidence, and the scrutineer or the presiding officer will put it down in the report of the minutes of the election.

12298. Mr. Leatham.] Is there any public nomination in Italy?—There is no public nomination whatever; there is as much freedom of the press and as much freedom of public meetings as we have in England, but there is no nomination whatever.

12299. The elections taking place under the ballot, are you aware which of the two great parties in Italy have remained in power for the longest period since the introduction of the constitution?—The ballot was first introduced in March 1848, when Charles Albert gave a Constitution, or Free Constitutional Government to Piedmont, which was extended in 1861 to the kingdom of Italy. During the Piedmontese Government from 1848 to 1859, and the Italian government since, up to the present year, the number of petitions presented against returns on account of corruption have been a perfect minimum. I doubt if there have been 15 petitions in the matter of bribery. I remember that an instance occurred when I was in Milan; it was a chance election, which I think occurred through the death of some member, and some of the papers a week afterwards came out with articles very strongly upon the corruption which had been used, and there was a scrutiny, or rather there was an examination by a Parliamentary Committee, and the candidate about whom all the fuss had been made was finally proved to have given 12 francs, or about 10 s., to a friend of his, in order to pay for conveying one of the voters to the poll. This was considered a most horrible and dreadful case, and created an immense scandal; and I could not help thinking at the time that if we had no greater scandal in England it would indeed be a great improvement.

12300. Is the majority of the Chamber usually Conservative or Liberal?—It has usually been Conservative both before and after Count Cavour's time. The majority has been always what is considered the moderate or Conservative party, as is the case with the Government of General Menabrea.

12301. Mr. Brand.] In the Italian system is there any way by which a voter can be identified; can you establish a scrutiny after the election?—Yes, you can always tell who the voter is, and whether he has voted, by looking at the list or, if necessary, going to his house and seeing if he really lives there, and so forth.

12302. But is there any number on the voting paper by which the vote can be identified?—No; you cannot identify for whom he has voted; you can only identify if he has voted. In this paper, for instance, the blank is not filled up, but there is the number of the college and the section, and where he votes for, and then you can see by turning to the register whether he has voted; but, of course, you can never tell for whom he has voted.

12303. Chairman.] Might there not be a corresponding number put on that blue paper?—Of course there might, but that is not done, I think; in fact, I may say I am certain that they do not put numbers, so that you could not tell who a person voted for.

12304. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Do the people in Milan make any secret of their political principles?—Some do and some do not. Of course there are fervent politicians who make no secret whatever; but at the same time there are a great number of quiet people who just follow the course of events, and who say very little to anybody, such as the tradesmen to whom I have referred, and whom I have employed myself.

12305. Is it universal suffrage in Italy?—No, it is a limited suffrage. I really could hardly tell what it is, at this moment, because the suffrage has been extended, owing to the extension of the taxation during the last three or four years. But I can tell you generally that the population of the city of Milan is 250,000, and it is divided into five electoral colleges or districts; the population of each college is 50,000, and the smallest college would have about 1,200 voters, and the largest about 1,800; but I fancy that the numbers have increased lately; as compared with what they were in 1861. The population has increased and the electoral suffrage has been lowered, and has taken in rather a larger section; but I should doubt whether in the whole of Italy there are more than 1,000,000 of electors for the present kingdom of Italy.

Mr. J. W. Probyn.

12306. Is great interest taken in those elections?—Yes, very great; of course the interest varies very much; for instance, in the election of 1861, I think it was the second college elected General Cialdini by an overwhelming majority; and I think it was the third college for which my friend got in, who is still a member, and they had so close a run that the first election was not valid, and they had to go through a second one.

12307. Have you had any experience of the condition of things in the agricultural districts of Italy?— I saw one election in a purely country district, or what would answer to our country districts, a very small borough called Pontassieve, which may be 15 or 20 miles from Florence. I went there on the second day of the election; but they had a very close run, indeed, between two gentlemen of very high character, as far as I could learn; the one was supported by a party called the moderate clerical party, and the other by the more moderate constitutional party, and I think that out of 1,160 voters some 850 went to the poll.

12308. Those were voters in a town, were they not?—It was as much a town as an English country borough would be a town; not more or less.

12309. Would it be a similar constituency to an English county, for instance?—No, hardly that; it would be more like an agricultural borough.

12310. Should you say this plan succeeds equally amongst agricultural voters as it does in a town amongst urban voters?—As far as I have heard, certainly it does.

12311. Has it put a stop to all influence?—Yes, I should say that it is quite free from all influence; at least, that certainly was the case in the college of Pontassieve, because the first day of the election I stayed in Florence, and I heard on the Monday morning of the close run there was at Pontassieve; and I said to some friends of mine, that I should go there the next Sunday to see the final voting; I made a good many inquiries as to the matter, and as far as I could learn, there was nothing approaching to what we should call undue influence; it was, I may say, agricultural population, quite as agricultural a population as any small borough in the south-west of England.

12312. Does the landlord or the priest exercise any influence over the voters in agricultural districts?—He exercises what influence he can.

12313. Does he take an active part in politics?—Of course that depends on circumstances, there are many who do. The priests, no doubt, have always exercised whatever influence they could; but I think it is very obvious that their influence has not been really powerful, because it is perfectly clear that the policy of the ultra party of priests has been completely in the minority; in fact, it is so much in the minority that I have found Italians who are very much opposed to that policy, who lamented that the ultra clerical party could not get a fair number of their deputies elected to Parliament.

12314. Do you think that the ballot has neutralised that influence to a great extent?—I think that it has neutralised all unfair influence. There was a great struggle made, I think it was in 1857, in the Piedmontese Parliament by the priest party to get a majority, and it was supposed that they influenced some 12 or 13 elections, but when it came to an examination there was nothing wrong proved against them. The end of their struggle was a complete triumph of Count Cavour, and his policy; so that, I think, putting all things together, we may say that the influence has not been able to do anything beyond what was fair.

12315. Has there ever been any other kind of voting but by ballot in Italy?—No, never. It was introduced when the Constitutional Government was given by Charles Albert in 1848.

12316. Chairman.] Does the possession of one of those papers give an absolute right to vote?—It gives an absolute right to vote upon the day, that is to say, if you were an elector, and came without that paper they would not admit you.

12317. Supposing I, not being an elector, by some means or other got possession of one of those papers, should I be prevented from voting?—No; but you would run the risk of being found out.

12318. But are there any inquiries made in the booth?—Yes, there may be; if you were at all suspected they would make inquiry at once.

12319. Are any representatives of the candidates present in the booth?—What they call the formation of the bureau is done in this manner; at eight or nine o'clock in the morning in the polling house, the representative of the mayor, if not the mayor himself is present when they form what is called the bureau; that is to say, four gentlemen or five gentlemen to assist the mayor in taking the votes; that is to say, they sit by all day, and see that what is going on is fair; I do not think the law prescribes anything more, but, in fact, what is really done is, that both parties are represented amongst those four persons. In all boroughs care is taken that they should represent the different parties in the electoral bureaux.

12320. Have you never heard that those papers are collected beforehand by rival candidates, or parties, and issued to people who they know will vote in one way?—I have never heard of it; that even would not affect the voting, because they do not vote with that paper; they vote with this paper (pointing to the blue paper); the white paper admits them into the polling booth, and they present that paper to the returning officer, and they give it up to him, and when he has got it and is satisfied that they are really electors, he hands them this blue paper, and they vote with it.

12321. Mr. Villiers.] Do we understand that you made particular inquiries about this yourself of different people?—Yes, I did; I took pains to see those who were of the opposite parties, to hear whether they charged bribery or intimidation, and I never heard of such a charge.

12322. Did you inquire particularly about the operation of the ballot?—Yes, I did.

12323. Are we to understand from what you have said of the qualification of the elector, that it does not go to a very low class?—I should think it must go pretty low now; but I do not know quite how low; at any rate it is quite low enough for persons to be very thankful for money, if money were going.

12324. It is but a small proportion of the whole number of the population that you spoke of as having votes?—It is about 1,000,000 out of 25,000,000, just as it was with us before 1867, it was about 1,000,000, or 1,200,000 out of 30,000,000, or 29,000,000.

12325. You stated that you do not believe that the clergy have any influence over the voters; that might be because the voter is not of a very low class, perhaps?—I think that the clergy have influence, but then it is entirely that influence of persuasion which any one man may fairly exercise over any other; but there is no power of putting pressure on, because there is no means of detecting the vote. I once, and only once, had the honour of meeting Count Cavour, and amongst the questions which I put to him was one concerning the voting, and he gave me the answer which all the politicians of Italy whom I have come across have always given to me, that nothing would induce them to alter the system of voting, and one of their chief reasons was that it nullified undue influence, and the undue influence of which they were most afraid was the clerical influence; of course there is fair clerical influence as well as unfair.

12326. What we have heard of undue clerical influence would be measured a good deal by that sort of spiritual influence, which the priest has over the people by means of the confessional; is not that in operation in Italy as well as in other Catholic countries?—I believe that they did try it, but it has gone out simply because it has failed.

12327. But the people are attached to the priests, are they not, and they have a good deal of influence?—Yes, they are very much attached to them; but what the people say is this, they are very good Roman Catholics, and they are perfectly willing to obey the priest in all spiritual matters, but as to voting for a candidate, that is a temporal matter.

12328. That is the state of the Italian population now; they are not so degraded as not to know the difference between the power that the priest ought to use and what he might be content to use?—I think that is the state of a great many with respect to the great national questions that they have had before them these last 20 years.

12329. The priests, I think, generally go with the people in Italy, so that they are more popular in their views?—In certain parts of Italy, in Lombardy and Piedmont, and so forth, I think they are, on the whole, popular.

12330. They were always against the Austrian Government, were they not?—I believe the fact to be that Lombardy and Venetia became more or less, not openly, but more or less secretly hostile on account of the Concordat. The Concordat gave such immense power to the bishops that the great bulk of the priests did not like it. The old Austrian Government completely overshot its mark; but I think that the majority of the priests, both in Piedmont and Savoy, were decidedly opponents of Count Cavour, if you take the majority of the priests; but, however, as you know, they were utterly unable to oppose him in the Parliament, because he always had a very considerable majority, and the clerical party were always in a very small minority.

12331. You mention Italy as an instance of a Catholic country where the priests have a great deal of influence with the people; do they not feel that it is useless for them to attempt to influence the voter in the manner in which he gives his vote?—That is quite their feeling upon the matter.

12332. Do you find that the people having the vote by ballot are so attached to it that nothing would induce them to change the system?—Yes, that is what men of all parties have told me in Italy, and certainly the contrast between all the elections that I have seen in Milan and other parts of Italy, and all those which I have seen in England, even the best of them, is so much in favour of the ballot that it has completely converted me to that system of voting, or I should not say perhaps converted me to it, for I was always more or less favourable to it, but it has completely clenched the nail.

12333. Is there ever any disturbance at the time of taking the votes?—I have never seen the least disturbance.

12334. Have you ever seen the civil or military authority resorted to upon those occasions?—No, never; and I do not think I have ever heard of it.

12336. Was the proportion larger amongst the higher class colleges in Milan than in the lower class colleges?—I cannot say; I do not think that there is any very great difference. The city is very equally divided from the centre into five electoral colleges or districts, and I think that there is not any very great disproportion between them; I mean nothing like such a disproportion as we have in London, between the east and the west class, in the class of population; there are of course more populous quarters but I do not think there is such a difference as with us.

12337. The small proportion of voters that you gave does not show a very lively interest in politics on the part of the voters, does it?—I think it does for this reason, that almost all candidates who put up begin by stating what was, of course, the great question at both the elections in 1861 and 1865, that is to say, they insisted upon Rome and Venice forming a part of the Italian Kingdom. Of course the Radical party wanted to go towards that object by any and every means, even war if necessary; but the more moderate party, the followers of Cavour, Ricasoli, and Menabrea, and that class, were more anxious that it should be done in conformity with the opportunities which the state of European politics might bring out; the consequence was that a very large number of persons did not take the trouble of voting, because they said, "We are all for this object, and whether it is Signor So-and-so or Signor So-and-so it is very much the same thing, we do not care very much who gets in." But where there is any other difference, as there was in the case of Pontassieve, I think that a very large proportion came to the poll.

Mr. J. W. Probyn.

12338. Do you think that there is as keen an interest in the elections in Italy on the part of the voters as there is in this country?—I think that a little depends upon the districts and the circumstances; I think that very often it is not so keen, simply because there is a sort of general feeling that they want to get certain advantages which are so generally desired by the whole population, that perhaps they do not take the interest that they used to do; I believe that that is the case in many parts.

12339. Is there as great a wish on the part of the higher and richer classes of society to get into the Chamber of Deputies as there is in England?—Yes, I think so; and I think that the desire is increasing every day.

12340. Are the members paid?—I think they have certain expenses paid, or something of that sort.

12341. You do not know whether they are paid for attendance?—No, but I think not; I should be sorry to say positively. The Italian Minister would tell that in a moment, but my impression is that they are not paid, but that they have their travelling expenses paid, or something of that kind.

12342. As a rule, are the candidates rich men or poor men?—I think many of them are poor men, because of there being no expense connected with the elections; of course it is not a question of money with them at all, but I should say that where they have not been rich men, they have been generally men of some little literary standing or some little notoriety in their own districts.

12343. You spoke of a proviso on the back of the blue paper, that the elector might obtain some other voter to write the name of the candidate for whom he voted, if he was unable to do it himself; did you see that put in practice upon any occasion?—I think I did upon one occasion, and only one. It was in one of the Florence Colleges that I saw it. Some man came up, and I really forget whether he could not write or whether he had lost his hand, or something of that kind, but he was allowed to bring up a friend.

12344. It was only done in the case of one voter?— That is the only case that I ever saw, and it is very rare, I believe.

12345. Did you see it done in that agricultural constituency of Pontassieve, of which you spoke?—No, it was in Florence itself, I am almost certain.

12346. Did you ever hear of its being done to any great extent?—No, I did not; on the contrary, I think it is quite the exception.

12347. Of course it is obvious that it might be done by persons, so as to influence the voting?—Yes, it might be so; and several of my Italian friends used to say that they should like to see that clause struck out, and that a man who could not read or write should not vote.

12348. You never heard, did you, of its being done in any way to exercise undue influence?—Never.

12349. When you speak of the Conservative party having more power in Italy than those of opposite politics, what is that party; is it the party of landowners or priests?—No; the Conservative party is not divided at all in that way. What are called the Conservative party, are the party who wish, and who have wished ever since 1859 and before, to bring about a single kingdom of Italy, or at the most two, if we go back a few years. Their policy has changed very much according to circumstances; at any rate, they wished to throw out all foreign influence, direct or indirect, from Italy, but they wish to do it with as little disturbance to European politics as possible.

12350. Is there any part of the country in which that party has its particular strength; does its strength mainly lie in the country, or in the towns?—I think that there are no such divisions; I think it mainly lies in the north, the north being a more civilised, and comparatively speaking, a calmer population than the Sicilians and Neapolitans. Its strength, no doubt, lies chiefly amongst the northern population; but there is no distinction, such as we understand, between town and county, I think.

12351. The ballot is now in operation in the whole of Italy, is it not?—Yes, in the whole of Italy.

12352. Mr. James.] Do I understand you to say that there is no process of nomination at all?—None whatever.

12353. Of course that necessitates that the person must write the name of the candidate for whom he votes?—No, that would not be necessary.

12354. If he comes to vote for anyone, and there is no nomination, of course it is at large for whom he may vote?—Of course it would be very easy to introduce a little change in that respect by saying that certain names must be given in, within a given time, to the mayor; but that is not done.

12355. Is the mayor that you speak of a government official, or is he elected?—The municipal body is purely elective. I am not quite sure whether the mayor is purely elective or whether they elect three, and the King, on the advice of his responsible minister, has the power of nominating one out of the three; but I think that the mayor is purely elective.

12356. It was different, was it not, in the southern parts of Italy, before 1861, from what it was in the north?—Yes, before 1861, with the exception of just a few months in 1848, when Ferdinand the Second gave them a constitution. There was no Constitutional Government at all except in 1848, for a few months, when it was given and then taken away.

12357. Mr. Howes.] When you say that there is no nomination, do you mean that it is not ascertained, before the election, who are the candidates?—It is ascertained by the party, because they have their public meetings, inasmuch as they have the same freedom of public meetings as we have in this country.

12358. Then it is ascertained, in fact, who are the candidates?—Yes, it is ascertained; but there is no nomination-day, or any hustings, or anything approaching to it.

12359. Is there anything compared to what we call a system of canvassing?—No; that does not exist in Italy.

12360. And at those public meetings, is it suggested to the electors for whom they may vote, or ought to vote?—Yes; each party has its particular candidate, and his praises are sung at the public meetings; and anyone is allowed to speak, just exactly as it is done with us; but no one is bound to vote for any particular man; he may vote for any one citizen that he chooses; but of course course the party usually name a man as their candidate.

12361. You say, I think, that the elector writes the name of the person for whom he wishes to vote, in the voting room?—He writes the name of the person. Only one candidate can be elected in any Italian college or district, and he writes his name upon the paper, at a little table apart, just as the table at the side of this room may be distant from the Chairman's seat.

12362. Is care taken that no one should see him write?—Care is taken that no one should see what he writes; but of course he can be seen writing, just as I could be seen writing if I went to that side table and wrote a name; but nothing more than that.

12363. Are not the names of the candidates suggested to him by any official in the room?—No; that would not be tolerated for a moment.

12364. The knowledge of the names must be derived from some one outside before the election?—Yes; before the election, certainly.

12365. Chairman.] With regard to the proportion of electors who vote, have you ever had any experience of an English election?—Yes.

Mr. J. W. Probyn.

13 July 1869.

12366. Have you found that a large number of voters are not very anxious to vote?—Yes; I have found a considerable number who would not vote.

12367. And a considerable proportion only do vote on account of the system of canvassing, do they not?—Yes; they are asked over and over and over again, and what they call bothered into it.

12368. Do you think that if the voters in England were left entirely to themselves, the proportion that would vote in those elections, of which you have had knowledge, would be about the same as in Italy?—Yes; or I should think rather larger, because the constitutional system is young in Italy, and has to be understood, which, of course, is not the case here.

12369. You would not say that the people of Italy were altogether apathetic about the elections that you have seen?—No; certainly not.

Mr. William Nicholson Hodgson, a Member of the House, Examined.

12370. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You are now Member for West Cumberland, are you not?—Yes.

Mr. W. N. Hodgson, M.P

12371. At the last election were you a candidate for the city of Carlisle?—I was.

12372. Are you a Director of the London and North Western Railway Company?—I am.

12373. That company have works in the city of Carlisle, have they not?—Yes; close adjoining that city.

12374. But within the Parliamentary boundary?—Yes; within the Parliamentary boundary.

12375. Have they more than one set of works?—They have what we call the locomotive works, and the goods warehouse, separately.

12376. Are they in different wards?—No; they are all in the same ward.

12377. Was there a long period during which you remained a candidate before the election?—Yes; I should think three months.

12378. Did you canvass the borough personally?—No; not personally. I stated to my committee at the commencement of the election that I could not undertake to canvass for the borough; the constituency was so much enhanced, that I could not undertake to do so; but that I should visit the principal establishments in the town, and see the workpeople generally.

12379. Did you do so?—I did so.

12380. Did you visit the works of the London and North Western Railway?—I studiously avoided doing so until I was pressed by my committee to go. I had been to the Caledonian station, and I had visited what they call the Citadel station and the people there, and the committee said that the workpeople at the London and North Western were offended because I had not been to see them, and they begged particularly that I would go, but I refused to go until I was pressed very much to go; and at length I consented to go.

12381. Was that by the chairman of the Botchergate Ward, in which the works are?—Yes; he was one of the party who pressed me to go, and the chairman of the general committee also.

12382. Was it in consequence of an understanding that the workmen wished that you should come there that you went eventually?—It was entirely so.

12383. Is there any power in the directors of the London and North Western Company singly to act with regard to the workpeople employed, either of dismissing or of appointing them?—No, certainly not.

12384. At the Board of the London and North Western Railway Company, I presume that you are not all of one politics?—No; I should think that we are very nearly equally divided.

12385. And of all shades?—Yes, of all shades.

12386. Is it a matter perfectly well understood at the board that no political use is made of the board?—Certainly.

12387. You say that you went to visit the London and North Western works?—I did; I went in company with the chairman of the ward committee, Mr. Armstrong, and one or two members of the committee of workmen, who had formed themselves into a separate committee. Upon entering the works, I saw three or four of the men, not for the purpose of canvassing them, but of thanking them for the votes which they had already promised and offered to me; and, when talking to some of the workmen, the foreman of the establishment came up to me and said, "You are standing in a very awkward place, Mr. Hodgson; if you do not mind, you will have an engine running over you. I would recommend you to come in here, into one of the sheds, and the workpeople shall come and see you." I accordingly withdrew with him into one of the worksheds adjoining, and I believe into his office, and perhaps a dozen or 15 men very soon came into the office where I was. While I was talking to them, I told them particularly, "I have come to pay my respects to you, in consequence of having promised me your votes, and to thank you; but there has been a great deal said in the newspapers and elsewhere as to the railway screw. Let me assure you that no such thing exists, and that you are at perfect liberty to vote for who you think proper. If you vote for me, I shall be very much obliged to you; if you do not not vote for me, you will never be marked or punished in any way; and if you do vote for me, you are not to expect any favour from me." Those words I distinctly said to them. At the same time, while I was talking to them, there was a person passed the door of the office. I believe his name is Thompson; he was a driver, and had just come from Preston, and he called out (I heard his voice distinctly), "Those that are for Church and State, my lads, and are for Mr. Hodgson, hold up your hands." As he passed the door I heard that; and 12 or 13 of the men that were present all held up their hands but one. That man did not do so; he said he would not promise his vote to anyone until the day of the election. I said, "I am sorry you you will not do so;" but I said no more. That was all that passed on that occasion.

12388. Was the foreman present at that time?—Mr. Worthington, the chief foreman, the head man of the works was there.

12389. Was that the only assembly of workmen of any kind that came to you?—The only assembly.

12390. And they, you say, were about 12 or 13?—There may have been 15, but that would be the outside, I am quite sure.

12391. It has been said that certain men were turned off after the election; was any man either reported by you, or by anybody on your behalf, as having voted against you, with a view of having anything whatever done to him?—Certainly not by me, and certainly not with my knowledge.

12392. Was there an order sent out from the general board at Crewe, with respect to reducing the establishment before the election?—Yes, I have a copy of it here; it was sent from Crewe.

12393. Was it to reduce a certain class of workmen?—To put out 10 furnaces, which would reduce 20 men; two men from each furnace. We were going to make 70 engines in place of 130.

12394. Was that known before the election?—Not to me, certainly not.

12396. Were they all voters?—No, they were not.

12397. How many were voters?—There were 11, I think, voters out of the 20 that were discharged; five of them voted for me, and six against me.

12398. That is out of the whole number of voters who were removed?—Yes, that is so; the other men who were discharged were not voters.

12399. As a director had you anything to do with that?—Nothing whatever; no more than any gentleman upon this Committee. I have here a copy of the letter which was sent from Crewe to the foreman (I obtained it since), giving him notice that the men should be discharged, and that letter was received on the 12th of November.

12400. Mr. Leatham.] To what foreman was that letter sent?—To the foreman of the locomotive works at Carlisle, Mr. Worthington.

12401. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] There were, I understand, about 150 voters, or rather more, in the London and North Western employ at Carlisle?—Probable there were about that number.

12402. And the removal of anybody at all was under that order from Crewe, and only applied to the furnaces?—Yes, entirely so.

12403. And that would have taken place whether there had been an election or not?—Yes, whether there had been an election or not. This is the letter from Crewe, dated the 12th of November 1868: "Dear Sir, I have received instructions to reduce the manufacture of new engines at these works from 120 per year, as at present, to 70 per year. In consequence of this, I shall not be able to send you any more orders for smithwork for new engines. You will, therefore, have to discharge your smiths engaged on this work; and this, I suppose, will make a reduction of about 10 fires;" that is from the establishment at Crewe, and it is signed by Mr. Stubbs; Mr. Ramsbotham is at the head of the locomotive department, but it is not from him; it is written by his order, I presume.

12404. Mr. Leatham.] Have you ever recommended workmen for employment at either the works or the station?—Yes.

12405. That has occurred frequently, has it not?—It has occurred now and then, certainly.

12406. Is it your habit to do so?—It is not my habit to do so; but I have done so.

12407. It is well known, I presume, that your recommendation carries great weight?—I suppose it would. If I were to recommend a person who was fit for the place, I presume it would; but I generally say, "If the man suits you," if I do recommend anybody.

12408. Mr. Armstrong is the foreman, is he not?—No, Mr. Worthington is the foreman of the locomotive works.

12409. Mr. Armstrong, the chairman of the ward committee, has no connection with the works?—None whatever.

12410. You say that the letter from Crewe was dated the 12th of November; when did the election take place?—I think the election was on the 17th.

12411. The contents of that letter did not transpire, I think, until after the election?—I am told by the officer that the reason why it was not immediately made public was this: that the list of wages was made up to the previous day, which was Thursday, and this letter was received on the Friday; and this letter was not promulgated to the workmen till the following week; when the following pay day came, which was after the election, and there was no notice taken of it during the election whatever. To show that the workmen had free liberty to vote as they thought proper, I have a letter here which was written from Crewe by Mr. Rigg, who is second under Mr. Ramsbotham, dated the 13th of November 1868, from the locomotive department, Crewe station: "Sir, I send for your perusal a couple of letters from the Parliamentary candidates for Carlisle, and wish you to be good enough to make the best arrangements you can (consistent with the safe working of the traffic) for every voter in the service of this department, at Carlisle, to record his vote freely, and in accordance with his own judgment. Yours truly, John Rigg."

12412. Do you know Martlew?—I know that there is such a person.

12413. He is the foreman of the smiths' shop, is he not?—Yes, he is.

12414. Did he accompany you over any portion of the works?—I think he did.

12415. This is the man, I think, who induced the men to form a committee in your favour?—I do not know. I do not know that I said anything further to any of the workmen respecting their votes than what I have already said. I went into some shops and saw some men; but I did not ask one single man for his vote.

12416. Mr. Brand.] I understand you to say that you were induced by your committee to visit the men in the employ of the London and North Western Company?—I was.

12417. Was that against your own judgment?—It was; I would much rather not have gone into the works at all, but as I had been to some other establishments adjoining, namely, Messrs. Cowan and Sheldon, who are very large founders, and had seen the men in their works, the committee thought that, having been there and at the Caledonian Station also, I ought to pay my respects to our own workmen, and I did so.

12418. Mr. Leatham.] Why did you object to go to your works?—Because, at the previous election, it had been said that the screw was applied to the men, and I was determined that it should not be said, as far as I was concerned, at that time.

12419. And yet you went?—I did go, but it was by the advice of those who, I thought, were competent to advise me; but, if you will allow me to state, with regard to the London and North Western Works, I am not prepared to say exactly the number of workmen who voted for me, but I know that a large majority of them did; that I am quite aware of; but, if you will take other establishments in the town, for instance, the Maryport and Carlisle Railway, of which the Honourable Baronet, Sir Wilfred Lawson, is a director, you will find that a great many of those men voted against me and voted for the Honourable Baronet.

12420. Did the Honourable Baronet canvass them?—I do not know; I am not conversant whether he did or did not; but I only say that those voters voted for him. Upon the Maryport and Carlisle Railway, of which he is a director, there are 26 or 27 voters; and of those, 14 voted for Sir Wilfrid Lawson, 13 for Mr. Potter, and four for Hodgson. The corporations are also a body opposed to me, taken as a body, and they have a large number of voters under them in their employ, and, if you will take the list, which I hold in my hand, of the number of persons who were employed by them, you will find that there were five voted for Hodgson, 22 for Potter, and 23 for Lawson.

12421. Has your attention been drawn to Mr. Irving's evidence?—I read it.

12422. Was your attention drawn to Question No. 9362, where he is asked, "Do you know how those men voted?" (speaking of the men employed at the works); to which his answer is, "Yes; 136 voted plumpers for Mr. Hodgson, the Conservative candidate; two split between Mr. Hodgson and Sir Wilfrid Lawson; one between Mr. Hodgson and Mr. Potter, and 15 split between Mr. Potter and Sir Wilfrid Lawson." Is that substantially correct?—I really do not know; I have not looked at the poll, and cannot tell. I know that a large majority voted for me, but I cannot give the particular number. I cannot say that it is correct, because I have not analysed or counted them; I do not mean to say that it is not correct.

12423. Assuming this to be correct, of those 15 men who split between Mr. Potter and Sir Wilfrid Lawson, five were subsequently turned off?—Along with six who voted for me.

12424. Out of the 136?—I do not know; I am not conversant with it further than by a return which I received from the foreman; I knew nothing about the men being discharged, or why they were discharged, until I came to make inquiry about it, and then I found out the reason; it had nothing whatever to do with the election; I believe it is impossible for any person to tell men more plainly or more openly that they were perfectly at liberty to vote as they thought proper than I did.

12425. Chairman.] Who had the selection of the men that were to be discharged?—Mr. Worthington.

12426. And he was a canvasser for you, was he not?—I do not know that he canvassed anybody for me; I am not aware that he did; he voted for me.

12427. Did he accompany you when you visited the works?—It was in his office where the show of hands took place, I believe.

12428. Did he show in any way at that time that he was a supporter of yours?—Not the least that I know of, I do not think he did, further than being with me; I do not remember that he spoke to any of the men.

12429. Were you aware that he was a supporter of yours?—Yes, he always has been.

12430. Was it known at the time of your visit that there would be any reduction of hands?—No, I did not know it myself.

12431. You do not know whether it was known in the works or not?—No, I do not.

12432. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Was it an order of the directors that this reduction should take place?—The order was from Mr. Ramsbotham; the board had ordered a reduction in the number of engines, and he ordered a reduction of the men in consequence. If they did not want so many engines, they did not want so many men; that order would go from the board, and he would have nothing more to say to it, but to discharge the men.

12433. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] And that was in consequence of the order respecting the number of engines?—Entirely; it reduced the manufacture from 120 to 70 a year; it had nothing in the world to do with the election.

12434. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Was not this charge of political influence made at the half-yearly meeting of the London and North Western Company?—It was made to the shareholders; the honourable Member, Sir Wilfred Lawson, made it, and they would not hear him; the meeting would not attend to it at all.

12435. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Had you either the power or the will to have dismissed the men for their votes?—No, I had no such power; in fact, I have no individual power, I can only act as one of the board.

12436. Chairman.] Mr. Worthington had the power, had he not?—Mr. Worthington had the power in consequence of his receiving the letter from Mr. Ramsbotham at Crewe.

12437. But, practically, he had the power?—He had instructions from his superior officer to do it, and he did it.

12438. Practically, I say, Mr. Worthington had the power of selecting who were to stay, and who were to go?—Yes, I suppose he had, and he gives a very good reason for the selection he made in his statement to me.

12439. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] What is his statement?—That they were inferior workmen, generally, that he discharged, and men that had been a short time in the service.

12440. Mr. Hunt.] Is it your belief that not one man was sent away on account of his vote?—Certainly not.

12441. Mr. Gathorne Hardy,] Have you any written statement of Mr. Worthington's?—I have a written statement of Mr. Neale's.

Mr. JOHN SCOTT ARMSTRONG, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. S. Armstrong.

12442. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] YOU are a resident in Carlisle, are you not?—Yes.

12443. Were you chairman of one of the ward committees for Mr. Hodgson at the last election?—I was.

12444. Was that the ward in which the London and North Western Works are?—Yes.

12445. Was any communication made to you from some of the workpeople there?—Yes, frequently.

12446. Was that before Mr. Hodgson ever went to the works?—Yes; Mr. Hodgson intimated to us that he would not go near the works.

12447. But he afterwards did go with you, did he not?—Yes, he did.

12448. What was the reason of his going?—At the general committee meeting it was decided that as he had always canvassed the town and asked every voter at the previous elections, he should during that canvass do just the same; but he said that it was impossible for him to do so as there were upwards of 4,000 voters, but he agreed that he would canvass the large works in the town where he could find the men in their works, instead of going to their homes. I went with him to the Caledonian Works, the Glasgow and South Western Works, and the North Eastern, and returning from there we met the chairman of the general committee, Mr. Saul, of Carlisle, and a consultation took place between us three as to the desirability of Mr. Hodgson visiting the London and North Western Works. Mr. Hodgson still persisted in not going near the place, because, he said, that people would say so much about it; he would not go near them, and he did not care how the election terminated. We insisted upon his going, and at last he said, "Well, it is your proposal; I will go in the afternoon, otherwise I would go nowhere near them." I pointed out to him that if he did not go to the London and North Western Works, seeing that he had been to other works, the men would naturally say, "Oh, he has us safe under his thumb; we will have to vote as we are ordered, and he will not come to see us." I pointed that out to him, and it was at last decided that he should go.

12449. Did some of the workpeople that you visited ask you about it?—Yes, frequently. I may mention that before this a portion of the workmen in the London and North Western Company had actually formed themselves into a committee to assist Mr. Hodgson in his canvass.

12450. Did you yourself personally canvass among the men?—Yes, at their homes; never at the works.

12451. Was that a proposal on the part of the men?—Yes.

12452. Did you find them disposed to assist Mr. Hodgson, or not?—Yes, very much so; many regretted that they had not a dozen votes to give him.

12453. Mr. Bright.] What is your position in Carlisle, are you connected with those works?—No.

12454. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Do you live in Botchergate Ward?—No, I do not live there; I am a builder and contractor in Carlisle. I have nothing whatever to do with the railway works.

12455. Mr. Bright.] Do you work for the railway company occasionally?—We have occasionally, but not lately; I used to reside in that ward, and after the election in 1861, I was appointed chairman of that ward, and I think that they have always kept me there since.

12456. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Your politics have been always in that way?—Yes, always.

12457. You heard Mr. Hodgson's account of what passed with respect to the men; can you confirm it?—Yes, in every particular; with the exception, perhaps, that when the show of hands really did take place I counted the hands that were held up, and there were only 12, and one did not hold up his hand; when this man told us to hold up hands for Mr. Hodgson, I said, "A very good idea; let us hold up hands." I said that myself.

12458. Mr. Leatham.] In fact, you called for a show of hands?—Substantially so; this man outside called for it.

12459. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] This man outside called for it, and you approved of it?—Yes; I said, "A very good idea." This one man that refused said that he might be as good as others at the day of the election, but he would not promise his vote to any man. He voted for Potter and Lawson, and he is at the works still; and he moved, I believed, a resolution condemnatory of Mr. Irving's evidence before this Committee.

12460. That was the thirteenth man?—Yes; Mr. Hodgson said that the foreman was present, but I remember that he was not present, he just merely went to tell the men; he did not come into the room where we were.

12461. Do you remember at one of the shops a man telling Mr. Hodgson that he could not vote for him?—Yes; he said that he could not conscientiously vote for any man who held to the Irish Church, and Mr. Hodgson clapped him on the back, and said, "My good man, do not trouble your conscience for the sake of me."

12462. Is that man still at the works?—Yes, he is still at the works.

12463. Mr. Leatham.] Was that Hodgkinson?—No; he is still there. This is another man whose name I do not remember; it was in the waggon shops.

12464. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did you go through the works that afternoon?—Yes.

12465. Were you accompanied by any foreman or overlooker, or did you go alone?—Mr. Worthington, the head man, did not go with us at all; when we went into what they call the repairing shops, that is, the London and North Western repairing shops, we went into the smith's shop, and the head smith, Martlew, was in the shop, but but he did not go with us round with the men, he did not even point out a single man to us. The man who really did was a lame man, a sort of time-keeper on the works, and he would just merely mention the men's names when we went round with him to tell us who they were.

12466. But he was not the foreman?—No; he is a man with one leg; he just occupies the lodge.

12467. Did you hear anything of that order for reducing the number of the workpeople before the election was over?—No, not till after the election. This man Martlew came to me after the election, and told me that he had got into a mess, he thought; I said, "What with?" and he said that there was an order come down to reduce so many men out of the smith's shop, but for fear it should be said that he used that order as a screw on the men to force them to vote for Mr. Hodgson, he did not make it public. He came to me a week after the election and told me this; and I said, "Well, how many men have you discharged?" He said that there were 20 men in all discharged, but there was only 11 of them voters, six of whom voted for Mr. Hodgson, and five voted for Messrs. Potter and Lawson.

12468. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Did I understand you to say that the workmen passed a resolution condemnatory of Mr. Irving's evidence?—Yes, since Mr. Irving gave his evidence.

12469. Have you that resolution with you?—I think one of the workmen who is here has some account of it.

12470. Will he be called?—Yes, he was at the meeting; I was not at the meeting.

12471. What was his name?—Thomas Richardson.

12472. Mr. James.] Was this the only occasion that you went to the works at all?—The only occasion that I went there canvassing.

12473. Did you canvass them alone, or had you anybody connected with the works with you?—We canvassed them individually.

12474. Were you ever accompanied by anybody connected with the works?—No; when I canvassed them myself, I think the solicitor was with me, and also in the ward.

12475. Was Mr. Worthington or any person connected with the works upon the district committee?—No, not on the district committee.

12476. Or upon the general committee?—No, nor upon the general committee; they afterwards formed themselves into a committee themselves.

12477. In what way?—In this way, that there was so much said about the railway screw in the papers, that they said that they would form themselves into separate committees, so that nobody need go not belonging to themselves to canvass them, and they did form themselves into a committee.

12478. But the foreman of the works, I suppose, was a member of the committee?—The foreman was not a member, I think, not Mr. Worthington.

12479. The under-foreman?—This Martlew, I think, was, but I think he was only an ordinary member; he was not chairman of the committee; I was never at the committee meetings.

12480. Mr. Hodgson, of course, does not go to the works at Carlisle often; he is personally unknown to the men almost?—Personally, there is not a man in Cumberland better known than Mr. Hodgson is to everybody.

12481. But I suppose he does not go to the workmen at the works?—No.

12482. What is your idea of that proportion of 136 voting in one way, and 15 the other; do you attribute that entirely to political opinion?—I really could not answer that; I do not know whether that is the case or not; we have had that sort of case in Carlisle, both with the corporation men and others.

12483. You do not find it general with the working classes, that the proportion is 16 to one, do you?—I find it in this way, that wherever the master's opinions are pretty well known, the men generally go with him.

12484. But you do not call Mr. Hodgson a master, do you?—No.

12485. Then that would not be the reason?—No; Mr. Hodgson is very popular amongst the men.

12486. I thought you gave me as a reason, when I mentioned the proportion, that where the master's opinion was well known the workmen went with him?—No, not as regards Mr. Hodgson. The railway company is a public body, and Mr. Hodgson cannot be a master.

12487. Then that answer affords no explanation, does it?—No, not as far as that goes. I do not know how they came to be that way; they always have been that way ever since the establishment of the works; and at the municipal elections they have always voted for the Conservative party, as a rule.

12488. How long has Mr. Martlew been there?—The works were established in 1856 or 1857, and he has been there ever since, I think.

12489. Mr. Leatham.] You were present, were you not, at this show of hands?—Yes.

12490. Was Hodgkinson the man who would not hold up his hands?—I think it was he.

12491. Do you remember what he had in his hands?—He had a screw-driver in his hand.

12492. Do you remember his asking you whether you wanted a screw-driver?—He held up his hands and said, "Is there anything of this astir?" Mr. Hodgson distinctly told him that there was no such thing; he said he would be very glad if the men voted for him, but if they did not, he could not help it.

12493. You never dismissed men on account of their votes, I suppose?—No, not on account of their votes.

12494. Do you know John Fenney, of Caldewside?—Yes; he is a labourer.

12495. Did you dismiss him on account of his vote?—I did not dismiss him.

12496. You were not there when he was dismissed?—No.

12497. You were not present?—No; but now I recollect this John Fenney did not start to work for us till after the election; he was not working for us at the time of the election.

12498. Was he not employed for 14 years by the Messrs. Armstrong and their father?—He was never 14 years employed by us; labourers are constantly coming and going; we have perhaps a dozen stationary labourers, but the others are employed just as trade may require.

12499. Do I understand you to say, that you were not there when your brother discharged him?—I was not.

12500. Mr. Brand.] I understand you to say that Mr. Hodgson is very popular with the working men in the employment of the London and North Western Company?—Yes.

Mr. J. S. Armstrong.

13 July 1869.

12501. And that those men are, generally speaking, Conservatives?—Yes, they are, according to their votes.

12502. Why did the Committee lay so much stress upon Mr. Hodgson visiting those men?—Simply because those men of the radical press might have said that he did not go to those men, because he had them under his thumb already; that he was a director, and that they were bound to vote for him; that was the ground.

12503. But according to your statement, if they had been left alone, they would equally have voted for Mr. Hodgson?—We expected it, but we could not tell it, of course.

12504. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Are there any Irish employed in those works at Carlisle?—I do not know that there are.

12505. Is there any jealousy on the part of ordinary English labourers, with regard to the Irish labourers?—No, I think not; I do not know that there are any Irish people there at all.

12506. Mr. Hunt.] Are you a member of the Town Council?—No.

12507. Are the town council principally Liberals or Conservatives?—I think there are five Conservatives, and the others are all Liberal.

12508. How many are there altogether?—Forty or 41; I do not remember which.

12509. Are there many minor appointments in the gift of the town council?—Yes, there is the city treasurership, the city surveyorship, and the collectorship; and those are all held by Liberals.

12510. But there are other minor appointments, are there not?—Yes; there are the street scavengers, for instance. I see by the list which Mr. Hodgson produced to-day, that of them, about five voted for him, and 23 or 24 voted for the other gentlemen, Messrs. Potter and Lawson. Then again, I think there is one list which Mr. Hodgson omitted to give in: the gasworks are in the hands of the corporation.

12511. Do politics at all help men to get appointments under the town council of Carlisle?—It appears so; I know that one man voted this last time at the gasworks who never would vote against Mr. Hodgson before.

12512. Are the gasworks in the hands of the corporation?—Yes, the gasworks are in the hands of the corporation; there were eight voted for Mr. Hodgson, and 21 for Mr. Potter, and 24 for Sir Wilfrid Lawson, out of the men employed in the gasworks.

12513. Do you know whether the members of the corporation use their influence with those in their employ?—I must leave the Committee to draw their own inference upon that subject; I know that in the case of one scavenger, who was going up to poll for Mr. Hodgson, one of the town council went and got him by the arm and pulled him away, and he afterwards voted for Potter and Lawson.

12514. Chairman.] Who were those members which you read just now?—Men employed in the gasworks at Carlisle; eight voted for Hodgson, 21 for Potter, and 24 for Lawson. Mr. Irving, who gave his evidence here, is chairman of the gas committee.

12515. Mr. Brand.] Have any of those eight who voted for Mr. Hodgson been discharged?—I do not know.

12516. Mr. Hunt.] Who is Mr. Ferguson?—Mr. Ferguson of the Holmhead Works, a very respectable firm.

12517. Is he a Liberal or a Conservative?—He is the chairman of the Liberal party.

12518. Are there many voters employed at that mill?—I believe there are about 130, but I can't say; I do not know exactly.

12519. Do you know whether those men came in a body to vote at the last election?—I do not think they came in a body, but I know from report that above 100 voted for Potter and Lawson, and two or three for Hodgson.

12520. Do you know how they went to the poll?—No, I do not know that.

12521. Do you know a man of the name of Nathan Farmer?—Yes, I know him.

12522. What is he?—He is a partner in another manufacturing concern.

12523. Do you know anything about how his men voted?—Nothing but from hearsay.

12524. What did you hear about them?—I saw an account in the paper last week only, that only one man out of seven voted for Mr. Hodgson.

12525. Do you know what means were taken to induce them to vote as they did?—No, I do not know that.

12526. You do not know how they were brought to the poll?—No.

12527. Were you present at the indignation meeting that was held in Carlisle?—No, I was not.

12528. Do you know as a fact that the Liberal employers of labour in Carlisle used very great influence with their workmen to induce them to vote for the Liberal candidates?—I know that whenever they are Liberals the workmen generally go with them; I do not like to say what power they use.

12529. Mr. Leatham.] You never heard of a case of intimidation on the part of a Liberal master over his workmen in Carlisle, did you?—I do not like to say that, because we hear lots of things, but I do not like to say anything that I do not know of my own knowledge; one hears lots of accounts.

12530. You never verified them, I suppose?—No.

12531. Chairman.] You gave the Committee just now the proportions of the men in the gasworks who voted for each of the candidates, and you said that the Committee must draw their own inference; what inference do you draw from this proportion?—You have the chairman a very strong partisan, and you have the manager a strong partisan of the Liberal party.

12532. I ask you what inference you draw?—I draw the inference that they would have to vote as they were asked to vote.

12533. On account of the proportions in which they voted?—I am just putting this against the railway company's men.

12534. How many railway employés voted for Mr. Hodgson?—According to Mr. Irving, 136. I do not dispute it; but I do not know whether it is correct or not; I have not looked to see.

12535. How many voted against him?—Fifteen or 16, I think.

12536. What inference do you draw from those numbers?—The same inference, I dare say.

12537. Mr. Leatham.] You have mentioned Mr. Ferguson's name, but have you ever heard Mr. Ferguson accused of putting on the screw?—One sees things in the papers.

12538. Is

12538. Is it stated in the papers that he put on the screw?—I have seen it stated in the opposing papers. I do not mean to say that he did it.

12539. You do not believe that he did?—I do not say that.

12540. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Do you think there is a sort of esprit de corps in the different establishments to go the same way as the leading members?—Yes, I think so.

Mr. J. S. Armstrong.

13 July 1869.

THOMAS RICHARDSON, called in; and Examined.

Thomas Richardson.

12541. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] YOU are a breaksman in the employ of the London and North Western Railway Company, are you not?—I am.

12542. Were you at the meeting which took place in consequence of Mr. Irving's evidence?—Yes.

12543. Was that largely attended?—Very largely.

12544. Who called the meeting?—It was the general feeling of the men.

12545. Who took the chair at it?—Arthur Woodhouse.

12546. Is he one of the workmen?—Yes.

12547. Do you know how he did vote?—He had no vote.

12548. Were nearly all those who had votes there?—Yes, I think so.

12549. Were some that voted both ways there?—Yes.

12550. Did one of those who moved one of the resolutions vote for Sir Wilfrid Lawson and Mr. Potter, do you remember?—I cannot say.

12551. Thomas Hodgkinson, for instance?—Yes, I believe he did.

12552. Was the resolution carried?—Yes; I do not know whether he moved it or seconded it.

12553. But he spoke in favour of one of the motions?—The resolution which Hodgkinson moved was for a copy of the report of the meeting to go to the "Carlisle Patriot," and the "Carlisle Journal"; I believe that was it.

12554. Was this resolution carried: "Resolved—That, in justice to those who have been so falsely slandered by Mr. John Irving, steps be taken to bring the real facts before the Parliamentary Elections Committee"?—Yes.

12555. Is it in consequence of this resolution that you have come here?—Yes.

12556. Did you yourself hear Mr. Hodgson express any opinion to the workpeople as to any coercion being exercised towards them?—Not any whatever.

12557. Do you remember what he said?—Yes; I went along with Mr. Hodgson to the Caledonian yard, the Citadel station, the waggon works, the creosote works, before we went to the locomotive department, the engine shed.

12558. Did Mr. Hodgson tell the workmen that he saw, that they were perfectly at liberty to vote as they pleased?—I heard him say so on several occasions during our visit through the works.

12559. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Did that meeting represent the unanimous feeling of the workmen?—It did.

12560. Mr. James.] Did you take any part in canvassing the workmen at all?—Yes; I was on one of the ward committees.

12561. Is it your idea that the political opinion of the workmen in the establishment is fairly represented, that 136 of them are Conservatives, and 15 Liberals?—Yes, I believe so; I believe a great many more would have voted for Mr. Hodgson, had it not been for the blue party coming round; and when they went to a house, if they inquired and found out that a man was going to vote for the Conservatives, they said, "Oh! I suppose you are a railway man;" and when the man gave answer, "Yes"—"Oh! the screw is on; it is no use waiting any longer here." The blue is the Liberal party.

12562. Was that said by the Liberal party?—Yes, at several places they said so.

12563. And they said so, according to your view without there being the slightest foundation for it?—There was no foundation whatever.

12564. Do you think, therefore, that the 136 men all conscientiously entertained those Conservative opinions, whilst only 15 were Liberals?—Yes, I believe so.

12565. That was not the general proportion of the opinions of the working men in Carlisle, was it?—I cannot say for that.

12566. There was scarcely that proportion of nine Conservatives to one Liberal?—That was the general feeling amongst the men, I think, to vote for Mr. Hodgson. I canvassed the men personally at their own homes, and I had a particular desire for Mr. Hodgson to come round; it was me that impressed upon Mr. Hodgson to come.

12567. From that canvass, do you think that, if they had been placed in any other town, the men would have voted for the Conservative candidate?—I cannot say.

12568. Was it from their appreciation of Mr. Hodgson's personal qualities?—Mr. Hodgson, in general, is very well respected amongst the men in the town.

12569. Not more amongst railway men than other men?—No.

12570. Why should the railway men have voted in such a proportion, any more than the workmen in other establishments?—I cannot say that.

12571. Do you think that it was all done from political conviction, or from the fact that Mr. Hodgson was a director of the railway, and known to be so to the men?—I do not know.

12572. Mr. Leatham.] Was there an amendment proposed at that indignation meeting?—I believe that it was proposed that a copy of the resolutions of the meeting go to the "Patriot;" then I believe there was an amendment, that it should go to the "Patriot" and the "Journal."

12573. Was it only with reference to that point that an amendment was proposed?—I believe that was it.

12574. You spoke of Hodgkinson having spoken at this meeting; are you aware whether he has subsequently written to the paper to correct the report of the speech made by him, and what happened there?—I believe he made some slight alterations, but I really cannot tell; I am not prepared to say what it is now.

12575. Have you not read his letter?—Yes; I read his letter, but I have forgotten what it was.

Thomas Richardson.

13 July 1869.

12576. You canvassed a good deal for Mr. Hodgson, did you not?—I did.

12577. Were you many days employed in canvassing?—Not so long; I do not know exactly.

12578. Was it a week?—I did a great deal of it at nights.

12579. Did you do a good deal of it during the day?—Yes, night and day.

12580. Did they stop your wages while you were canvassing?—Yes.

12581. They stopped your wages, did they?—Yes.

12582. For how many days?—I cannot exactly say, I am sure.

12583. Do you know Robert Nerison?—No; if he is a railway man, I do not know him.

12584. Do you remember telling anybody, when the canvassing party was coming out of the London and North Western works, that the Liberal party had not the privilege to canvass the works?—No, never.

12585. You did not say that?—No.

12586. Were the men asked to meet Mr. Hodgson in the reading-room?—I do not know; not to my knowledge. Mr. Hodgson was standing outside the works, and the foreman, Mr. Worthington, advised him to go inside, as it was such a very rough cold day, and a few of the men went in to him.

12587. But the men were not asked to meet him in the reading-room?—I cannot say; I did not hear them.

12588. Mr. Brand.] Can you not tell the Committee for how many days your wages were stopped?—I cannot say exactly.

12589. What are your wages?—Thirty shillings a week.

12590. Who pays your wages?—Mr. Wender pays my wages.

12591. Could he tell the Committee for how many days your wages were stopped?—I do not know that he can.

12592. Mr. Bright.] They generally keep books, I suppose, at the railway, do they not?—For a certain time, I think; it would be very difficult to find them now.

12593. Mr. Brand.] With respect to this indignation meeting, was it composed of men in the employ of the London and North Western Company?—Yes.

12594. How was it called?—It was called by a placard.

12595. Who signed the placard?—I do not know; I do not remember seeing the signature to it.

12596. Was there any meeting of working men at which it was determined to issue this placard?—The men were talking about it, amongst one another, that there ought to be something of the sort.

12597. Who gave the order for printing the placard?—It was not printed; it was wrote out.

12598. Who wrote it out?—I cannot say.

12599. You cannot say that there was any preliminary meeting of working men, at which it was decided to write that placard?—No, I cannot say; it was the general feeling amongst the men.

12600. Mr. Leatham.] Was not Mr. Hodgson at the works the day that the placard was written?—I think not; in fact, I did not hear of it.

12601. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Do you belong to the Mechanics' Institute at Carlisle?—No.

12602. Do you belong to the reading-room where mechanics principally resort in Carlisle?—I do not belong to it; but I have been in the room.

12603. Do you know anything about the papers that are taken in there?—Yes; I believe there are five Liberal and two Conservative papers, and the weekly "Patriot."

12604. Is that a proof of the politics of the men who go to that reading-room?—I do not know; I believe that the committee has the arranging of those things.

12605. Chairman.] Do you know the men who were dismissed a short time after the election?—No.

12606. None of them?—No. I know a great deal of the men. I know McGrath; he was dismissed, but he was taken on again about 10 days after, in the place of a man that was sick, and he is on now still at the works.

12607. At the time when those men were discharged, was there much conversation amongst the workmen about it?—I never heard any conversation about it; not till Mr. Irving's statements came out.

12608. Mr. Hunt.] Was this meeting called by any foreman, or by anyone in authority, at the works?—No.

12609. It was the men's own doing, was it?—Yes. I was one of the party myself that called it.

12610. Were any persons in authority at the works present at the meeting?—No.

12611. Who was in the chair?—Woodhouse.

12612. What is he?—He is a fitter.

12613. Was Hodgkinson, the man who would not hold up his hand for Mr. Hodgson in the shed, present at the meeting?—Yes.

12614. Did he make a speech?—Yes, I believe he did.

12615. Is this a correct account of what he said: "Mr. Thomas Hodgkinson (fitter) said he had been on the works several years, and he voted for the Liberals at the election. Having so voted, he could safely say that every man had his own free will in the exercise of his franchise; at least if a man did not vote as he liked, it was altogether his own fault, for there was no coercion or intimidation of any sort"; do you know whether that was the substance of what Hodgkinson said?—Yes, I believe that is about it; in fact, it was the general opinion of the men, when the newspaper came out, that that was very near the truth; very near what he said.

12616. You have mentioned a man named McGrath, who was discharged and taken on again; did he make a statement at that meeting?—Yes, he said that he was not discharged through voting.

12617. Is this a correct account of what he said: "He was discharged on account of the slackness of work, and not through his politics. Ten days afterwards he was re-engaged in place of a man who was on the sick list"?—Yes.

12618. "And an influential gentleman used his influence to get him the vacancy"?—Yes, I believe that is what he said.

12619. That "he never asserted that he was taken back to prevent representation being made to Crewe"; do you know whether he said that?—No, I do not remember.

12620. Was this resolution passed: "That this meeting, composed of the workmen employed in

Thomas Richardson.

13 July 1869.

in the London and North Western works, has read with astonishment and indignation the statements made by Mr. John Irving before the Parliamentary Elections Committee, and hereby repudiates, as false and calumnious, and a gross insult both to ourselves and to our employers, his assertion that undue pressure was brought to bear upon any workman at the late city election, either by Mr. Hodgson, M.P., or any of his friends, or by any of the employés of this company"?—Yes.

12621. Were there any hands held up against it?—Not one.

12622. Do you know how many persons were present at that meeting?—I counted them as 140.

12623. Was there entire unanimity upon the matter?—Yes.

12624. Mr. Brand.] You stated, in answer to the right honourable gentleman, that you were one of the men who called the indignation meeting?—Yes.

12625. Who joined with you in calling that meeting?—I cannot say now.

12626. Mr. Leatham.] Can you mention a few of the names?—I really cannot say.

12627. Did you get it up entirely yourself?—I did not write it out.

12628. But you wrote out the resolution which the right honourable gentleman has read to you?—Yes; I wrote all the resolutions out, but I did not post the notice up at the time.

12629. And you do not know who wrote the notice?—No.

12630. Mr. Brand.] What do you mean to convey to the Committee when you say that you were one of those who called the meeting; what do you do when you call a meeting?—We were wanting to exonerate Mr. Hodgson from all blame.

12631. What steps do you take when you call a meeting; do you consult with any of your fellow-workmen?—Yes, but I cannot say now; there was a great number altogether.

12632. Cannot you name any individual that you consulted with at all?—I cannot.

12633. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Did you talk the matter over with the other workmen?—Yes, we talked it over.

12634. And they agreed with you?—Yes.

12635. Mr. Brand.] And you originated this movement yourself?—No, not myself.

12636. Then who did?—We originated it amongst ourselves.

12637. Mr. Leatham.] Do you remember Hodgkinson saying at that meeting that the greatest mistake that Mr. Hodgson made during the election was to visit the works at all?—Yes, I do.

WILLIAM CORBETT, called in; and Examined.

W. Corbett.

12638. Mr. Leatham.] YOU are a workman, are you not, employed in the London and North Western Railway Company's Works?—Yes.

12639. Have you any means of knowing what the general political feelings of the workmen in those works were when Mr. Hodgson visited them?—Yes; I had an opportunity of knowing the feelings of the workmen in consequence of working with them, coming in daily contact with them, and having repeated conversations with them with respect to political matters.

12640. Mr. Bright.] What is your particular employment there?—I am an engine-fitter.

12641. Mr. Leatham.] Do you know what kind of reception Mr. Hodgson's canvassers met with when they visited the works on the 5th of November?—Yes; I was present at the works on that day, and from what I knew of the men and their views prior to the visit of those canvassers, I know and am certain that they were decidedly Liberal in their views. I am speaking now more particularly with reference to the repairing shops, where the engines are repaired. Prior to the visit of canvassers who visited the works, the decided majority of the workmen who were voters were in favour of the Liberal candidates; and when the canvassers visited the works and canvassed the men, the reception that they met with was not at all according to their anticipations; they were very much disappointed with the result of their canvass, as was expressed by their stating, at the different concerns that they visited, towards the close of their canvass, that some one had been influencing them.

12642. Mr. Hunt.] Who were those who said that?—Mr. Hodgson's canvassing party who visited the works on the 5th of November, and who met with such a reception. It was so very much contrary to their expectations, that when they came near to the close of their canvass they asked some man that they were canvassing whether some one had been influencing them, as they expected that they would have been for Mr. Hodgson to a man.

12643. Mr. Leatham.] Do you remember Mr. Hodgson's visit on the 9th of November?—Yes.

12644. Are you aware whether he canvassed personally any of the electors?—He canvassed several of the electors personally.

12645. Can you mention their names?—I could do so if it was necessary; I could mention the names of nearly a dozen that Mr. Hodgson canvassed on the works.

12646. Are you aware whether he tried to induce them to vote contrary to any pledges which they had given?—I believe Mr. Hodgson, as a gentleman, canvassed them fairly; he sought to do the best he could for himself and for his party, and I do not know that in any case he used any undue influence apart from the consideration of his being present at all in the works; that in my opinion, and in the opinion of many others, was sufficient of itself; I may say that in canvassing the men when they told him that they had pledged themselves to go the other way, he endeavoured to reason with them, and expressed himself as desirous that they should give him, at least, one vote; this was in reference to men who had pledged themselves to go for the two Liberal candidates; I do not say that there was anything unfair in Mr. Hodgson endeavouring to secure votes for himself; but you see the influence he carried with him in visiting the works as a director.

12647. Do you know anything about the formation of the committee, which was held at Halls?—It was formed, I believe, the evening after the visit of Mr. Hodgson to the works, and it was formed under the auspices of the Conservative party connected with the works; and I may say with reference to that committee, that it was to consist, of course, of Conservative members, and that one of the foremen of the works was constituted chairman of that committee.

W. Corbett.
13 July 1869.

12648. What was his name?—Thomas Martlew, the foreman of the smiths.

12649. He was the same person, was he not, who accompanied Mr. Hodgson on a part of his canvass?—Precisely so.

12650. Are you aware of any instances in which those men endeavoured to coerce the workmen?—Yes, I am.

12651. Will you give them to the Committee?—Yes, I can mention the names of specific cases if the Committee desire it; but I would rather leave out the names.

12652. Mr. Hunt.] Did you hear the conversation between this man and the workmen?—No.

12653. How did it get to your knowledge?—You must understand me that I had it from the men themselves.

12654. The men that you say were coerced told you?—Yes; in fact, I can produce a writing from two of them to the effect that they were coerced in this way. I do not inculpate Mr. Hodgson in this. I am speaking with reference to the foreman of the smiths.

12655. Mr. Leatham.] You have had a good deal of conversation with the men with reference to their votes, have you not?—A great deal.

12656. Are you aware of any instances in which the men told you that they had voted against their conscience?—Yes.

12657. In consequence of the influence that was brought to bear upon them?—Yes.

12658. How many should you suppose?—I could mention nearly a score out of the 136 who voted for Mr. Hodgson, who have expressed themselves to me, and not only to me, but to others, as having gone against their conscience; that in consequence of the influence that was brought to bear upon them they violated their principles, and went and voted against their conscience for the sake of their bread. There is one case in particular that I would like to refer to, and that is a case of a man who is prepared to take his oath with reference to this matter, and he would be willing to submit to any official investigation which might be held with regard to the intimidation that was used towards him. That man, when the first batch of canvassers came to the works to canvass, refused to give his vote to Mr. Hodgson, and told the canvassers that he was pledged to Messrs. Potter and Lawson; when Mr. Hodgson visited the works that same workman told Mr. Hodgson that he was pledged to vote for Potter and Lawson, and that he could not support him. Mr. Hodgson spoke very kindly to him and left him, and notwithstanding that this man had refused his vote to Mr. Hodgson's canvassers, and then to Mr. Hodgson himself, the very next night when that Conservative committee was formed, this man was upon that committee, and pledged to give his support to Mr. Hodgson; and that man told me in the presence of another individual that he voted yellow, which is the Conservative colour, but he was blue at heart; but he was obliged to do it in consequence of the influence which was brought against him. And there are several other cases quite as clear.

12659. It was represented to Mr. Hodgson, as he has told us, that it was the desire of the men to see him at the works; were you aware of that?—I never heard of any such desire; I know that when there was such a strong feeling in favour of the Liberal candidates we were threatened with Mr. Hodgson's visit to the works, and we were threatened that Mr. Hodgson would be with us if we did not do something different.

12660. When you say "threatened," do you mean by persons in authority?—I mean by persons who were leaders in the Conservative interest.

12661. Foremen?—No, not foremen.

12662. Mr. Bright.] You do not mean that it was intimated to you in the way of a threat?—I mean what I say; it was held over us as a threat.

12663. Mr. Leatham.] Are you a member of the reading-room?—Yes.

12664. Are you aware what the papers are that are taken in there?—In the statement which Mr. Irving has made, his report is correct with respect to those papers; that is to say, the papers that were taken in at the time during the election; there has been an alteration since. The papers referred to at the indignation meeting are the papers that are taken in now; but the papers that were really taken in at the time of the election were just exactly as Mr. Irving states in his evidence.

12665. Is there any other point to which you wish to call the attention of the Committee?—There are several other minor matters, but the great point with me is this, that men were influenced to go against their honest convictions.

12666. Mr. Brand.] Can you give us any information with regard to this indignation meeting?—I was not present.

12667. You do not know how it was called?—It was called by notice; a notice was posted, similar to other notices that are posted in the works, and any notice that was official, or to be observed by the workmen, must have the superintendent's signature attached to it; I am not prepared to say that the superintendent's signature was attached to this notice; but I am prepared to state that it was written out by the clerk, and was in his handwriting; I did not take particular notice of the signature, because I did not feel indignant enough to go to the meeting, and I did not take much interest in it at all.

12668. Mr. Leatham.] Were you invited to the indignation meeting?—I was.

12669. You were not there, I believe?—I did not attend.

12670. Did you state the reason why you did not go?—I did.

12671. What was it?—I was requested to attend the indignation meeting by the locomotive superintendent.

12672. Chairman.] In what form were you requested?—Verbally.

12673. What sort of words did he use?—I was busy working, and he came to me, and he says, "Well, Corbett, I want you to attend this indignation meeting to night." I said, "Well, I do not feel disposed to attend the meeting, Sir." He said, "What for?" "Well," I said, "I do not see the use of it;" I says, "you know very well that it is all a heap of nonsense talking about indignation meetings for us;" I said, "you know as well as I do, that things was not done fair." I said, "I do not feel disposed to attend the meeting, neither shall I." "Well, then," he says, "you will have to sign a paper." I said, "That altogether depends upon what the paper contains."

He

He says, "You will have to sign a paper that there was no undue influence used in those works." I said, "I will sign a paper stating that there was no undue influence used with me as an individual, but," I said, "I will never sign a paper to state that there was no undue influence used with others; I could not do it."

12674. Mr. Leatham.] Did he threaten you with any consequences, if you refused to sign that paper?—Yes; he said I would have to sign it, or I would have to make up my mind to be discharged.

12675. Mr. Brand.] Was any opinion openly expressed by the workmen as to this notice?—A great many of the workmen were strongly opposed to the meeting altogether.

12676. Did they consider that this notice was by way of an order for them to attend the meeting?—I do not know that they looked upon it in that light, only all the officials were present at the meeting, and the fact of their presence was sufficient to induce a great many to stay.

12677. Did they know that the notice was written out by the clerk of the superintendent?—Undoubtedly, many would know his handwriting as well as I do.

12678. Was the superintendent, Mr. Worthington?—Yes.

12679. Mr. Bright.] You said that this person, who wanted you to go to the meeting, said that unless you were willing to sign that paper you might make up your mind to be discharged?—He did.

12680. You adhere absolutely to that statement?—Yes.

12681. Will you consider it thoroughly, and examine your memory?—I have done so.

12682. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Who was he that said so?—Mr. Worthington, the superintendent.

12683. Mr. Bright.] Are you now working in the same works?—Yes.

12684. Are you still a fitter?—Yes.

12685. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You have received no notice?—No; I turned to him and I said, "What is that; you do not mean what you say, surely; you do not mean to discharge me?" "Well," he says, "perhaps I do not, after all." It is only fair that I should say that he said that.

12686. Were you under any apprehension that he meant to discharge you?—No, not at the time.

12687. You did not believe that he was serious?—No; because I knew he would not do it for any such thing.

12688. You attached no importance to what he said?—No; but still as a gentleman, and the locomotive superintendent for an important Company like the London and North Western, he is expected to be a man of his word.

12689. Still you did not think that he would carry it out, his word, in that case?—I hardly expected he would, but he might have done so.

12690. Chairman.] Has any paper of that sort been given to the men for signature?—No, there has been no paper of that kind presented for signature.

12691. You have not heard of any such paper being handed about?—No.

12692. Were the greater part of the men present at this meeting?—Yes, I should think so; a great many of those that were present were non-electors.

12693. Do you know anything about the discharge of the 20 men which followed the election shortly?—Yes, I know something about it; I know that there was a notice served from Crewe to the station at Carlisle that so many men had to be discharged, and I know that that notice for the discharge of those men was kept, or at least it was endeavoured to be kept, a secret; but, by some means or other, it oozed out, and the report got circulated that so many men were to be discharged, and it had a very strange effect upon the men. It was represented as being a blue dodge (that is, a Liberal), to get some men who had promised to vote for Mr. Hodgson to come to the other side; and there were others, again, who represented it as being a Tory dodge. There the matter stood, and they denied that any such notice had come from Crewe.

12694. Mr. Leatham.] Who denied it?—The authorities; the foreman of that department denied that any such intimation had come from Crewe.

12695. Are you positive of that fact?—I am.

12696. Chairman.] Is it true that six of the men who were discharged voted for Mr. Hodgson?—Yes.

12697. Is it true that five who were discharged voted against Mr. Hodgson?—Yes; it is also true that those five were all the five that could be discharged that had voted for the Liberals.

12698. Being the only men of that class who were being discharged?—Just so.

12699. Have you heard it said that those men were discharged on account of their votes?—The men say so themselves.

12700. Has one of them been taken back again?—He has.

12701. Who is that?—McGrath.

12702. He was present, I believe, at the meeting?—I suppose so; I was not present at the meeting; I cannot speak with reference to this meeting any further than from the report which I have read in the papers, and what I have heard. The general opinion of the men in the place that were present at the meeting, is that it was a very unfair report.

12703. Did he not deny at the meeting, or is he not reported to have denied at the meeting, that his discharge had anything to do with politics?—He is reported in the paper to have denied it; but those who were present at the meeting say that he has never denied it yet.

12704. Do you know why he was taken back again?—I do not.

12705. Mr. Hunt.] You are a voter, I suppose?—Yes.

12706. Whom did you vote for?—The two Liberal candidates.

12707. Have you suffered any harm in consequence?—No.

12708. You say that there were three men to your knowledge that were coerced by the superintendent?—I do.

12709. Why were they not brought up here?—I cannot tell.

12710. Why do you come up here to give evidence when you suffered no harm, and you were not attempted to be coerced?—I came up here because I was summoned to come, and I took a leading part on the opposite side.

12711. Who suggested that you should come?—There

W. Corbett. 13 July 1869.

—There were several parties suggested that I should come.

12712. I suppose some of the Liberal party suggested that you should come?—Yes.

12713. Did you tell them about those other men being coerced?—The men told them themselves, it was the subject of general conversation.

12714. Did those men who wished that you should come, know the names of those who had been coerced?—Possibly they might.

12715. Do you know whether they applied to them to come to say so?—I cannot say that; I can say this, and I believe I am correct, that the men would come if you asked them.

12716. I want to know why they were not brought?—I do not know.

12717. You say that Mr. Hodgson used no undue influence when he came around?—No further than his presence, his presence had an influence.

12718. Did Mr. Hodgson address you when he was there?—No, he did not.

12719. Did you hear what he said to other people?—Yes, I heard from the men what he said to them.

12720. You did not hear anything tending to undue influence in what he said?—I heard that he had endeavoured to induce them to break their promise; he argued the question with them.

12721. I suppose you know what canvassing is, do you not?—Yes.

12722. You know that that is the general way of canvassers; they think that the matter has not been fully put before the elector, and they wish to put their view before him as well as that of the other side?—Just so.

12723. Do you know whether those men who were coerced, and who, you say, complained to you that they had been coerced, attended that indignation meeting?—I do not know whether they did or not, I did not hear; perhaps they might; I could not say; I never inquired whether they did or not.

12724. Have you any expectation of suffering any harm in your employment from the evidence which you have given here to-day?—I expect not.

12725. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Who are the members of this Mechanics' Institute, are they all workmen of the railway?—Yes.

12726. Does the institute comprise any other members besides?—No, none but railway employés.

12727. How many of those London and North Western Railway employés are members?—Not so many now; the principle has been altered; at one time it was compulsory upon everyone to be a member of the reading-room, and there were so many complaints with reference to this matter that it was altered, and made voluntary.

12728. Chairman.] Complaints with reference to what?—There were so many complaints about being compelled to be members, and about the money being stopped off their wages, whether the men were willing to be members or not.

12729. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] A statement was made at the indignation meeting that there were 154 men employed by the railway company who were voters, but that there were only 35 men who were members of the Mechanics' Institute who were voters; should you say that that statement was correct?—I should say so; I should not feel disposed to contradict it; I could not say for certain.

12731. Therefore the papers taken in by the Mechanics' Institute would not necessarily determine the politics of the railway company's workmen?—No; but they would give some idea of the politics of the men that had the choice of the papers.

12732. In the proportion of 35 to 154?—Yes; but you forget that those papers were taken in at the time when the coercion principle was in operation, when all the workmen were obliged to be members; there was no alteration in the papers till after the election.

12733. Was every workman a member at that time?—Yes, every workman; at least, all the workmen in the repairing shops; I am not certain about the Permanent Way Department.

12734. But those 154 workmen who were voters were not all members?—No.

12735. Mr. James.] What department was it that those men were dismissed from?—The smith's department.

12736. How many were there in the smiths' department, do you know?—I did know the number at the time, but I forget now.

12737. I understand that 11 men were dismissed from that department?—Yes.

12738. How many voters in the whole of that department voted against Mr. Hodgson?—Six, I believe.

12739. And were they all dismissed?—Five of them were.

12740. McGrath was dismissed in the first instance; but he came back, I believe?—Yes, he came back.

12741. But they were all dismissed in the first instance, were they not?—No, there was one that was not dismissed at all.

12742. But the five others were dismissed?—Yes.

12743. You do not know about how many men in that department were voters; were there 40 or 50, or how many would there be?—I do not know exactly.

12744. Mr. Brand.] You said, I think, that you were a fitter?—I am an engine-fitter.

12745. Have you been working in that capacity long?—Yes, I have been 11 years working, or rather over-working, under the London and North Western Railway Company.

12746. May I ask what your wages are?—Twenty-eight shillings per week.

12747. Have they been increased of late years?—They have been increased; it is about two-and-half years ago since they were advanced.

12748. Have you any men working under you?—No; I have an apprentice working under me.

12749. Mr. Leatham.] You say that one man who voted for Potter and Lawson was kept on out of the six; do you know any reason why he was kept on?—I believe it was the result of a mistake; I have heard it said so; I cannot vouch for the accuracy of it. It was always understood that he had voted for Mr. Hodgson, but when the poll-book came out it was seen that he had voted for Messrs. Potter and Lawson.

12750. Has the attention of the men generally been drawn to Mr. Irving's evidence before this Committee?—Yes.

12751. Are

W. Corbett.
13 July 1869.

12751. Are you prepared to state what their opinion generally is, from conversation with reference to it?—The opinion varies; a great many are of opinion that what Mr. Irving has stated is substantially correct.

12752. By a great many, do you mean the majority?—Yes; I can safely say the majority.

12753. Mr. Hunt.] Have you heard that a great many are very indignant at what Mr. Irving said?—No, I have not 12754. Did you hear the men talk about what took place at that indignation meeting?—Yes.

12755. Did not you hear that very strong expressions were used about Mr. Irving's statement at that meeting?—I did; and I heard that there were statements on the other side which were not reported.

12756. Were shorthand writers present?—No.

12757. How did the speeches get into the paper?—I do not know; they were prepared by some parties.

12758. Are you aware that the meeting was unanimous in the resolutions that they passed?—I am aware that the report says so; of course they were unanimous in a way; several were neutral and refrained from voting.

12759. Did you hear the evidence given by Mr. Richardson, the witness who was examined before you?—Yes, I heard his evidence partly.

12760. Did you hear him state that he was present at the meeting, and that the resolutions were passed unanimously?—Yes; I did.

12761. Have you any reason to believe that his statement was not correct upon that point?—I have heard others say that there were many of the workmen neutral, and who never voted at all.

12762. Who did not hold up their hands either way?—That is so.

12763. Mr. Bright] Did any absent themselves besides yourself?—Yes, several.

Mr. John Irving, re-called; and further Examined.

J. Irving.

12764. Chairman.] I understand that you wish to correct some of your former evidence?—Yes; I wish merely to give some explanation of a statement which I gave in answer to Question No. 9366. I was asked, "Do you know whether the great bulk of those 154 voters are members of that Mechanics' Institute?" And I said, "They are chiefly." The period to which I referred was prior to the election, when a different state of things existed to what exists now. At the time that I referred to, every workman in the employment of the company was obliged to leave a penny per week out of his wages in support of that institution; now it is voluntary. The statement referred to by Woodhouse, the chairman of the meeting, that there were only 35 or 54 members, whichever it was, is perfectly correct; that accounts for the difference between the statement which he made and the one that I made.

12765. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You cannot state the exact number who were members of that Mechanics' Institute out of the 154?—I believe that every man was obliged to be, by the rule in the works, a member of the news-room.

12766. You heard what the last witness said, that that applied to a portion of the works, but not to all the 154 who were in the company's employ?—I so understood it; and that information is fortified by the superintendent himself. I saw him last Friday upon the subject. A statement was made at the meeting that I had reported that only one Conservative daily paper had been taken in; at the time to which I referred there was only one, namely, the "Standard," but in March of this year an order was made for taking in the "Manchester Courier" in addition.

12767. Chairman.] You adhere to the rest of your evidence?—Entirely.

Friday, 16*th July* 1869.

Mr. Villiers.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS BROUGHTON EDGE, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. B. Edge. 16 July 1869.

12768. Mr. Raikes.] I BELIEVE you are a Member of the Middle Temple?—I am.

12769. You practised at Bolton, for several years, as a solicitor, did you not?—Yes, for upwards of 11 years.

12770. During that time, had you much experience of elections?—Yes, I have had considerable experience of elections.

12771. Both Parliamentary and municipal?—Yes, both Parliamentary and municipal.

12772. And county and borough, as well?—Yes, county and borough.

12773. Is it your experience that, in Bolton, there is a great amount of irregular or illegal practices at elections?—I believe not, as a general rule.

12774. At the municipal elections, has it ever been the custom to pay voters for their loss of time?—Yes, it has almost been the general custom on both sides.

12775. That is not supposed, I believe, particularly to affect a man's vote; but he looks for it as a sort of privilege?—As a compensation for his loss of time.

12776. And it is done as a matter of course?—It is.

12777. But, with that exception, there has been nothing common in the way of bribery in the ordinary form?—No, I do not believe there has; not to any great extent.

12778. As to intimidation, has there been much intimidation in elections there?—Not until recently; I am speaking now of the municipal elections.

12779. Sir George Grey.] The whole of your evidence hitherto has related to the municipal elections?—Yes, to the municipal elections only.

12780. Mr. Raikes.] In the Parliamentary elections, has there been anything of intimidation?—No, I do not think there has.

12781. Speaking from your experience generally of elections, do you believe that intimidation by employers, over persons whom they influence, is increasing or decreasing in elections?—Certainly decreasing; I am certain of that.

12782. To what do you attribute that?—I think there is a better public opinion upon the subject; I think that public opinion is against the practice, and employers feel that they would not like to be guilty of anything of the kind.

12783. There is a more independent feeling among the workmen, is there not?—Quite so.

12784. Is there any other sort of intimidation prevalent in the Parliamentary elections?—No, I am not aware of any.

12785. Sir George Grey.] None by workmen themselves over their fellow-workmen?—No, I am not aware of any.

12786. Mr. Raikes.] At some elections in Lancashire there was a good deal of political feeling; was there nothing of mob violence or rioting?—At the last municipal election for Bolton there was a considerable amount of mob violence.

12787. Was that on both sides?—No, I do not think it was on both sides; I think it was confined to one side alone.

12788. What shape did it take?—One shape was the assembling of men, armed with sticks and in various fashions, in the polling booths and the approaches to the polling booths, and preventing voters from going to record their votes.

12789. That was done before the voters voted; they were not subjected to violence afterwards, were they?—No, it was before they voted.

12790. I believe those municipal elections in Lancashire are generally made political matters?—Quite so; the last one especially.

12791. I believe you have been a candidate yourself for municipal honours, have you not?—Yes, I have.

12792. Was that long ago?—Last November.

12793. And that was the occasion on which you spoke of a good deal of violence having been resorted to?—Yes.

12794. The object of that violence, I understand you to say, was rather to deter the voters from voting, than to injure them afterwards?—Quite so; it was to prevent people from recording their votes, either by crowding the booths, so that they could not get up to the polling booths, or by intimidating them as they went; there was another form of intimidation that was extensively resorted to at the last municipal election, and that was the kidnapping of voters; what is ordinarily termed bottling voters.

12795. Was that done a great deal at the last municipal election?—It was, especially in one ward.

12796. Was that much done in the Parliamentary elections at Bolton?—No; there has been that kind of thing to a small extent, but not much.

12797. Do you believe, from what you have seen of elections, that secret voting would repress any bad practices that you have seen resorted to?—I do not think it would.

12798. Will you give your reasons for not thinking so?—I think, as far as bribery is concerned, persons would be bribed just as they are at present; they would be paid bribes for their votes.

12799. Do you believe persons would bribe, having such confidence in the voter, that after he had received the money he would vote for them, even though his vote was a secret one?—Yes, certainly I think so.

12800. Are you aware of any case which bears out that opinion?—Yes; I know an instance of a town where a certain person paid the rates of the voters some two or three months before the election, and it was stated at the time that nothing was said at all about how they were to vote, but it was a very singular fact that all the persons whose rates were paid voted for the candidates who were approved of by the person who paid the rates.

12801. Sir George Grey.] The candidate knew that they had so voted, of course?—Yes, it was open voting certainly.

12802. Mr. Raikes.] But the money was paid a long time before the election?—Yes, two or three months before the election.

12803. Do you think that there would be bribery in the form of betting, or anything of that sort?—Yes, I think there would.

12804. You have some suggestion to make, have you not, with regard to voting papers?—I have devoted considerable attention to the matter, and my own opinion has been most decidedly that voting papers would be the best means of checking, at any rate, if not altogether stopping, bribery and intimidation.

12806. What is the plan that you would suggest?—I would suggest that the returning officer should issue voting papers, duly authenticated with some sort of official seal, to all the persons upon the register entitled to vote; I would suggest, in order to prevent any mistake in the voter voting for the wrong person, that the names of the candidates should be printed in different coloured inks, and that the voter should be required to strike out the name or names of the candidates for whom he did not vote, and then that he should sign the voting paper either himself, or, if he was a marksman, he should sign it in the presence of a witness, who should also sign the paper; I should suggest that the voting papers should be delivered three days before the election, and that during that time all canvassing or solicitation to fill up the voting papers should be prohibited under a penalty. The great fault at present in the system of voting for poor law guardians, is that after the voting papers are delivered, persons go round inducing voters to allow them to fill up the voting papers, and sometimes they do not fill them up for the person that the voter intends to vote for, and there are also other alterations made in the voting paper that are not intended by the voter; I think that if canvassing was absolutely prohibited for the three days, and if persons were prohibited from soliciting voters to be allowed to fill up their voting papers, it would cure the great defect in the present system of voting for poor law guardians.

12807. Sir George Grey.] How long before the election are the voting papers to be issued?—Nine days; then I think the voting papers should be both delivered and collected by agents appointed by the returning officer; of course they should be collected in a properly sealed box, but that each candidate should be at liberty to appoint an inspector to accompany the person delivering and collecting the papers; that would prevent any irregularity in the delivery or collection of the papers; I think too that after the election the boxes should be opened in the presence of the returning officer, and the candidates' agents, and the town clerk ought to register the votes as given by each voter; that is, mark on the register the names of the candidates for whom each person has voted, and I think that a list should be published in the same way as the lists of voters are published; another fault in the present system of voting for poor law guardians is, that no one can ascertain whether his paper has been tampered with or not, unless he goes to the office of the guardians and wades through a great mass of papers; I think, too, that that plan would prevent bribery on the day of the polling, because of course no one would know how the poll was going, and, as we all know, the greatest amount of bribery takes place towards the close of the poll generally; I think also that it would prevent intimidation by mobs, and that it would prevent personation, and that it would prevent the bottling or the kidnapping of voters; that practice of kidnapping voters I believe is on the increase; and my own notion is, that if the ballot were adopted, practices of that kind would be increased; in Bolton, men were actually taken away out of the streets the night before the election, conveyed away to the committee-rooms, drugged with drink, and actually kept there prisoners by violence; great violence was used towards them; the whole matter formed the subject of a very long magisterial inquiry in Bolton, and it was a very serious case; every effort was made to trace out the persons who had committed that violence, but they were generally strangers who had been imported into the town for that purpose.

12809. Mr. Raikes.] You think that a system of secret voting would of course be no protection against voters being kidnapped or kept from voting at all?—Certainly not.

Mr. T. B. Edge.

16 July 1869.

12810. Whereas that system of voting papers would at all events give additional security for a man being able to give his vote?—I think so, decidedly.

12812. Do you consider that there would be additional protection against illegal practices in the subsequent publication of the names of the voters, and so enabling people to detect bribery, which they would not be able to detect if the system was perfectly secret?—Quite so.

12813. Sir George Grey.] I do not understand how you mean to distribute the papers; take a very large constituency of 40,000, such as Liverpool or Birmingham, how would you distribute the papers; by the returning officer? — All boroughs are divided into wards or polling districts at present, and the returning officer would appoint an official who would have the custody of those voting papers, and that official would go round his own ward accompanied by the inspectors appointed by the candidates, and the papers would be delivered at the residence of each voter three days before the election; then on the day of the election (of course all the officials appointed by the returning officer in those wards would go round on the same day delivering the papers) or three days afterwards would collect the papers accompanied by the inspectors, and the papers would be deposited in a sealed box.

12814. What time do you suppose it would take to collect all the papers and deposit them in a sealed box in one of the largest wards in Liverpool or Birmingham?—The whole might be done in a day very easily.

12815. By how many collectors?—Of course that would depend upon the number of wards in the borough, and the number of voting papers in each ward.

12816. Do you mean one collector for each ward?—Yes; that would of course depend upon the number of voters in each ward.

12817. He is to be appointed the returning officer?—Yes.

12818. What security is to be taken for his honesty?—The same security that is now taken with regard to the appointment of the deputy returning officers.

12819. Do not the deputy returning officers take the votes in the presence of the agents of both parties and in public?—Precisely; but the collectors of the voting papers would also take the voting papers in the presence of the agents of the candidates appointed just in the same way.

12820. Then a collector and an agent for each candidate has to be appointed for each ward to go round and collect those papers?—Quite so.

12821. I suppose the voter has to sign the paper?—Yes.

12822. In whose presence is he to sign it?—It is unnecessary to sign it in any one's presence.

12824. How soon is the publication to take place after the election?—Immediately; it could not be done the next day, but in the course perhaps of, I should think, three days.

12825. And to be published and printed?—Yes.

12826. What means would there be of ascertaining that some of those papers had not been signed by persons who had no right to sign them?—The voter would have an opportunity of seeing how he was recorded as having voted.

12828. Do you believe that all the cases of bribery that are committed are found out by the agents of the candidates?—I believe there are many cases that are never detected.

12829. Do you not know that there is a great deal of personation in voting for poor law guardians, and in many cases it has been ascertained that there has been a great deal of fraud?—No, I do not know that there has been any very great amount.

12830. Are you not aware of cases which have been proved, in which there has been a great deal of fraud?—I know that there has been a great deal of fraud, but that has generally resulted from this, that nobody has inquired what has become of the vote.

12831. You take no security for the signature being the genuine signature of the voter, except the general knowledge possessed of him by the collector in a very large ward, and by the agents for each of the candidates?—Yes, I take this security, that it being published how the voter has voted, all his friends and neighbours, and everyone, himself included, can ascertain at once whether a voting paper has either been forged or falsified, or tampered with in any way.

12832. All the world would know how he voted?—Yes.

12834. How would it check bribery if a man had promised 5 l. to a voter to vote for him, and found afterwards that he had done so, and paid him the money?—It would not check a case of that kind.

12835. What sort of bribery would it check?—We find that most of the bribery is committed on the day of the polling, when the contest comes to to be rather severe; we will say in the middle of the day, and then, of course, all that kind of bribery would be checked.

12836. That bribery, I suppose, would be equally checked by any system which prevented the state of the poll being published during the polling-day?—Quite so.

12837. Mr. Villiers.] I think you said that you had had some experience of the way in which votes were taken by papers in the election of guardians?—Yes, 12838. You are perhaps aware of particular frauds that are constantly practised in that way?—Quite so.

12839. I do not exactly understand what there is in your system that should prevent that; supposing that a man is either made drunk, or he is bribed, or somebody is at the time in his house to influence him, and when the paper is taken his signature is found to it, and if this man has been either corrupted or unduly influenced, what is there in your system to distinguish it from the usual fraud of that sort?—This; I think I dealt with that objection by saying that I would prohibit canvassing after the delivery of the voting papers; all my experince goes to show this, that the falsification of the voting papers, and the inducing of a man to allow another to fill up his voting paper, arises through the non-prohibition of canvassing after the voting papers are delivered; I know that it is a common system for persons to go round, or perhaps, two or three men to go round, immediately after the collector has delivered the voting paper, and ask to be allowed to fill up the voting paper; that they do openly, of course.

12840. I do not quite understand what you mean by prohibiting canvassing; you are now alluding to Parliamentary elections; there have been candidates on the ground for some weeks, or days, perhaps, and everybody is familiar with the persons who they are to vote for or against, and then you deliver the papers three days before the election, to which the voter has to sign his name; of course, if there is to be any influence, it will be used in favour of one or against another of those candidates?—Yes; but then still all that influence must have been used prior to the delivery of the voting papers, and you at once stop all canvassing, and you leave it to the voter to form his own opinion upon the subject, and to fill up his voting paper in his own way.

12841. As far as I understand you, you want to prevent canvassing and to prevent influence?—No, not so much to prevent influence as to prevent the improper filling up of the voting papers.

12842. The candidate may have used all the influence that is necessary with the voters before the papers are delivered?—Quite so.

12843. Then the voter would know what he has to do if he is a corrupt person?—Yes; I do not mean to say that this voting paper system would prevent bribery prior to the delivery of the voting papers; I only say that it will prevent bribery upon the day of the polling, which is the day upon which the greatest amount of bribery is committed.

12844. It would not prevent expectations being raised in the voter, in case he votes this way or the other way?—No, certainly not.

12845. The last act that he would have to perform in order to secure the bribe is to put his name to the paper?—Yes, quite so.

12846. His wife, or anybody who was on the spot, might guide his hand or induce him to vote either one way or the other?—You could not prevent the wife doing that.

12847. Or the agent of the candidate might possibly be in his house when the voter had to sign the paper?—No; I say that that would then be canvassing or influencing the man.

12848. I say that he might possibly be in the house when the paper was signed by the voter?—Yes, in individual cases he might be; but I think that any court for inquiring into an election petition would hold that if an agent went from house to house he was clearly canvassing.

12849. An accredited agent?—Yes, clearly so.

12850. But there is a strong party feeling upon those occasions, and people divide themselves into bodies, each body acting for his own particular friend?—Yes.

12851. Then you have no security against their acting in this way upon the voter?—Yes, I think so; I think that it would be the same as any other case of using undue influence; if you found three or four men systematically going from one house to another house during the time, after the voting papers had been delivered, the inference would be clear enough that it had been for the purpose of influencing the voter in filling up his paper.

12852. You know nothing of the circumstances under which the paper was signed; the man has had three days to consider of it, and then comes round the officer to collect the signature?—Yes.

12853. You know nothing of what has passed in the interval?—No.

12854. I think I understood you to say that that system would prevent violence; it would not prevent ordinary intimidation from property, and it would not prevent bribery before the day of the papers being sent round?—No.

12855. As far as I understand you, the voter does not appear after he has signed his name?—No, he does not appear at all.

12856. But before the first day of leaving the paper, of course influence may have been used if it is requisite to induce him to vote in a particular way?—Yes, certainly; but I say we always find out those influences, and that the minimum amount of influence is used prior to the day of the polling, and we say that the maximum amount of influence is used on the day of the polling, as a rule.

12857. Would not those three days give plenty of time for parties to influence the voter?—I think that, generally speaking, the greatest amount of influence is used on the day of the polling; influence of all kinds, with bribery and intimidation, and treating; I think the most of it is on that day, in fact the great bulk of it.

12858. I believe that now it is not very usual to publish the poll book in boroughs after the election, is it?—No; it is now got so large that they do not publish it.

12859. There has always been a prejudice, has there not, against publishing the poll book?—I do not know that; it has never been published officially; generally the newspapers have published a list of the voters, and how they have voted in each borough.

12860. But part of your plan is that now it should be necessary to be published?—That the town clerk should record it.

Mr. T. B. Edge. 16 July 1869.

12861. You would take precautions against secrecy, or for its being known afterwards how a man may have voted?—I should certainly make it quite open how a man has voted.

12862. So that if he voted against any of the influences that usually operate upon him, it could not be concealed; it would be known as a matter of course?—Certainly.

12863. So that if a man was exposed to violence, even from his fellow-workmen, or to anything oppressive from his customers, or from his landlord, he could not escape detection, according to your plan?—No; he cannot escape detection now; and I think under my plan, although he would not escape detection as to how he voted, he would have other advantages, that is to say, he would be enabled to vote quietly, and to exercise his own opinion without persons being about him; he would record his vote, without any chance of being taken away from his home, or having his head broken, or anything of that kind.

12864. You do not provide against anybody being near him when he signs his paper; that may happen one way or the other?—That is one of those things which might be prohibited I think, by a heavy penalty.

12865. But if any body of people, say a club, agreed to meet on a certain night to sign their respective papers, you would prevent that, would you?—Yes, I think that would be held to be clearly an illegal act.

12866. Then, would you also fix the spot where he should sign his paper?—No, I do not think it necessary to do that; that would be a case of friendly advice.

12867. Might they not consult with each other as to who would be the best person to support?—Yes, clearly they might do that.

12868. At whose expense would you cause the poll-book to be published?—At the expense of the borough, but it would be a very small expense, indeed, because the town clerk is obliged by law to have a great number of registers by him, and all that needs to be done is to mark opposite the names of the candidates how each person voted.

12869. You say that you would send a collector round to each house, and that there would be an agent for each candidate to accompany the collector, this arises out of this system of paper voting; at whose expense would all that agency be?—I think at the candidate's expense as at present.

12870. He would pay for the collector and his agent besides?—Quite so; the candidates would divide the expenses of the collectors as they now divide the expenses of the deputy returning officers; the candidate himself would have the option of appointing an inspector, and of course he would pay him.

12871. Then there would be another expense; there would be the returning officer, would there not, for examining all those papers?—Yes, but I do not think that that would be any very large expense, because the returning officer now has to cast up the votes, and the examination of those papers would be done almost as quickly.

12872. You think that it could be done in the course of a day in each ward with a large constituency?—Yes, I think so.

12873. When would the state of the poll be known, according to your plan?—The day but one afterwards, or it might be even the day afterwards; but the day but one afterwards, certainly.

12874. There would be one day required for giving in the votes, and another day to examine them?—Yes, quite so.

12875. And the day after that the poll could be known?—Yes.

12876. You do not know, I suppose, of any case where your plan has been tried, or anything like it?—I do not know, except that in one or two townships in our neighbourhood where they have local boards they conduct their elections by the form of voting paper, and I have been informed, and I believe upon the whole there are fewer irregularities than in the ordinary voting.

12877. You do not know much about that?—No, I have not conducted an election myself upon that plan.

12878. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] When would you allow the voting paper to be signed; at any time after it was delivered?—At any time after it was delivered, within three days.

12879. Do not you think that it might be possible to provide that it might be signed in the presence of the officer who was appointed to collect the papers?—No, I do not; that would be a very difficult thing to do, because the men would be employed very likely at their work either when the voting papers were delivered or when they were collected, and it would not be possible for all men to wait indoors till the officer came round.

12880. You are speaking with regard to working men principally; but suppose that the officer appointed some time in the evening after the men had returned from their work to collect the papers?—There would still be men away from home; because there are a great number of men who work what are called night shifts; that is to say, they go there when the other men are giving over.

12881. Under the present system, a man must leave his work to go and record his vote at the poll, must he not?—He must.

12882. Would there be much greater hardship if he had to leave his work to be present at the time the collecting officer called upon him?—In the one case, he can have a choice between certain hours in the day when he goes and records his vote, but in the other case, he might have to wait indoors the whole day till the officer called; that is the only difficulty that I see.

12883. If that was done, it would avoid any chance of intimidation by any person, would it not?—Quite so.

12884. Because the collecting officer would call with the agents of both parties, and the voting paper would be signed in their presence?—Quite so.

12885. Mr. Villiers.] He would have left the paper before?—He could either leave the paper then, and the voter would sign the paper, or he might have left it before.

12886. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Your plan, I take it, is specially framed against mob intimidation at the polling booth?—That is so, and against bribery on the day of the election, because the state of the poll would be kept secret.

12887. I gather from your evidence that your main objection to the ballot is, that you do not think it would stop the practice of bottling voters?—I do not think that it would either stop the practice of bribery, or the practice of bottling, or of personation, or of intimidation; I think that the same things would be likely to result; at present, of course, no one knows how a man is going to vote when he is going to the poll, except his politics are well known, or except he is accompanied by two or three men whose politics are well known, and then, of course, violence is used; if he went up to vote by the ballot, of course he would either be well known as belonging to one side or the other, or else, no doubt, he would be accompanied by friends who were well known, and he would be subjected to injury and to intimidation just in the same way as he is at present.

12888. Or might he not be suspected by his employer, and might he not say to him, "If you do not give me your vote, I shall discharge you"?—Yes, of course he might easily ascertain how he had voted; I do not see that there is the slightest difficulty in the way of my finding out how a particular man voted even by the ballot.

12889. How?—In this way; of course all boroughs are divided into polling districts, and a certain number of persons within certain districts would be appointed to cast their ballot in a particular place. In the same district there would be committees organised, whose business it would be to canvass, and they would ascertain that which they have always ascertained, namely, how the great bulk of the voters will vote, and there would be a number that do not conceal their politics, and are well known to belong to the one side or the other; and consequently they would at once be set down as partisans either of one candidate or of the other candidate, and then the residue would be persons upon whom influences would have to be brought. The amount of that influence would be ascertained, and then, after the ballot had been taken, if the number of votes did not come up to the number of pledges, the committees would immediately say, "Who is it that have not kept their pledges?" and with very little trouble, indeed, they could ascertain who were the men.

12890. You think that the residue who would wish to preserve secrecy are so small that they might be easily detected?—I think so; I should not have the slightest difficulty in finding out how a man had voted under the ballot, I think.

12891. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I think you stated that the vote might be taken, not in the presence of anyone, but that the agents of the two candidates should call with the collector; what is the object of that?—Simply to prevent the collecting officer from assisting the voter in any way in filling up his voting paper.

12892. What advantage is there in the agents of the two candidates calling if the man can fill it up at any time?—The security is, that the collector does receive the voting paper at the house of the voter; that is all.

12893. But he does not know the circumstances under which the voter signed the paper?—No, certainly not.

12894. Are you aware of a Parliamentary Paper, which was issued some time ago, relating to the election of guardians at Leeds?—I do not remember the specific paper.

12895. But there was an inquiry, in which it was proved that there was a great deal of intimidation and every species of fraud?—Yes, I have heard so.

12896. How does your system prevent that fraud?—Because at present the frauds are mainly caused by persons being unhappily not able to ascertain readily how they are returned as having voted.

12898. You propose your scheme as a remedy against intimidation?—Yes, certainly. I think if people went and forced a man to fill up his voting paper in that way, the candidate's election could not stand for a moment.

12899. What is there to prevent it?—I do not know that there is anything to prevent it; but I do not conceive for one moment that mobs would ever do anything of the kind.

12900. In the case of Leeds, it was proved that there were large bodies of men went and intimidated voters in that way, and obtained their signatures?—Of course that would at once vitiate any election, I think.

12902. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Supposing a voter is prevented from going up to the poll by a mob, that is a notorious fact; it is a fact in the presence of numbers, and such a thing, of course, would vitiate an election?—Not always.

12903. But would not people be able to testify to the fact that people came round to the houses intimidating voters?—Of course it would be public if anything of the kind had been done.

12904. Supposing three or four men combined together and said, "We will go and influence a certain number of voters in a district," what is there to prevent it?—In that case it would be just similar to any case of bribery or intimidation now.

12905. That would not be as public as in the case of an open market-place, where the polling booths are usually put up?—But I think men would not be subject to intimidation by means of three people coming round; no voter would be intimidated by that, or at least very few; but I am speaking now of intimidation, where there are perhaps 300 people coming round the polling booth and filling the booth and filling the approaches to it.

12906. No doubt it would vitiate an election if the returning officer declared that people could not come up to the poll?—Yes; but very frequently, when one party gets possession of the polling booth, the other party sends out a stronger detachment, and then a riot takes place when they get hold of the approaches.

12907. You propound your scheme as a remedy against intimidation principally?—Against mob intimidation.

12908. I do not exactly see how you effect that; can you explain it in any way?—By this means; that mob intimidation of course is very much much easier where a number of persons go to a particular place to record their vote, than when a person can fill up his paper within three days; at least I think so, decidedly.

Mr. T. B. Edge. 16 July 1869.

12909. How do you provide for cases where men cannot write?—Then that man makes his mark in the presence of a witness who signs the paper.

12910. Mr. Villiers.] He is not obliged to sign this paper, is he?—No.

12911. Mr. Edward Egerton.] If he does not sign the paper he loses his vote?—Yes, he loses his vote, but the paper is collected in the same way.

12913. Then the question is not to be asked, "Who is it signed by," and whether the man is or is not on the register?—Of course the voting papers would only be issued to persons whose names are on the register.

12914. Then is the collector to ask the question whether it was signed by the person whose name is on the register, or is he to take the paper delivered to him by anybody, and is that to be recorded as the vote of the voter?—Yes, certainly till the contrary is shown.

12915. Then how are we to discover personation except by a scrutiny and striking off the votes, and setting aside the election?—By severe penalties upon any person filling the paper up or falsifying it.

12916. Have you any idea how many voters there are in the largest ward of Liverpool or Birmingham?—Probably between 7,000 and 8,000.

12917. Mr. Raikes.] Is it not considered a hardship by a great many of the working classes, that they have at the present time to lose a day's or half a-day's wages, by going up personally to record their votes?—Quite so.

12918. Mr. James.] Supposing persons are lodgers in a house as amongst workmen, there are sometimes seven or eight lodgers, would you make a servant girl, or the mistress of the house, the person to vote for all those seven or eight lodgers in the house?—Certainly not.

12919. Supposing when the collecting officer calls for the papers the girl says, "The people are all out, but—" she says, "Here are the papers;" what is he to do?—The voting paper would be filled up with the name of the person who was entitled to vote, and he appears on the register; the voting paper would be handed in to him, and then he would have to take it, and record it.

12921. There is no test that the person who gives the paper has got it from the right person or anyone else?—I take it that the voting paper when delivered would be filled up with the name of the voter as it appeared upon the register.

12922. Or purported to be filled up?—It would be filled up when the paper was delivered, and if that paper was received back again purporting to be signed by the voter, I think it would be taken primâ facie that the voter had signed it; then if the voter had not signed it, it would very soon be discovered whether he had signed it or not; and that would be quite a sufficient remedy against personation.

12923. But even under the present system, when a person goes to the polling booth, and is seen by everybody at the booth, is it not known that cases of personation exist?—Yes.

12924. Would not your plan add tenfold to the opportunity of personation, and the difficulty of discovering it?—I think not.

12925. In the case of a servant girl delivering six or seven voting papers, and one of the voters who purported to vote, came and said, "I did not sign that paper;" would you prosecute her, or what steps would you take?—I think that where a person gave in a filled-up paper for anyone else, you would have to get evidence to show who had signed that voting paper.

12926. Can you suggest a means of detection?—Yes, I think that the person to whom the voting paper was originally delivered could be called and could be questioned as to whom it had been given up to, and if it had come into the hands of the voter you would then have to ascertain how that signature was obtained.

12927. Supposing he said, "I left out the paper signed by me ready to be delivered when the collector called, but it has been altered?—That would be like any other evidence that is given where there is a case of personation; a person comes and says, "Some one else has been voting for me;" that would be one of those things which would be inquired into upon an election petition.

12928. The open vote of a person is seen by hundreds of persons present, but here it is seen by only one?—Every person who is in the booth sees the vote, but as a rule there are very few people in the booth with the voter.

12929. But the booth is open generally so that they can all see them go in?—That is not my experience; we have generally voted in public buildings in our part of the country.

12930. Mr. Leatham.] Is mob intimidation the most disastrous influence of an undue character that you have to contend against in Bolton?—It is.

12931. Is it not well known there that people will vote in accordance with the wishes of their employers?—No, not in Bolton.

12932. Used it not to be said, "Tell me the owners of the chimneys, and I will determine the result of the election?—I never heard it said in Bolton.

12933. Suppose the voting paper was not filled up, and was not given up signed, what should you do then?—The collector would receive it, and the vote would be lost.

12934. Because it was not signed at the particular moment when the man called?—Certainly.

12935. It being perfectly uncertain what part of the day he would call?—Yes, but the voting paper would be there three days previously.

12936. He is not to sign it in the presence of the the collector, is he?—No, that is not made imperative; he may do it if he likes.

12937. How long would you give him to make up his mind?—He ought to be in a position to sign immediately the collector calls; the collector ought not to have to wait.

12938. Supposing the man hesitates, and has not made up his mind?—Then he must give up the voting paper at once, or he must lose his vote. The collector would say, "I want your paper," and if he says, "I have not made up my mind whom I will vote for," the collector would make a minute of it in his collecting-book, and no doubt the inspectors would do the same, and the vote would be lost.

12939. An uneducated man would tell the collector that he had not made up his mind, and would probably hesitate, and enter into an argument, and probably ask him to suggest whom the voting paper is to be filled up for, and he might spend 10 minutes or a quarter of an hour in getting hold of the voting paper?—I do not think that would be the result; I think persons would get to know that if the paper was not filled up when the collector called they would lose their vote, and I think the appointment of an inspector would prevent any argument between the voter and the collector as to the way that he would vote.

12940. How would it prevent a mob going round the town breaking the windows of voters right and left, just as a foretaste of what they are to expect if they vote against the wishes of the mob?—I do not think that it would prevent anything of that kind.

12941. That is a very common form of mob intimidation, is it not?—I say that it would prevent mob intimidation on the day of the election, by the mob taking possession of the polling booth and the approaches to it; I know that the most serious riots occur in that way; almost every riot that we hear of has occurred in that way, by mobs surrounding the polling booths.

12942. Mr. Brand.] I understand it to be an essential part of your plan of voting papers that there should be no canvassing for three days before the day of the polling?—Just so.

12943. Do you mean, that you would make it a penal offence for any person to ask an elector for his vote three days beforehand?—It would be a question of intent; if a man simply asked another, "How do you intend to vote at the election?" I do not take it that that one isolated question would be an offence.

12944. Do not you consider that canvassing?—No, I do not consider that canvassing within the legal meaning of the term canvassing.

12945. Will you explain what you mean by canvassing?—I mean where men are systematically going round to induce persons to vote for any particular candidate.

12946. Do not you consider asking a man for his vote, canvassing?—Not in one isolated case.

12947. Have you had any practical experience of the ballot?—No, I have had no practical experience of the ballot.

12948. Sir George Grey.] As to the time that it would take to collect those papers in a ward of 7,000 or 8,000 electors, as is the case in Birmingham, do you think that one collector could within 12 hours, or within a day, call on 7,000 or 8,000 electors to collect the voting papers?—No, certainly not; I said that the number of collectors would depend upon the number of voters in each ward.

12949. I thought you said that a collector would be sufficient, in your opinion, for each ward?—Certainly not, whatever the size of the ward.

12950. There must not only be an indefinite number of collectors, but an indefinite number of agents, appointed by candidates to accompany each collector, must there not?—At present only 500 voters can poll at each polling-booth, and I say that a collector could collect 1,000 papers in a day, with great ease.

12951. Then there would be seven or eight collectors, with a corresponding number of agents, for each candidate for every ward containing 7,000 or 8,000 electors?—Quite so, as there is at present, or, where it was necessary, you might double that number.

12952. In the case that was put before you by an honourable Member of the Committee, of half-a-dozen or more lodgers in the same house, workmen leaving their voting papers to be delivered by a servant girl, when the collector calls, supposing she drops them as she comes down stairs, or loses them, what security has a voter against his vote being lost in that way?—Of course he has no security, that I can see, if he takes no greater care of his vote than that.

12953. But the care that he takes of his vote is what you suggest he should take, as I understand, to leave it at his residence to be delivered by somebody who remains in the house?—Yes, but I think that it would be very exceptional indeed that votes would be lost in that way; I was about to observe that, of course, a number of votes are lost at present by the present system of voting.

12954. Mr. Bright.] Do you come from Bolton?—Yes.

12955. Were you in Bolton at the time when the test ballot was tried at Manchester lately?—I was.

12956. Did you go over to Manchester to see it?—I was residing in Bolton; but I happened to be in London on that day.

12957. You did not instruct yourself at all by what was seen on that day?—No; I had intended to have done so, but I was detained in London.

12958. Your experience with regard to this mode of voting papers is confined to what you have seen in the election of guardians, I presume?—In the election of guardians, and of members of the local board.

12959. Do you say that at Bolton, generally, there is a belief that the elections under that system are satisfactorily conducted?—They are fairly conducted generally.

12960. Have you not heard of many cases where it has been alleged that hundreds of votes and voting papers have been fraudulently or unfairly used?—Yes.

12961. Can you tell us any places where that has been done?—I have heard the allegation made with regard to the election of guardians for the township of Turton, near Bolton, and in the election of the local board at Farnworth, but the cases have been very few indeed.

12962. And cases of bad votes?—Yes, bad votes, and falsified voting papers.

12963. Have you not seen that such charges have been very common in many parts of the country?—I have heard of them in various parts of the country, but not to any very great extent.

12964. With

Mr. T. B. Edge. 16 July 1869.

12964. With regard to the ballot, are you able to say what is the opinion of persons in your town with regard to it generally?—I think the opinion of the town generally is decidedly against it.

12965. How do you judge of that?—I judge from meeting great numbers of persons of both sides of opinion.

12966. Is it not the fact that, with regard to the Liberal party in Bolton, the ballot has always been one of the propositions generally supported?—Yes, by the bulk of them, but I have heard objections by a great many of the Liberal party to the ballot as well.

12967. Do you consider the present system of elections one that is very unsatisfactory?—I do not consider it extremely unsatisfactory; there is no doubt that there may be amendments made in the mode of conducting elections as at present.

12968. Your objections refer chiefly, do they not, to intimidation by a large number of persons?—My objection to the present system are chiefly these, that it induces bribery on the day of the election, that voters going to the poll are subjected to intimidation in going to vote, and that it causes a great deal of treating and drunkenness on the day of the election.

12969. And that as the termination of the poll approaches, the excitement and the disposition to riot increases, is not that so?—Yes, that is so.

12970. If the poll could be conducted without the public knowing precisely how it was going on, do you think that that would be an advantage?—I think so decidedly.

12971. Chairman.] How many votes a day do you suppose that one collector could collect?—I think he could collect a thousand voting papers.

12972. For how many hours would you allow the election to go on?—Say from ten to four, six hours.

12973. How many minutes are there in six hours?—Three hundred and sixty.

12974. Could he collect nearly three votes a minute?—I should say so.

12975. Could he call at three houses in a minute?—The houses would be next door to each other, and as the collector would go along collecting the voting papers, the persons would bring the voting papers to him.

12976. Supposing the voting paper is not produced at the moment the collector calls at the house, might it not take him five minutes?—It might in some cases.

12977. Do you believe that he could call at the houses and collect the votes at a general rate of one a minute?—I only know this, that the voting papers in the election of guardians are collected in the course of a day throughout the whole of Bolton; it is merely a question of the number of collectors.

12978. On what ground have you formed your opinion that one collector could collect 1,000 votes in six hours?—Upon my impression that I believe in some wards where we have somewhere like 1,200 voters, they have only two collectors to collect the voting papers for the guardians.

12979. Would you not allow the voter, if he thought fit, to send in his vote by post, or by some other means?—I do not know; I scarcely think I should, if this system was adopted?—It would cause great irregularity.

12980. What irregularity?—When the collector called he would have to note down at every house where the voting paper was not delivered that he had not received the voting paper, and the reason of it, and that would cause him to have a much greater amount of trouble.

12981. Do you recommend this system for counties?—I think a modification of that system with the University voting system would do for counties very well.

12982. What kind of modification do you propose?—Of course there are many voters in counties who are not resident within the township for which they have qualifications, and of course house to house collecting votes would not suit in that case; for occupiers it would suit, but in the other case I think that they ought to be enabled to vote, and to send their papers by post, as in the case of the Universities.

12983. What advantage do you think this plan has over the plan of secret voting?—I think that it would give greater confidence to the public that the elections were fairly conducted, because every man would be able to see whether his vote had had the effect that he had intended it to have had. Of course I am speaking now upon general principle against the ballot; I think that if the ballot were adopted, it would tend to repress public opinion; I think it would not prevent an employer from obtaining his workman's promise; it would only enable the workman to break his promise, and I think that it could very easily be detected whether a man had kept his promise or not; it could be pretty well ascertained.

12984. I think the chief advantages which you imagine would be secured by your mode of voting, would be to stop bribery on the polling day, and to prevent a voter being intimidated on his way to the polling booth?—Yes.

12985. The ballot would equally prevent bribery on the polling day, would it not?—Yes, I think so.

12986. Then, its sole recommendation over the ballot, in your opinion, is that intimidation on the polling day would not go on?—So far as malpractices are concerned.

12987. Would there be any reason why an employer of labour, or an owner of property, should not visit the houses of his workmen, and see them fill up their voting papers?—I think there would be a very great objection to his doing that.

12988. How would you prevent it?—I would prohibit it under a penalty, and make it an offence which would void an election, as various acts of undue influence void an election now.

12989. You would not allow an employer of labour to visit one of his workmen's cottages during those three days?—Certainly not.

12990. Though he might be in the habit of doing so regularly?—Not for the purpose of inducing him to vote.

12991. How would you prove the purpose?—The whole question would be as to the system that he adopted. Of course if an employer wanted to see one of his workmen, and called at his house during those three days, and happened to mention it, no judge of an election petition would ever say that that constituted intimidation or bribery; but if he made a tour of all his workmen's houses on a day within the three days, and mentioned the voting papers, and saw them filled up, I think no judge would come to any other conclusion than that he did it for the purpose of influencing them to vote.

12992. Sir

12992. Sir George Grey.] What would be the result?—The Member would be unseated.

12993. Quite irrespective of agency?—No.

12994. Supposing he was no agent of the sitting Member, what then?—No, certainly not; in that case, he would not be unseated; I should certainly not unseat a member, if he was no agent, in any way; but a person visiting houses in that way, would be subject to penalties personally.

12995. Chairman.] Would there be anything to prevent voters going to the committee-room of their ward, and filling up their papers there?—No, there is no reason against that, because a man who would go to the committee-room of his ward to fill up his voting paper, is pretty sure to vote in the way that he intends.

12996. Would not that be a very easy mode of getting a little bribery done?—I do not see that it would.

12997. Supposing that there is a sort of invitation sent out to the voters in a ward, to come to the committee-room the evening or a couple of days before the polling, and bring their voting papers with them, would not there be every security for the value being received in return for the bribery?—I do not think that there would be any greater facilities than there are at present for bribery.

12998. It precludes all uncertainty about the matter, does it not?—It would preclude all uncertainty about the man signing the voting paper.

12999. The briber would see the voting paper signed, and would make sure that the person polled for 5*l.* or 1*l.*, or whatever it was, that he gave him?—Quite so; but at the same time I think that the number of cases of bribery would be so multiplied, and so notorious, that I think it would be sure to be detected; I do not think such a thing could be done practically.

13000. Why would it be easier to detect it then than it is now?—It would be easier in this way: that if invitations were sent to persons to take their voting papers to a committee-room, the inference would be strong that it was intended unduly to influence them in some manner. I am quite sure that it would come out that bribery had been practised; it would be impossible to keep it secret.

13001. It does not always come out now, does it?—It does not come out in every case, but any extensive amount of bribery is sure to come out.

13002. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You have been acting as agent, have you not, in some county elections?—Yes.

13003. Was your attention ever directed to the great expense of paid legal agency in county elections?—I do not know that my attention has ever been directed to that.

13004. You are not aware that the sums spent in that way are very large?—No; I am not aware of that.

13005. Sir George Grey.] For what counties have you been an agent in elections?—South Lancashire and South-east Lancashire.

13006. Do you know what in those cases was paid for agency for any one of the candidates?—I do not.

CERTIFICATES and REPORTS to the SPEAKER of the HOUSE of COMMONS from the JUDGES selected for the TRIAL of ELECTION PETITIONS.

ENGLAND.

Beverley.

BEVERLEY ELECTION.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons:

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify that upon the 9th day of March 1869, and the two following days, I duly held a Court at Beverley, in the county of York, for the trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the said borough of Beverley, between Luke Hind, John Armstrong, and Joseph Dannatt, Petitioners; and Sir Henry Edwards, baronet, and Edmund Hegan Kennard, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that, at the conclusion of the said trial, I determined that the said Sir Henry Edwards and Edmund Hegan Kennard, being the Members whose election and return were complained of in the said petition, were not duly elected or returned, and that the said election for the said borough was void; and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election, in further pursuance of the said Act, I report as follows:—

That, upon the said trial of the said petition, no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any of the candidates at the said election.

That the number of persons who were proved at the said trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices was 104, and that their names are written in the Schedule hereunto annexed.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I report that corrupt practices did prevail, and that there is reason upon the evidence before me to believe that they did extensively prevail at the said election.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I make this Special Report as to certain matters arising in the course of the said trial, an account of which ought, in my judgment, to be submitted to the House of Commons:—

The registered voters of the borough were stated to be about 2,600, and at the election referred to in the petition, Sir Henry Edwards and Captain Kennard, who until this election was a stranger to the borough, were candidates upon the Conservative interest, and Mr. Maxwell and Mr. Anthony Trollope candidates upon the Liberal interest. The result of the poll was that Sir Henry Edwards polled 1,132 votes; Captain Kennard, 986 votes; Mr. Maxwell, 895 votes; and Mr. Trollope, 740 votes.

It appeared that Sir Henry Edwards first came to Beverley as a candidate in the year 1857, upon the invitation of a Mr. Wreghitt, a draper in the town, on behalf of himself and others. Sir Henry Edwards was then elected. Shortly after that time Sir Henry became the chairman of a company carrying on its business in the borough, called the Beverley Waggon Company, Limited. Of this company a Mr. Norfolk, hereinafter mentioned, was manager, and a Mr. Usher the secretary. From and after the year 1857, and continually until the present time, Mr. Wreghitt has been and is the confidential agent of Sir Henry Edwards for the purposes and management of his Parliamentary interest in the borough, and during this period, and from time to time, he remitted to Mr. Wreghitt sums of money to be expended by him in support of it.

It appeared that no detailed account of the expenditure of this money was ever given to or asked for by Sir Henry Edwards, and although both he and Mr. Wreghitt were witnesses at the trial, neither of them were examined as to what amount of money was so remitted and received, or how it was expended, beyond some general questions, which were answered by a statement that money was paid for charitable purposes, and for a subscription to an agricultural association.

There is a municipal corporation of Beverley, which consists of six aldermen and 18 town councillors; the town council receives the income of the corporation, and defrays its expenditure, and also that of the gas works, the highways, and a navigation; the corporation also possess some property in the neighbourhood, and the town council possess the influence arising from a considerable expenditure in labour, and from the corporation property; the bulk of the labourers and workpeople living in Beverley are, either as freemen or householders, voters at the Parliamentary election. From the time of Mr. Wreghitt's becoming agent to Sir Henry Edwards, a continued and successful attempt has been made by

by means of bribery to secure the town council to the Conservative interest, and for this purpose, through the agency of Mr. Wreghitt, money has been expended in bribing the voters at every contest for the town councillors during his agency. His own statement was that during the last 12 years the average amount spent upon the municipal elections had been from 50 l. to 70 l., but that several times there had been no contest, and that the lowest sum paid to his knowledge at a municipal contest was 130 l. to 140 l., and the highest 300 l., but which occurred before his agency for Sir Henry Edwards; and the evidence was that the bribe paid to the individual voter varied from 2 s. 6 d. to 5 s., which may be taken to have been the ordinary bribe until the election in November last. It was stated that in some instances as much as 1 l. had been given, but the circumstances did not appear under which so large a sum beyond the ordinary one was paid; the result is that the members of the town council are at present almost all in the Conservative interest, and that practically they have in their hands the control and management of the corporation funds, and it is alleged that they make use of them, and the influence arising from them, for the exclusive support and furtherance of this interest.

It also appeared that at an election of town councillors, which occurred two or three years ago, the Conservative candidates had the majority at the poll, but some irregularity having occurred in the election, a quo warranto information was filed in the Court of Queen's Bench, which was determined in favour of the relators, and that Sir Henry Edwards and the other Member for the borough who sat with him in the Conservative interest paid the costs of this information through Mr. Wreghitt. Mr. Wreghitt was much pressed to state the amount so paid, but said he did not recollect it, and he would not say whether it did not amount to 500 l.

It further appeared that the freemen of Beverley, who are also Parliamentary electors, are entitled to the pasturage of large pastures in the borough, to the extent of 1,174 acres, and that by an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1836, 12 pasture masters are to be elected annually by the freemen, which pasture masters have the management of the pastures, and the control of the income and expenditure arising from and relating to them. From a document put in evidence, being their account from February 1868 to February 1869, it appears that the amount of income received by the pasture masters during that year was about 940 l., and the expenditure about 635 l. When Mr. Wreghitt became the agent of Sir Henry Edwards, the practice was that the pasture masters were equally divided between the two parties—the Conservative and Liberal—six of each; but that afterwards, by means of money supplied by Mr. Wreghitt, the same system of bribery was resorted to in the election of pasture masters as in the election of town councillors, and by this corrupt expenditure it has resulted that the entire body is now in the Conservative interest.

By the will of a Mr. Robert Walker, an annual income of about 90 l. was given to the pasture masters, upon trust, to distribute it between poor freemen of the borough, or their widows or children, to aid them in respect of losses which they might sustain by the death of their stock, and to enable them to purchase other stock, to help them in the world, and for other purposes of a similar nature; and the testator declared "his wish and intention to be that the payments should be made in such substantial sums as would effect the object he had in view, and that they should not be made or given in small amounts so as to embrace a greater number of objects." An account of the receipts and payments for the year ending February 1869, was put in evidence, by which it appears that the net income of that year was distributed amongst 42 persons. Of these six were women, and of the remainder all, except two, were Parliamentary voters. The sums paid were all small, varying from 3 l. downwards, and it is alleged that these payments were made by the pasture masters in direct violation of their trust, and with a view to influence votes at the elections. At the late election, 34 of these freemen voted, of whom 26 voted for Sir Henry Edwards, 23 for Mr. Kennard, 11 for Mr. Maxwell, and seven for Mr. Trollope.

It was notorious, during the autumn of last year, that Parliament would be dissolved, and the general election take place about the middle of November. The election of town councillors took place on the 2nd. There were six vacancies to be filled up, three in each of the two wards, there being two in the borough; and there were six Conservative and six Liberal candidates. Three of the Conservative candidates were Mr. Norfolk, Mr. Usher, and a Mr. J. B. Lowther. The election took place on Monday the 2nd November, and the Parliamentary election about a fortnight afterwards; it appears from the evidence of Mr. Norfolk, that on the Friday or Saturday before the municipal election he went to a bank at Beverley, at which he did not keep an account himself, nor was the account of the Waggon Company kept there, and arranged with the manager of that bank for a loan of from 400 l. to 500 l. He stated that he believed he drew out 500 l. on the Saturday, but upon that day and on the Monday he drew out 800 l., 750 l. of which, at least, was spent in bribery; he paid it to various persons whom he named, amongst others, to the Mr. Lowther before mentioned, to whom he gave 100 l. on the Saturday, and 120 l. on the Monday. The municipal electors were to a great extent also Parliamentary electors; there appeared to have been no secrecy either observed or imposed upon the parties bribed. Bribes were paid to all who would accept them; some payments were made in the street, but three houses were particularly named at which the bribery took place; one was at a public house called the "Golden Ball," where a man named Watson, an auctioneer, sat at a table; he had a bag of gold coin before him, and a book in which he entered the names of the persons to whom he paid the bribes, no secrecy was observed, and batches of three or four voters went up at a time, and the bribes were sometimes paid to each in the presence of the others, and in other instances a sum was paid to one to be distributed by him amongst the party accompanying him. Another house where bribes were paid was the shop of a person named Dickenson, where the voting papers were filled up. Another place was a public house of a Mrs. Padget.

It has already been stated that the ordinary bribe previously paid at municipal elections, varied from 2 s. 6 d. to 5 s. For this election, however, except in one instance, no bribe less than 15 s. appears to have been paid; 1 l. was proved to have been paid in several instances, but 17 s. 6 d. was the general bribe; upwards of 60 voters who were bribed, were examined at the trial and proved the fact. The bribes were paid indiscriminately to all who would receive them, and several of the witnesses stated that they were paid and received, "of course." The result was that early in the morning of the municipal election, certainly as early as 11 o'clock, the Conservative candidates were in a great majority, so great that the managers of the Liberal party gave up the contest, but notwithstanding this, and after more than half of the entire voters had voted for the Conservative candidates, the payment of the bribes was continued, and nearly the whole of 800 l. was expended in this manner. It was stated by Mr. Norfolk, that this 800 l. was to be repaid by him to the bank, each of the other candidates contributing an equal share with him, but no part of this money has yet been repaid, and the whole amount is still due to the bank nor have the other candidates paid to Mr. Norfolk any part of what is alleged they were to contribute. Very few of the above facts, and none of them relative to the last municipal election, were disputed or denied by the learned counsel for the Respondents. The contention was that the bribes then given were to influence the municipal elections only, and not at all to influence the Parliamentary election.

Sir Henry Edwards and Captain Kennard came to Beverley the following day, the 3rd November, and there was no evidence that from that day any bribery took place; and Sir Henry Edwards stated that until the trial he never was told or heard of the bribery and corruption which had taken place at the municipal election; as it was proved that Mr. Lowther and others who were directly engaged in this bribing, canvassed with him during the ensuing fortnight, it is obvious that the municipal bribery of the 2nd of November, which must have been notorious in the borough, was of purpose and design concealed and kept back from him. Captain Kennard seems to have heard something of it; but as his evidence was merely that he might have been told of it, he most probably was not made acquainted with its extent, as if he had, he could not have failed to have recollected it.

I was perfectly satisfied upon the whole of the evidence that more than 800 Parliamentary electors were bribed, and what several witnesses stated to have been said to them by the persons who bribed them: viz., that the bribes were for the Parliamentary election as well as the municipal election was the truth. The persons who were alleged to have made these statements were all named, and not one of them were called to contradict it. The excuse alleged for this bribery was that the Liberal party were doing the same.

It was stated by Mr. Norfolk that his reason for drawing out the money on the Monday was, that he was told the Liberal party were paying 25 s. a vote, with money supplied by Messrs. Maxwell and Trollope, who were at that time in the borough as candidates. I had no means of investigating this matter, as it was not in issue in the petition before me, nor did I think it right of myself to continue the examination of the witnesses called beyond the examination and cross-examination of the learned counsel.

The only witnesses called for the Respondents were Mr. Norfolk and Mr. Wreghitt, and the Respondents themselves; neither Mr. Lowther nor any of the other persons who paid the bribes were called. If it be thought right to have the condition of this borough, with regard to the general prevalence of bribery and corruption, thoroughly investigated, it can only be done by a commission issued in pursuance of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57.

BEWDLEY ELECTION.

COURT for the Trial of an Election Petition for the Borough of Bewdley, in the County of Worcester, between Charles Sturge and John Baldwin, Petitioners; and Sir Richard Attwood Glass, Respondent.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Sir, Bewdley, 25 January 1869.

IN compliance with the directions of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," I hereby certify that the above-named Sir Richard Attwood Glass was not duly elected, and that the above election was void.

And I report that it was not proved that any corrupt practice had been committed with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at the above election.

That Robert Acton Pardoe, attorney at law, an agent for Sir Richard Attwood Glass, and George Baker Burmish, also an agent for Sir Richard Attwood Glass, were guilty of corrupt treating at the said election.

That Stephen Fort accepted a bribe of 10 s. from one John Taylor, to induce him to vote for Sir Richard Attwood Glass, and afterwards voted against him.

That James Hunt was bribed to vote for Sir Richard Attwood Glass by 5 l., advanced to him as a loan by Christopher Pountney.

That Abram John Hamer was bribed to vote for Sir Richard Attwood Glass, but it was not proved who gave the bribe, or how much it was.

That Isaac Leverton, Herbert Burton, and Richard Millington, being at Bristol, were induced to come to Bewdley to vote for Sir Richard Attwood Glass by having their expenses from Bristol and back paid them, and would not have voted had this not been done. That it was not proved who advanced the money; nor did it appear that the money paid them, though it was an illegal payment, exceeded the reasonable expenses, so as to be a cloak for what in popular language would be called bribery.

That it was proved that corrupt treating by opening public-houses did extensively prevail at the election.

No evidence was given of any treating on behalf of Mr. Lloyd, the unsuccessful candidate.

That it was proved that a practice extensively prevailed on both sides of employing and paying a large number of persons as what was called "watchers," who rendered no service of any value in return. That this practice appears to have been kept up at Bewdley because it was formerly the practice at old elections, and is very objectionable, for the same reasons as those which have induced the Legislature to prohibit treating.

App. No. 1.

There is reason to believe that the payments were made to influence voters connected with the watchers; and also, that voters themselves were so employed, though no proof was given of any voter having been actually paid.

There was no reason to believe that direct bribery extensively prevailed at the election.

I have the honour to be,
COLIN BLACKBURN,
Judge of the said Court.

BLACKBURN ELECTION.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

BLACKBURN ELECTION PETITION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Otterspool, Watford, 18 March 1869.

IN the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas by John Gerald Potter and Montague Joseph Fielden, Esquires, candidates at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of Blackburn, against William Henry Hornby, Esq., and Joseph Fielden, Esq., who were returned as elected to serve in Parliament for the said borough, by which petition a charge was made of corrupt practices having been committed at the election, and it was prayed that it might be determined that the said William Henry Hornby and Joseph Fielden were not duly elected or returned, and that the election was void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the petition, certify and report as follows:—

1. William Henry Hornby, Esq., one of the Members whose election and return are complained of by the petition, was not duly elected and returned.

2. Joseph Feilden, Esq., the other Member whose election and return are complained of by the petition, was not duly elected and returned.

3. The election complained of by the petition was void, by reason that the Members whose election is complained of were by their agents, but not personally, guilty of undue influence at such election within the meaning of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," section 36.

4. No corrupt practice was committed at such election by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate.

5. Upon the evidence it did not appear that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed, at the election.

6. Undue influence was exercised at the election by the threatened discharge in some cases, and the actual discharge or expulsion in others, shortly before the election, of workmen at certain mills in the borough, on account of their political opinions, such treatment having a direct tendency to intimidate not only those who were discharged or expelled, but also others who entertained, or might, if let alone, have chosen to adopt like opinions, and to induce them either to vote against, or not to vote according to such opinions. The intimidation began about the time of the municipal election, which preceded the Parliamentary election by a fortnight, and was contested by the party to which the Members adhered, with their concurrence, avowedly upon the same constitutional principles and as part of one political contest. The intimidation proceeded in most instances immediately from the fellow-workmen of those who were illtreated, but under circumstances in which it is highly improbable that they should have ventured upon such misconduct of their own heads, and in which the just inference is that they were led astray by overlookers or others in a higher position. In these cases the employers within a few days restored quiet, and in most instances did their best to repair the mischief by replacing the men discharged. Amongst those who thus interfered with their fellow-workmen were very many whose names did not appear. The following were named, but no individual case was dwelt upon, and they were not called as witnesses, nor had any opportunity of explanation, viz., James Haworth, Henry Wade, Thomas Whittall, Henry Sharples, John Proctor (not the witness of a like name), Thomas Sharrock (not the witness), David Smalley, John Haworth (not the witness), George and James Indle, Jethro Leech, John Fielding, and James Fielding. In another and smaller class of cases, men were threatened and discharged by persons in authority as managers, overlookers, and otherwise, who as a class had been specially called upon (with the sanction of the Members) to exercise their influence on the men, as in the case of William Greenwood's mill by John Langtree and William Wade, and at Coddington's Canal mill by one Catlow, in the latter of which cases an attempt was made to recall the the men, which failed because of their having taken legal proceedings by which, in the end, they recovered damages. The mischief thus done extended to a portion only of the mills upon the winning side. It does not appear to have led to retaliation. It was speedily checked by the interposition of the employers, but it must have left behind distrust and apprehension, which were expressly proved to have affected the votes of some few, and more than probably influenced many. For this interference with the free exercise of the franchise, proceeding in part, at least, from agency affecting the Members returned, the election is adjudged to be void.

7. The names of the persons mentioned in the next preceding paragraph are stated in obedience to "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," section 11, article 14, letter (b), and not for the purpose of suggesting ulterior proceedings; on the contrary, it is respectfully submitted that, considering all the circumstances, any further vindication of the law is unnecessary.

BODMIN ELECTION.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

Election Petition for Bodmin.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas, Chambers, 1 March 1869.

In the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by Richard Adams and others, voters at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of Bodmin, against the Honourable Edward Frederick Leveson Gower, who was upon that occasion elected and returned, which petition alleged, amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said Honourable Edward Frederick Leveson Gower was not duly elected or returned, and that the said election was void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report such determination as follows:—

1. Edward Frederick Leveson Gower, the Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

2. No corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

3. Upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election.

J. S. Willes.

BRADFORD ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the above Act, certify that, upon the 25th day of January 1869, and several days following, I duly held a Court at Bradford, in the County of York, for the trial of, and did try, the election petition for the Borough of Bradford aforesaid, between John Haley and others, Petitioners, and Henry William Ripley, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify, that, at the conclusion of the said trial, I determined that the said Henry William Ripley, being the Member whose election and return were complained of in the said petition, was not duly elected, and that his election was void, because he, by his agents, was guilty of treating at the said election contrary to the statutes in such case made and provided; and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election; in further pursuance of the said Act I report as follows:—

That, upon the trial of the said petition, no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any of the candidates at the said election.

And, in pursuance of the said Act, I further report, that the persons who were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices are Edward Kitcheman, Jeremiah Ryan, William Bowen, Michael Lamb, Michael Coyne, William Luby, Patrick Dwyer, John Young, James Corkran, John Hoare, Richard Duffy, John Bray, James Rowney, James Tidswell, Robert Conroy, William Hinnigan, James Burke, Bryan O'Neile, Michael Manton, John Walsh, Patrick Murphy, William Handy, Samuel Abel, and Joseph Gibson.

App. No. 1.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I report, that, upon the evidence before me, there was no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the election to which the said petition relates, except as stated in my special report.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I make this special report as to matters which arose in the course of the said trial, an account of which ought, in my judgment, to be submitted to the House of Commons.

It was proved that the said Henry William Ripley had opened an unlimited credit at his bankers in favour of his agent, who availed himself of it to the extent of upwards of 7,200*l.*, and who sent in to the returning officer a mere abstract of totals of outlay unaccompanied by vouchers, and that this was knowingly done contrary to the statute 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, s. 4. That, in one ward of the said borough, inhabited principally by Irishmen of the working class, large numbers were influenced by corrupt practices committed by the agents of the said Henry William Ripley, and that upwards of 100 public-houses and beerhouses were opened as committee-rooms, or pretended committee-rooms, in the interest of the said Henry William Ripley, where drink, without payment, was supplied to voters, which was afterwards paid for by the agents of the said Henry William Ripley.

SAMUEL MARTIN.

BRADFORD ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the above Act, certify, that upon the 29th day of January 1869, and several days following, I duly held a Court at Bradford, in the County of York, for the trial of, and did try the election petition for the Borough of Bradford aforesaid, between Samuel Storey and Thomas Garnett, Petitioners; and William Edward Forster, Respondent.

And in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that at the conclusion of the said trial I determined that the said William Edward Forster, the Member whose election and return were complained of in the said petition, was duly elected and returned, and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election, I report, in further pursuance of the said Act, as follows:

That upon the trial of the said petition no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any of the candidates at the said election.

And I further, in pursuance of the said Act, report, that upon the trial of this petition there was not evidence before me that corrupt practices prevailed at the said election.

IN the Matter of an Election Petition for the Borough of Bradford, presented to the Court of Common Pleas, upon the 8th of January 1869, by Samuel Storey and Thomas Garnett, against the Right Honourable William Edward Forster, a Member of Parliament,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, report as follows:—

I have given leave to withdraw the above petition, upon being satisfied that such withdrawal was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

BRIDGWATER ELECTION.

Bridgwater.

The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

Court for the Trial of an Election Petition for the Borough of Bridgwater, in the County of Somerset, between Henry Westropp, Esq., and Charles William Gray, Esq., Petitioners; and Alexander William Kinglake, Esq., and Philip Vanderbyl, Esq., Respondents.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Sir, Bridgwater, 26 February 1869.

I hereby certify, that at the trial of the above election petition, I determined that Alexander William Kinglake, Esq., and Philip Vanderbyl, Esq., were not duly elected, and that the election was void.

And, in compliance with the directions of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," s. 11, I report,—

A. That Alexander William Kinglake, Esq., and Philip Vanderbyl, Esq., were by their agents guilty of bribery; and that it was not proved that such bribery was committed with the knowledge or consent of either of them.

B. That Henry Chapman Bussell was proved to have been guilty of bribery in paying 10 l. each to James Palmer, William Crocker, and James Hayward, to induce them to vote for Messrs. Kinglake and Vanderbyl; and by offering a similar sum to William Luckes; and that William Crocker and James Hayward were guilty of bribery in accepting the sum of 10 l. each for their votes.

C. That there is reason to believe that bribery extensively prevailed at the election; my reasons for coming to this conclusion are, that it appears that statements had been made, that if any money was paid to any voters on behalf of Messrs. Kinglake and Vanderbyl, the same sum should be paid to all who voted for them; the inquiry was stopped from its being admitted that agency was established with respect to Henry Chapman Bussell, so that it was not ascertained how far those statements were made by agents for whom the Members were responsible, but it was sufficiently proved that an expectation that these promises would be fulfilled, existed amongst the voters; that a large number of the voters refrained from voting till past one o'clock, about which time Henry Chapman Bussell was proved to have bribed the three persons above named, and there was strong reason to suspect (though it was not proved) that he bribed others, and that voters were also bribed by one Andrew Allan, both Bussell and Allan having gone away so that they could not be examined as witnesses.

That Messrs. Kinglake and Vanderbyl, who, before the proved and suspected giving of bribes, were in a great minority, immediately began to poll many votes, and were placed in a majority; and I therefore think there is reason to believe that many of the voters for them at this time were induced either by actual money paid to them, or the expectation of a sum similar to that paid to others.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

KINGSTON-UPON-HULL ELECTION PETITION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas, Judges' Chambers,
8 March 1869.

IN the Matter of an Election Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas by Joseph Walker Pease and others against Charles Morgan Norwood and James Clay, Esquires, Members of Parliament, complaining of their election and return at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of Kingston-upon-Hull,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, report as follows, viz.:—

Upon the application of the Petitioners I have given leave to withdraw the petition, being satisfied that such withdrawal was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

J. S. WILLES.

Lichfield.

LICHFIELD ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas Chamber, 1 February 1869.

IN the Matter of a Petition to the Court of Common Pleas, under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by the Honourable Augustus Henry Archibald Anson, a candidate at the last Parliamentary election for the City of Lichfield, against Richard Dyott, Esq., who was upon that occasion elected and returned: which Petition alleged amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said Richard Dyott was not duly elected, and ought not to have been returned, and that the said Augustus Henry Archibald Anson was duly elected, and ought to have been returned, or that the election was void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report as follows:—

1. Richard Dyott, Esq., the Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

App. No. 1.

Lichfield.

2. No corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge of consent of any candidate at such election.

3. Upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that they have, extensively prevailed at the election.

J. S. Willes.

Norwich.

NORWICH ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act, certify—

1. That upon the 14th day of January instant, and several days following, I duly held a Court at Norwich for the Trial of, and did try, the Election Petition for the city of Norwich between Jacob Henry Tillett, Petitioner, and Sir Henry Josias Stracey, Respondent.

2. And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that, at the conclusion of the said trial, I determined that the said Sir Henry Josias Stracey, being the Member whose return and election were complained of in the said petition, was not duly elected, and that his election was void; and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

3. And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been ommitted at the said election; in further pursuance of said Act I report as follows:—

4. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any of the candidates at the said election; and, further, that it was proved to my satisfaction that neither the said Sir Henry Josias Stracey or the other candidates at the said election had any personal knowledge or connection whatever with bribery or any other illegal or corrupt practice.

5. And I further report that the names of persons who were proved at the trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices are Robert Hardiment, Arthur Hunt, Robert Callow, and Thomas Hutchings.

6. And I further report that corrupt practices did prevail at the said election, and that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices did extensively prevail at the same, and that they were of the nature stated in my special Report, which follows.

7. And I do further, in pursuance of the said Act, make this Special Report as to matters which arose in the course of the said trial, an account of which ought, in my judgment, to be submitted to the House of Commons.

At the middle of the day of polling Sir William Russell and Mr. Tillett, the Liberal candidates, had a considerable majority, and there is no reason to believe that up to this time any corrupt vote had been given on either side; but from thence until the close of the poll I believe that bribery was extensively committed in order to procure the election of Sir Henry Josias Stracey. So far as the evidence went, the voters who were bribed were of one class, viz., workmen or labourers for daily wages. These people did not go to work that day, but collected in considerable numbers in and about public-houses and beer-shops, and there waited to be bribed. Some of them either of themselves thought, or it was suggested to them by others, that it was reasonable and just they should be paid their day's wages by the candidate for whom they voted. It may be that in some instances this feeling was honestly entertained, but in the great majority of instances it was a mere pretext in order to obtain bribes. A number of these voters went to the poll in a gross state of drunkenness, some of them so drunk as not to know for whom they came to vote; and I have no doubt that a very considerable number of bribed voters gave their votes between two and four o'clock of the day of polling. I expected that there would have been a scrutiny, but it was abandoned on behalf of Mr. Tillett, and I am, therefore, unable to state the number of the bribed voters. I am also unable to state who the bribers were, with the exception of the man Hardiment, who absconded after the petition was presented, and the man Arthur Hunt, who was examined at the trial. Another man, called Warledge, also absconded after the petition was presented, and he, probably, was extensively employed in bribing. The sums paid to each bribed voter was small. One pound to each was the sum proved to have been paid by Hardiment, and 7 s. 6 d. each to the voters bribed by Hunt. I am also unable to state what amount of money was spent in bribery, and I failed to obtain any information as to the source from whence the money came, or the persons by whom it was supplied to the bribers; but I believe that there was a corrupt agency at Norwich by which the money was supplied. Both Sir H. J. Stracey and a gentleman (Mr. Patterson) who was an active supporter of his, and also Mr. Chittock, the election agent for Sir Henry, all stated upon their examinations that they did not know, and had no suspicion, from what source or quarter the money used in bribery came.

I regret

I regret that I am unable to give further information upon this matter; but the trial before me was confined to evidence as to bribery (one instance being sufficient) on behalf of Sir H. J. Stracey or an agent for whom he was responsible, or by Mr. Tillet or an agent for whom he was responsible. The case of general bribery, therefore, arose only incidentally. If it be deemed right to have this matter further investigated, it can only be done under the provisions of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57.

The claim to the seat by Mr. Tillett was abandoned for reasons satisfactory to me; and I believe the election was, on his part, perfectly pure.

A copy of the evidence, taken by the deputy of the short hand-writer of the House of Commons, accompanies this, my certificate.

22 January 1869. SAMUEL MARTIN.

NORWICH ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, the Judge who tried the said election petition, and made my report to you of my determination thereon, dated 22nd January 1869, further report, that I determined that Sir Henry Josias Stracey, Baronet, was not duly elected, and that his election was void, because he, by his agent, was guilty of bribery at the said election.

PENRYN ELECTION.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

ELECTION PETITION FOR PENRYN.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas Chambers,
1 March 1869.

IN the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by Robert Richards Broad and others, voters at the last Parliamentary Election for the Borough of Penryn, against Robert Nicholas Fowler and Edward Backhouse Eastwick, Esqrs., who were upon that occasion elected and returned, which Petition alleged, amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the Election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said Robert Nicholas Fowler and Edward Backhouse Eastwick were not duly elected or returned, and that their said election and return were and are wholly null and void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report such determination as follows:—

1. The said Robert Nicholas Fowler, one of the Members whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

2. The said Edward Backhouse Eastwick, the other Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

3. No corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

4. Upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

PRESTON ELECTION PETITION.

To the Right Honoura ble the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas, Judges' Chambers,
8 March 1869.

IN the Matter of an Election Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas by Joseph Toulmin and Richard Pemberton, against Edward Hermon, Esq., and Sir Thomas George Fermor Hesketh, Baronet, Members of Parliament, complaining of their election and return at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of Preston.

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, report as follows, viz.:—

Upon the application of the Petitioners I have given leave to withdraw the petition, being satisfied that such withdrawal was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

Salford.

SALFORD ELECTION.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the above Act, certify that upon the 24th day of February 1869, and several days following, I duly held a Court at Salford, in the county of Lancaster, for the trial of, and did try, the election petition for the borough of Salford aforesaid, between Roderick Anderson, Jesse Bryant, and Edward Charlton Harding, Petitioners; and Charles Edward Cawley and William Thomas Charley, Respondents.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that at the conclusion of the said trial I determined that the said Charles Edward Cawley and William Thomas Charley, being the Members whose elections and return were complained of in the said petition, were duly elected and returned; and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election, I, in further pursuance of the said Act, report as follows:—

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the consent or knowledge of any of the candidates at the said election.

And I further report, in pursuance of the said Act, that upon the trial of the said petition there was not evidence before me that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said election.

STALYBRIDGE ELECTION.

COURT for the Trial of an Election Petition for the Borough of Stalybridge, between James Ogden, John Wooley, and Abel Buckley, Petitioners; and James Sidebottom, Esq., Respondent.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Sir, Stalybridge, 13 February 1869.

I HEREBY certify that, at the trial of the above election petition, I determined that James Sidebottom, Esq., the Member whose return and election is complained of, was duly returned and elected.

And in compliance with the directions of "The Parliamentary Election Act, 1868," sect. 11, I report—

a. That no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at the said election.

b. That it was proved at the trial that Richard Evans and Thomas Gilbert were bribed to vote for the said James Sidebottom, Esq., by a promise made by Joseph Thornely that, if they did so, their day's wages should be made good to them; but that the said bribe was not by an agent of the said James Sidebottom, Esq.

c. That corrupt practices have not been proved to have, nor is there any reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the said election.

STOCKPORT ELECTION.

Stockport.

In the Matter of two Election Petitions for the Borough of Stockport, between James Walton, Esq., of Stockport, and William Jones, of Stockport, Petitioners, and John Benjamin Smith, Esq., Respondent; and Ephraim Hallam, Esq., of Oldfield Hall, near Stockport, and John Eskrigge, Esq., of Stockport, Petitioners, and William Tipping, Respondent.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Judges' Chambers, Chancery-lane,
8 February 1869.

Sir,

In the above petitions I have given leave to the Petitioners in each case to withdraw the petition, and, in compliance with the 36th section of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," I beg to report that after causing full notice to be given in the Borough of Stockport of the time and place at which the application was to be heard, no person appeared before me to give any evidence showing that the withdrawal of the petitions was the result of any corrupt arrangement, or that the withdrawal of one petition was in consideration of the withdrawal of the other; and the Petitioners and Respondents in each case, being required by me so to do, made affidavit that, according to their knowledge, information, and belief, no such arrangement or consideration existed.

I think it impossible that such matters could exist without their or some of them knowing, being informed, or believing that they existed.

I therefore report that, in my opinion, the withdrawal of those petitions was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

I have the honour to be,
Colin Blackburn,
Election Judge.

TAMWORTH ELECTION.

Tamworth.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Judges' Lodgings, Coventry,
18 February 1869.

In the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas, under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by John Hill and Thomas Watton, voters at the last Parliamentary Election for the Borough of Tamworth, against the Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., and the Right Honourable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, Knt., who were upon that occasion elected and returned, which petition alleged, amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., was not duly elected or returned, and that the election of him was void; and that the said Right Honourable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, Knt., was not duly elected or returned, and that the election of him was void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, being one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report such determination as follows:—

1. The said Right Honourable Sir Robert Peel, Bart., one of the Members whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

2. The Right Honourable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, Knt., the other Member whose return is complained of by the Petitioner, was duly elected and returned.

3. No corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

4. Upon the evidence before me it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

TAUNTON ELECTION.

Taunton.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

An Election Petition for the Borough of Taunton, in the County of Somerset, between John Dyke and William Oaten, Petitioners; and Alexander Charles Barclay, Respondent.

I, the undersigned Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, App. No. 1. Taunton.

England, do hereby certify and report to you that I have this day heard an application, made in the manner prescribed by "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1688," for the withdrawal of this petition, and have given leave to withdraw the same; and I further report to you that, in my opinion, the withdrawal of this petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

TAUNTON ELECTION.

THE ELECTION PETITIONS ACT, 1868.

COURT for the Trial of an Election Petition for the Borough of Taunton, in the County of Somerset, between Thomas Meredith Williams and Joseph Mellor, Petitioners; and Edward William Cox, Esq., Respondent.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker.

Sir, Taunton, 5 March 1869.

I HEREBY certify that at the trial of the above election petition, I determined that Mr. Serjeant Cox, the Member whose election is complained of, was not duly returned and elected, and that Henry James, Esq., was duly elected.

And, in compliance with the directions of "The Parliamentary Elections Act," 1868, s. 11, I report—

A. That Mr. Serjeant Cox was by his agents guilty of bribery at the election, but that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at the election.

B. That James Shepherd, acting for a body called the Constitutional and Conservative Association, who were agents for Mr. Serjeant Cox, was proved to be guilty of bribery in distributing 5 s. each to a large number of voters (under colour of paying them for their attendance before the revising barrister), in order to induce them to vote for Mr. Serjeant Cox. And that the following persons, John Chigley, Edward Crosby, Mark Beesly, William Smith, Robert Hughes, Abraham Cann, James Edney, Henry Calbraith, John Deane, James Cole, Thomas Wood, and William Stuckey, were proved to be guilty of bribery in receiving the sums of 5 s. each for voting.

C. That the corrupt practice of paying the sum of 5 s. to voters, under colour of paying as it was called Barristers' Court Money, did extensively prevail at the election, but that there was no reason to believe that any other corrupt practice extensively prevailed.

THIRSK ELECTION PETITION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas, Judges' Chambers,
22 March 1869.

IN the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas by Frederic Bell, Esq., and others, against Sir William Payne Gallwey, Baronet, Member of Parliament for the Borough of Thirsk, praying that it might be determined that the said Sir William Payne Gallwey was not duly elected or returned, and that his election was void,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, report as follows:—

Leave has been given to withdraw the above petition upon proof to my satisfaction that such withdrawal was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, and no person applying to be substituted as Petitioner.

Election Judge.

WARRINGTON ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby certify, in pursuance of the said Act, that upon the 3rd day of February instant (1869) and the following day, I duly held a Court at Warrington, in the counties of Lancaster and Chester, for the trial of, and did try, the election petition for the Borough of Warrington aforesaid, between Miles Crozier and others, Petitioners, and Peter Rylands, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that at the conclusion of the said trial I determined that the said Peter Rylands, being the Member whose election and return were complained of in the said petition, was duly elected and returned, and that the election for the said borough, held on the 17th day of November last, was not void as alleged in the said petition, but was a valid election, and I do certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election, I report, in further pursuance of the said Act, as follows:—

That upon the trial of the said petition no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at the said election.

And I further, in pursuance of the said Act, report that upon the trial of the said petition there was not evidence before me that corrupt practices prevailed at the said election.

SAMUEL MARTIN.

WESTBURY ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Common Pleas Chamber,
6 February 1869.

IN the Matter of a Petition presented to the Court of Common Pleas, under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by Abraham Laverton, a candidate at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of Westbury, against John Lewis Phipps, Esq., who was upon that occasion elected and returned, which petition alleged, amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said John Lewis Phipps was not duly elected or returned; and that the election and return was wholly null and void, and that the said Abraham Laverton was duly elected, and ought to have been returned,

I, Sir James Shaw Willes, Knight, one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report such determination as follows:—

1. John Lewis Phipps, Esq., the Member whose election and return are complained of by the petition, was not duly elected and returned, and the election was void.

2. Joseph Harrop, of Westbury, cloth manufacturer, one of the committee of the said John Lewis Phipps, and an agent for whose conduct the said John Lewis Phipps was in point of law responsible, was, as such agent, guilty of undue influence at the election, within the meaning of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854"; and did, in canvassing the workmen in his employ, who were voters, and had a right to vote at the election, practise intimidation upon them in order to induce them either to vote for the said John Lewis Phipps, or, if they did not so vote, then to refrain from voting at the said election; and by reason of the conduct of the said Joseph Harrop, the said John Lewis Phipps was by his agent, but not personally, guilty of undue influence at such election, within the meaning of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854," sect. 36.

3. No corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of the said John Lewis Phipps, or any candidate at such election.

4. Upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that they have, extensively prevailed at the election.

5. The Petitioner abandoned, and there was no evidence to sustain, the prayer of the petition, that he should be declared to have been duly elected; and the said election has, therefore, become, was, and is, wholly null and void.

WESTMINSTER ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Sir Samuel Martin, Knight, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, do hereby, in pursuance of the above Act, certify that upon the 12th day of February instant (1869), and several days following, I duly held a Court at Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, for the trial of, and did try, the election petition for the borough of Westminster aforesaid, between James Beal and others, Petitioners; and William Henry Smith, Respondent.

And, in further pursuance of the said Act, I certify that at the conclusion of the said trial I determined that the said William Henry Smith, being the Member whose election and return were complained of in the said petition, was duly elected and returned; and I do hereby certify in writing such my determination to you.

And whereas charges were made in the said petition of corrupt practices having been committed at the said election, I, in further pursuance of the said Act, report as follows:—

That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the consent or knowledge of any of the candidates at the said election.

And I further report, in pursuance of the said Act, that, upon the trial of the said petition, there was not evidence before me that any corrupt practices prevailed at the said election.

WINDSOR ELECTION.

Windsor.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Windsor, 15 January 1869.

In the Matter of a Petition to the Court of Common Pleas, under "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," by Robert Richardson Gardner, Esq., a candidate at the last Parliamentary election for the Borough of New Windsor, against Roger Eykyn, Esq., who was upon that occasion elected and returned; which petition alleged, amongst other things, corrupt practices to have been committed at the election, and prayed that it might be determined that the said Roger Eykyn was not duly elected, and ought not to have been returned, and that the said Robert Richardson Gardner was duly elected, and ought to have been returned, or that the election was void; I, being one of the Judges for the Trial of Election Petitions in England, having heard and determined the said petition, do certify and report as follows:—

1. That Roger Eykyn, the Member whose return is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned.

2. That no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

3. Upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that corrupt practices have, nor that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have, extensively prevailed at the election.

4. After the close of the Petitioner's case, and the address of the Respondent's counsel in answer thereto, the Petitioner's counsel stated, in effect, that his client, the Petitioner, felt that the charge of corrupt practices was now made out against the Respondent, and that the Petitioner did not desire to proceed to a scrutiny.

5. Whereupon, and after hearing the examination of the Respondent and two of his alleged agents, I was satisfied that the course taken was not the result of compromise; and I did not require the counsel for the Respondent to proceed further, nor did I consider it my duty to initiate a general inquiry into the proceedings at the election.

Dumfries.

Unto the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Petition of Major George Gustavus Walker to have the election of Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow, Knight, as Member of Parliament for the County of Dumfries, in November 1868, set aside as void,

The Report of Lord Cowan, one of the Election Judges for Scotland.

This petition was lodged with the prescribed officer on the 14th of December 1868.

The trial of the petition was fixed for Monday the 1st of February 1869.

Thereafter an application having been made by the Petitioner to withdraw the petition, the parties were heard upon this application before me on the 22nd of January 1869, and after due notice, no other party having appeared proposing that he should be substituted as Petitioner, the petition was of same date held to be withdrawn, the Petitioner being found liable in costs to the Respondent in terms of the Statute.

I have further to report that the withdrawal of this petition was not, in my opinion, the result of any arrangement between the Petitioner and Respondent, or any other party, and that there was no petition against the return of Sir Sydney Hedley Waterlow, as Member of Parliament for the County of Dumfries, other than that by Major Walker withdrawn as aforesaid.

GREENOCK ELECTION.

Unto the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

I, Edward Francis Maitland, Lord Barcaple, one of the Judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and one of the Judges, for the time being, for the Trial of Election Petitions in Scotland, pursuant to the "Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868," do hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that, at the conclusion of the trial of an election petition for the Borough of Greenock, at the instance of William Dougal Christie, Esq., of 32, Dorset-square, London, Petitioner, a candidate at the election for the said Borough of Greenock in November last, praying to have it determined that, at said election, James Johnstone Grieve was not duly elected or returned Member for Greenock, and that the election was void, which trial was holden before me, at Greenock, on the 9th day of February 1869, and four following days, I did find and determine that the said James Johnstone Grieve was duly elected and returned as Member to serve in Parliament for the Borough of Greenock. And I humbly report that it has not been proved that any corrupt practice has been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at said election; and that there is no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at said election.

Unto the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Petition of Edmund Beatty Lockyer, Esq., to have the election of George Loch, Esq., as Member of Parliament for the Wick or Northern Burghs, in November 1868, set aside as void.

The Report of Lord Jerviswoode, one of the Election Judges for Scotland.

The petition was lodged with the prescribed officer of this date, 19th December 1868.

The trial of the petition was fixed for Monday the 15th day of February 1869.

Thereafter an application having been made by the Petitioner for leave to withdraw the petition, the trial having in consequence thereof been postponed until 4th March next, the parties were heard upon this application before me this day, and after due notice no other person having appeared proposing that he should be substituted as Petitioner, the petition was held to be withdrawn, the Petitioner being found liable in costs to the Respondent in terms of the Statute.

I have further to report that the withdrawal of this petition was not, in my opinion, the result of any arrangement between the Petitioner and Respondent, or any other party, and that there was no other petition against the return of Mr. Loch as Member of Parliament for the Wick or Northern Burghs, other than that by Mr. Lockyer withdrawn as aforesaid.

In the Matter of the Petition of John Stamforth, Esq., of Jermyn-street, Middlesex, Petitioner; John James Ennis, Esq., Respondent.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The said Court of Common Pleas, in pursuance of the provisions of the 36th section of said Act, do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons,

That the petition in this matter, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, was duly presented to this Court on the 17th day of December 1868.

And

App. No. 1.

Athlone.

And that the Petitioner, on the 27th day of January inst., applied to the Court, by special application, pursuant to the said Statute, for leave to withdraw said petition.

And it appearing to the Court, that the notice of the said application required by said Act had been given in the said borough, and no person having applied to be substituted as Petitioner instead of the said John Stamforth.

The Court on said 27th day of January made an order permitting the said petition to be withdrawn, and same has been withdrawn accordingly.

And the Court do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that, in their opinion, the withdrawal of the said petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

Signed, on behalf of the Court, this 29th day of January 1869.

JAMES HENRY MONAHAN,
Chief Justice, Common Pleas.

BELFAST ELECTION.

Belfast.

IN the Matter of an Election Petition for the Borough of Belfast, between James M'Tier and Charles Murray Arundell, Petitioners; and Thomas M'Clure, Respondent,

I do hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker that a court for the trial of the above-named petition was holden before me, at Belfast, on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th days of January 1869, and that, at the conclusion of the said trial I did, on the said 30th day of January 1869, determine

That the said Thomas M'Clure was duly elected to serve as a Member of Parliament for the said borough at the election in the said petition mentioned.

And, in addition to the said certificate, I do hereby further report:—

That no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election; and

That I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at such election.

A copy of the petition and a copy of the evidence given at the trial, taken down by the deputy of the shorthand-writer of the House of Commons, accompany this my certificate

Given under my hand this 2nd day of February 1869.

F. A. FITZGERALD,
A Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland, pursuant to "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868"

CARLOW BOROUGH ELECTION.

Carlow.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Court of Common Pleas, Ireland.

IN the Matter of the Petition of Richard Boardman, of Carlow, Wheelwright and Carpenter, Petitioner; and William Fagan, Esq., Respondent.

The said Court of Common Pleas, in pursuance of the provisions of the 36th section of said Act, do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons:—

That the petition in this matter was duly presented to this court on the 16th day of December 1868, and that the Petitioner, on the 26th day of January instant, applied to the Court by special application, pursuant to the said statute, for leave to withdraw said petition.

And it appearing to the Court that the notice of the said application required by said Act had been given in the said borough, and no person having applied to be substituted as Petitioner instead of the said Richard Boardman,

The Court, on said 26th day of January, made an order permitting the said petition to be withdrawn, and same has been withdrawn accordingly.

And the Court do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that, in their opinion, the withdrawal of the said petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

Signed, on behalf of the Court, this 29th day of January 1869.

JAMES HENRY MONAHAN,
Chief Justice, Common Pleas.

Carrickfergus.

CARRICKFERGUS ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Matter of an Election Petition for the Borough of Carrickfergus, between Robert Torrens, Esq., Petitioner; and Marriott Robert Dalway, Esq., Respondent.

I hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons that the above-mentioned petition was tried before me, at Carrickfergus, on the 21st, 22nd, 23rd, 25th, and 26th days of January 1869; and that at the conclusion of the said trial I did, on the said 26th day of January, determine that the said Marriott Robert Dalway, whose election was complained of by said petition, was duly elected to serve in the present Parliament for the borough of Carrickfergus.

And, in addition to the foregoing certificate, I hereby further report to the Right Honourable the Speaker, that no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

And further, that on the evidence before me, it did not appear that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at said election; and I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices did extensively prevail at said election.

I beg also to state that a copy of said petition, and a copy of the evidence given at the trial, taken down by the deputy of the shorthand-writer of the House of Commons, accompany this certificate.

Given under my hand this 13th day of February 1869.

James O'Brien,
One of the Judges for the time being on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland, pursuant to said "Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868."

Cashel.

CASHEL ELECTION.

Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868.

To the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Matter of an Election Petition for the Borough of Cashel, between Henry Munster, Petitioner; and James Lyster O'Beirne, Respondent; and of another Election Petition for the said Borough of Cashel, between the same Petitioner and the same Respondent.

I do hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker that the election petitions above mentioned were tried together before me at Cashel, upon the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, and 20th days of February 1869; and that at the conclusion of the said trial I did, on the said 20th day of February, determine that the said James Lyster O'Beirne was not duly elected or returned to serve in Parliament as Member for said borough of Cashel at the election to which said petitions relate; and further, that the said Henry Munster was not duly elected, and ought not to have been returned to serve as aforesaid, inasmuch as the said Henry Munster was not proved to have had a majority of legal votes, and was moreover proved at the said trial to have been guilty, by his agents, of bribery at the said election; and further, that the said election was void.

And, in addition to the above certificate, I do report,—

1st. That the corrupt practice of bribery was proved to have been committed by, and with the knowledge and consent of, the said James Lyster O'Beirne at the said election; such bribery consisting in the payment to voters of alleged claims of money against the said James Lyster O'Beirne, arising out of a previous election for the said borough, in the year 1865, and also in the paying and agreeing to pay large sums of money to voters for the hire of apartments in the houses of such voters, colourably for the purpose of committee or tally-rooms, such payments and agreements respectively being made in order to induce such voters to vote for the said James Lyster O'Beirne at the said election. And further, that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by, or with the knowledge or consent of, the said Henry Munster at the said election.

2nd. That the several persons hereinafter named, and all of whom are mentioned and described in the evidence given at the said trial, were proved at the said trial to have been guilty of corrupt practices; that is to say, Simon Tracy, Patrick Laffan, and Patrick Cunningham, of bribery under the 2nd section of "The Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854."

And

And Michael Hanley, Michael Ryan, Thomas Murphy, Michael Coffey, and Edward Walshe, of bribery under the 3rd section of the same Act; but that all said several persons, except the said Simon Tracy and Patrick Laffan were examined before me as witnesses at the said trial, and were, in my opinion, respectively entitled to certificates, under the 33rd section of "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868."

3rd. That, from the evidence given at the said trial, I have reason to believe that the corrupt practice of bribery did extensively prevail at the election to which the said petitions relate.

Copies of the said petitions, and of the evidence given at the said trial, as taken down by the deputy of the shorthand writer of the House of Commons, accompany this my certificate and report.

Given under my hand, at Dublin, on the 22nd day of February 1869.

A Baron of the Exchequer in Ireland, and one of the Judges for the time being for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland, pursuant to "The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868."

DROGHEDA ELECTION.

Court for the Trial of an Election Petition for the Borough of Drogheda, between Sir F. Leopold M'Clintock, Petitioner; and Benjamin Whitworth, Respondent.

The petition between the aforesaid parties came on for trial before me at Drogheda on the 15th, 16th, 18th, and 19th days of January 1869, and thereupon I determined as follows:—

1st. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., is not duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the borough and county of the town of Drogheda.

2nd. That said election for said borough and county of the town of Drogheda is a void election.

3rd. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., was, by himself and by his agents, guilty of undue influence at the said election for said borough and county of the town of Drogheda.

4th. That a system of intimidation was organised and carried out at the last election for the said borough and county of the town of Drogheda subversive of the freedom of election; and outrages were committed which were calculated to deter, and did in fact deter, a considerable number of voters from exercising their franchise at the last election.

5th. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., shall pay the costs of this petition.

And I do accordingly hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons,—

1st. That the said Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., is not duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the borough and county of the town of Drogheda.

2nd. That said election for said borough and county of the town of Drogheda is a void election.

3rd. That Benjamin Whitworth, Esq., was, by himself and by his agents, guilty of undue influence at the said election for said borough and county of the town of Drogheda.

4th. That a system of intimidation was organised and carried out at the last election for the said borough and county of the town of Drogheda subversive of the freedom of election; and outrages were committed which were calculated to deter, and did in fact deter, a considerable number of voters from exercising their franchise at the last election for said borough of the county of the town of Drogheda.

Dated this 25th day of January, 1869.

William Keogh,
One of the Judges on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

This certificate is accompanied by a copy of the evidence given at the trial, as taken by the shorthand writer of the House of Commons, sworn by me pursuant to the statute.

App. No. 1.

Dublin.

DUBLIN CITY ELECTION.

In the Matter of the Petition of George Foley and Thomas Woodlock, Petitioners; Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, Baronet, Respondent.

THE matter of this petition came on to be tried before me, at Dublin, on the 23rd day of January last, and continued on 10 succeeding days, in presence of the parties, their counsel, and agents; and having heard the evidence, and what was offered on both sides, at the conclusion of the trial, on the 5th day of February 1869, I determined, and I do accordingly certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that the last election for the said county of the city of Dublin was, so far as related to the return of the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, a void election, and—

That the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, was not duly elected to serve in Parliament for the said county of the city of Dublin.

That the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, was, by his agents, guilty of bribery at said election; and I do hereby report that it has not been proved before me that such bribery was committed by, or with the knowledge or consent of, the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet; and I do further report—

That the following freemen electors (that is to say), John Frederick Kirk, Richard Butler, junior, William Walker, George Hagarty, William Beckett, Henry Bailey, John Wilson, Robert Wilson, Benjamin Katherens, otherwise Catherens, Michael Richard Steele, and Joseph Hassett, were bribed on the day of polling to vote, or in consideration of having voted, for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet.

That in addition to the persons whose names I have so reported, it was proved that from 20 to 30 other freemen, whose names were not disclosed, received bribes at the same house in which those named were bribed, and on the day of polling, in consideration of voting, or of having voted for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet.

That Henry Foster, William Campbell, and William Watkins, were proved to have bribed the said freemen.

That two other freemen, namely, Richard Jesson (now deceased), and George Booth, were bribed to vote for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, by Benjamin Warren.

That George M'Donnell and William Field, both freemen, were bribed to vote for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, by William Robinson.

That other freemen, from 10 to 14 in number, who were not sufficiently identified by name, were bribed to vote for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, by the said William Robinson.

That Henry Cramer, a rated occupier, was bribed to vote for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, by the said William Robinson.

That Alexander Ferguson, a rated occupier, and John Kelly, a lodger, were bribed by William John Vance to vote for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet.

That Davenport Crosthwaite and William Johnston, were guilty of bribing 41 out-voters by promises to pay to them their travelling expenses on condition of their voting for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet.

That it was proved that freeman voters, to the number of 30, did apply previous to the said election to the agents of Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, to obtain bribes in consideration of their voting for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet.

That several of the parties so applying, and other freemen voters, numbering over 200, were induced to sign agreements pledging themselves to give their services gratuitously to the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness at the said election; but such agreements were colourable, and framed with the object of evading the provisions of the statutes against the giving employment to voters at or previous to elections.

That it was further proved that a considerable number of the said freemen voters were, on the day of polling, seeking payment of money from William Campbell, an agent of Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet, in consideration of their having voted for the said Sir Arthur Edward Guinness, baronet; and I do report that I have reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed amongst the freemen voters at the said election for the county of the city of Dublin.

And I do further report that, save as I have reported respecting the said freemen, corrupt practices have not been shown to have extensively prevailed, nor is their reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the said petition relates.

Given under my hand this 15th day of February 1869.

WILLIAM KEOGH,
Judge of the Court of Common Pleas on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

A copy of the evidence taken at the trial, as furnished to me by the House of Commons' shorthand writer, who was duly sworn before me faithfully to take down the same, pursuant to the statute, accompanies this my certificate.

DUBLIN CITY ELECTION (No. 2).

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Matter of the Petition of the Honourable David Robert Plunket, Petitioner; and Jonathan Pim, Esq., M.P., Respondent.

Sir,

I HAVE the honour to report to you that this petition was withdrawn with my leave upon special application, and in pursuance of the statute in that behalf made and provided; and, in my opinion, the withdrawal of such petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
WILLIAM KEOGH,
Judge of the Court of Common Pleas on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

Enniskillen.

ENNISKILLEN ELECTION.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, IRELAND.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Matter of the Petition of George Kittson, of Enniskillen, and of Thomas Johnston, of Enniskillen, Petitioners; and John Henry Viscount Crichton, Respondent.

THE said Court of Common Pleas, in pursuance of the provisions of the 36th section of said Act, do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons:—

That the petition in this matter was duly presented to this Court on the 17th day of December, 1868; and that the Petitioners, on the 29th day of January instant, applied to the Court by special application, pursuant to the said statute, for leave to withdraw said petition.

And it appearing to the Court that the notice of the said application required by said Act had been given in the said borough, and no person having applied to be substituted as petitioner, instead of the said George Kittson and Thomas Johnston.

The Court, on the said 29th day of January, made an Order permitting the said Petition to be withdrawn, and the same has been withdrawn accordingly.

And the Court do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that in their opinion the withdrawal of the said petition was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, or in consideration of the withdrawal of any other petition.

Signed on behalf of the Court, this 3rd day of February 1869.

JAMES HENRY MONAHAN,
Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

Galway Town.

GALWAY TOWN ELECTION.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

THE COUNTY OF THE TOWN OF GALWAY ELECTION PETITION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

In the Matter of the Petition of Thomas M'Govern, Petitioner; Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, M.P., and Lord Viscount St. Lawrence, M.P., Respondents.

THE matter of this petition (of which I annex a copy) came on to be tried before me, at Galway, on the 25th day of February last, and continued for five succeeding days in the presence of the parties, their counsel, and agents, and having heard the evidence and what was offered on both sides, I did then determine and do accordingly certify—

That the said Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., and Lord Viscount St. Lawrence, were duly returned at the last election as burgesses to serve in Parliament, as and for the said county of the Town of Galway.

App. No. 1.
Galway Town.

That it was proved before me, that the following freemen, electors of the said borough, proposed to give their votes at said election for Martin O'Flaherty, Esq., one of the candidates, in consideration of receiving a promise of payment of money after the said election: namely, Anthony Finegan, John Marmion, Patrick Doherty, Lawrence Drually, Timothy Toole, Thomas Murphy, John M'Tighe, John Bolger, John Leniham, John Drually, John Walsh, John Dillon, John M'Loughlin, and Martin C. Lynch.

That said proposal was rejected by the said candidate and his agent.

That from 80 to 100 electors of the said borough known to be freemen, but whose names were not disclosed in evidence, had from time to time and shortly previous to the said election, solicited the agent of the said Lord Viscount St. Lawrence, to promise them payment of money in consideration of their giving their votes to the said Lord Viscount St. Lawrence; but such proposals were proved to have been in every instance rejected by the said agent.

And I do further report, that I have not any reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last election for the said county of the Town of Galway.

Given under my hand, this 11th day of March, 1869.

WILLIAM KEOGH,
Judge of the Court of Common Pleas on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

The copy of the evidence taken at the trial, as furnished to me by the House of Commons shorthand-writer, who was duly sworn before me faithfully to take down the same pursuant to the Statute, accompanies this my certificate.

Limerick City.

LIMERICK CITY ELECTION.

IN the Matter of an Election Petition for the Borough of Limerick, between Daniel Ryan, Thomas M'Knight, Matthew Brennan, Robert Stacpool, Thomas M'Namara, and Denis Grimes, Petitioners; and George Gavin and Francis William Russell, Respondents.

I do hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker, that a Court for the trial of the above petition was holden before me at Limerick on the 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, 23rd, and 25th days of January 1869, and that at the conclusion of the trial on the said 25th day of January, I determined that the said George Gavin and Francis William Russell were both duly elected as Members to serve in Parliament for the county of the City of Limerick, being the borough aforesaid.

And I do hereby further report, that no corrupt practice was proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election, and that I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the said election.

A copy of the said petition, and a copy of the evidence given at the trial, as taken by the deputy of the shorthand-writer of the House of Commons, pursuant to the said Act, accompany this my certificate.

Given under my hand, at Dublin, on this 26th day of January 1869.

LONDONDERRY CITY ELECTION.

To the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

IN the matter of an Election Petition, for the City or Borough of Londonderry, between David John McGowan, Merchant, and George David Christie, Commission Agent, Petitioners; and Richard Dowse, Esq., Q.C., Respondent.

I hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons that the above-mentioned Petition was tried before me, at Londonderry, on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th days of January, and on the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th, 8th, and 9th days of February 1869; and that at the conclusion of the said trial I did, on the said 9th day of February, determine that the said Richard Dowse, whose election was complained of by said Petition, was duly elected to serve in the present Parliament for the borough or city of Londonderry.

And, in addition to the foregoing certificate, I hereby further report to the Right Honourable the Speaker, that no corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed by or with the knowledge or consent of any candidate at such election.

And,

Londonderry City.

And, further, that on the evidence before me, it did not appear that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at said election, and I have no reason to believe that corrupt practices did extensively prevail at said election.

I beg also to state that a copy of said petition, and a copy of the evidence given at the trial, taken down by the deputies of the shorthand-writer of the House of Commons, accompany this certificate.

SLIGO BOROUGH ELECTION.

Sligo Borough.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACT, 1868.

To the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.

IN the Matter of the Petition of Michael Foley and Joseph Foley, Petitioners; Major Lawrence Edward Knox, M.P., Respondent.

The matter of this petition (of which I annex a copy) came on to be tried before me at Carrick-on-Shannon, on the 19th day of February last, and continued four succeeding days, in presence of the parties, their counsel, and agents; and, having heard the evidence and what was offered on both sides, I did then determine, and do accordingly certify—

That the last election for the said Borough of Sligo was a void election.

That the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox was not duly elected to serve in Parliament for the said Borough of Sligo.

That the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox was, by his agents, guilty of bribery at said election; and I hereby report—

That it has not been proved before me that such bribery was committed by or with the knowledge or consent of the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox; and I do further report—

That John Shiel, a voter, did, immediately before said election, receive money and goods to the amount of 8 l. 6 s. 2 d. from Stephen M. Cherry, acting on behalf of the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox, and did agree to receive a further sum of 31 l. 13 s. 10 d. from the said Stephen M. Cherry, for agreeing to refrain from voting at said election, and was guilty of bribery.

That Patrick Neilan, Patrick Flynn, Martin Mulligan, and Charles Tiernan received money for agreeing to vote for the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox at said election, and were guilty of bribery.

That, in addition to the persons whose names I have so reported, it was proved by the evidence of the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox and other testimony, that divers of the electors of said borough, from 30 to 40 in number, were in the habit of applying for payment of money directly to the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox, and to other persons acting on his behalf, in consideration of their agreeing to vote for, or to refrain from voting against, the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox.

That Thomas Brennan, Stephen M. Cherry, John H. Galbraith, Robert Stokes, William A. Woods, and Joseph L. Woods were proved to have offered and promised various sums of money to divers electors of said borough, in order to induce said electors to vote for the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox, or to refrain from voting for Captain John Flanagan, a candidate at said election, and were guilty of bribery.

And I do report that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the said election for the Borough of Sligo; and

That a system of intimidation and violence was organised and carried out for months previous to and during the said last election for the said Borough of Sligo, subversive of freedom of election, and endangering the lives and properties of the electors; and outrages were committed previous to and during the said election which were calculated to deter, and did in fact deter, electors from exercising their franchise at said election; but such intimidation and violence was almost entirely practised by large mobs of persons acting in opposition to the said Major Lawrence Edward Knox; and it was proved before me that such intimidation was continued in said Borough of Sligo from the time of said election down to and during the trial of said Election Petition.

Given under my hand this 2nd of March 1869.

Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, on the Rota for the Trial of Election Petitions in Ireland.

Sligo County.

SLIGO COUNTY ELECTION.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, IRELAND.

To the Right Honourable The Speaker of the House of Commons.

John Hannon, of Monastarden, in the County of Sligo, and James Casey, of Falleens, in said county, Farmers, Petitioners; Sir Robert Gore Booth, Baronet, Respondent.

Henry Griffith of Killery, in the County of Sligo, D.L., J.P., Petitioner; Denis Maurice O'Connor, Esq., Respondent.

The said Court of Common Pleas, in pursuance of the 36th section of said Act, do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that the petitions in these matters were duly presented to this Court on the 29th December 1868.

And that the petitioners in each of the said matters, on the 1st day of February instant, applied to this Court by special application, pursuant to the said Statute, for leave to withdraw their respective petitions.

And it appearing to the Court that the notices of said applications required by said Act had been given in the said county, and no person having applied to be substituted as petitioner in either of said matters instead of the said John Hannon and James Casey, or of the said Henry Griffith;

The Court on the said 1st day of February made orders permitting said petitions to be withdrawn, and same have been withdrawn accordingly.

And the Court do hereby report to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, that in their opinion the withdrawal of said petitions was not the result of any corrupt arrangement, but that the parties not having evidence to sustain either petitions, mutually resolved to withdraw the same.

Signed on behalf of the Court, this 4th day of February 1869.

JAMES HENRY MONAHAN,
Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, Ireland.

Wexford Borough.

WEXFORD BOROUGH ELECTION.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, IRELAND.

IN the Matter of the Petition of John Sutton, Thomas Edward Cavanagh, John Wheelock, James Jones, Patrick Brian, Michael Hughes, Petitioners; Richard Joseph Devereux, Respondent.

The petition in this matter was duly presented to this Court; and it appearing to the Court that the case raised by the said petition could be conveniently stated as a special case, such case was so stated, a copy of which is annexed hereto, and the same was duly heard on this day before the Court; and thereupon the Court determined as follows:—

1. That the said Richard Joseph Devereux was not duly elected.
2. That Standish Motte was not duly elected.
3. That the said election was void.

And the Court doth accordingly hereby certify to the Right Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons—

1. That the said Richard Joseph Devereux was not duly elected.
2. That the said Standish Motte was not duly elected.
3. That the said election for the Borough of Wexford was a void election.

Dated this 12th day of January, 1869.

Signed on behalf of the Court,
JAMES HENRY MONAHAN,
Chief Justice Common Pleas.

Appendix, No. 2.

PAPER put in by the Town Clerk of Preston, 3 May 1869.

App. No. 2.

At a Meeting of the Council of the Borough of Preston, held on the 29th day of April 1869, the following subjects were agreed to :—

1. That the municipal franchise and the Parliamentary franchise be similar, and the register of voters for Parliamentary elections be the register of voters at municipal elections. That where the boundary of the Parliamentary and municipal borough is not the same, provision should be made to meet such case. That the voting be vivâ voce in both cases, dispensing with voting papers at municipal elections, and that the hours for opening and closing the poll at both elections be the same, except, as after mentioned in clause (b), paragraph 2.

Municipal Elections.

2. "That the Municipal Corporation Act, 1859," be amended, so as to provide that persons nominated as councillors may decline to serve, and thereby prevent a contest. Persons are frequently nominated without their consent.

(a). The town clerk to publish the name of one nominator for each candidate, whose nomination is first received with the number of other nominators. No nominations to be received after six o'clock p.m.

(b). Upon any candidate retiring, and signifying same in writing to returning officer, the poll to be immediately closed, so far as respects such candidate.

3. That provision be made for the apprehension of persons personating, similar to the provisions in the Registration of Voters Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 86.

4. Each candidate to appoint one or more persons at each booth for the purpose of preventing personation. See Registration of Voters Act, 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 86.

5. Punishment, 22 Vict. c. 35, s. 9. This section to be amended, as there is no sect. 18 in the Act; section 18, as in the Bill, contained questions to be put to the voters. This section should be restored.

6. That power be given to the returning officer to ask questions of voters, so as to ascertain if person offering to vote is the right person, and to refuse the vote if not satisfied.

7. That the returning officer at both Parliamentary and municipal elections shall, upon the right person coming to vote, receive his vote, and strike off the vote of any person who may have personated him.

That where objection is raised as to the voter being the right person, the returning officer shall have power to require him to produce the last paid rate-paper, which entitles him to be on the list of voters, or other evidence to satisfy the returning officer that he is the right person.

8. That sections 1, 2, 3, and 4, of the 22nd Vict. c. 35, be amended, and the council of every borough have power to divide the borough into such and so many wards as they may think proper, and of apportioning the number of councillors of the borough amongst the wards.

Provided that it shall not be necessary that any councillor go out of office before the time for which he has been elected has expired.

See provision in the "Representation of the People Act, 1867," s. 34, as to council dividing boroughs into polling districts.

App. No. 2.

9. That no agent or person who for remuneration shall, for or on behalf of any candidate, in furtherance of his election, during or within six months before the election, perform any work or service, or provide any accommodation, shall be allowed to vote for the candidate for whom he so acts as agent, performs work, or provides accommodation.

10. That provision be made for effectual local inquiry into illegal practices at municipal elections, and for remedial purposes.

Parliamentary Elections.

11. That public nominations and public declarations of poll be abolished, and other provisions made in lieu thereof.

LETTER addressed to the Chairman by Mr. Alexander Russel, laid before the Committee, 15 June 1869.

My Lord Marquis, Edinburgh, 14 June 1869.

App. No. 3.

Addressing you in your capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, I solicit your attention to the annexed passages in a letter by the Marquis of Lothian, appearing in the "Scotsman" of this date, and a full copy of which is forwarded by same post to your Lordship and other Members of the Committee:—

"Sir,— I have read in the 'Scotsman' the evidence taken before the Parliamentary Committee in reference to your statements about the Roxburghshire election. This evidence (Mr. Otto's), though not in itself untrue, might possibly convey an inaccurate impression as to the facts; and though that impression is in my favour, it would not be candid in me to let it pass without making it a little clearer.

"It is perfectly true that I had many reasons for not letting the farm of Timpandean to Mr. Scott; but I should consider myself acting unfairly if I did not say out at once that among them was the vote he gave at the election, nor do I see why I should not make this admission."

I submit that this statement on the main or only essential point within the scope of the Committee's inquiry, confutes the evidence of Mr. Otto, and corroborates that of Mr. Scott and myself.

I have, &c.

Right Hon. the Marquis of Hartington, M.P. (signed) Alex. Russel.

Copy of the Letter from the Marquis of Lothian addressed to the Editor of the "Scotsman," referred to in the above Letter.

"Sir,

"I have read in the 'Scotsman' the evidence taken before the Parliamentary Committee in reference to your statements about the Roxburghshire election. This evidence, though not in itself untrue, might possibly convey an inaccurate impression as to the facts; and though that impression is in my favour, it would not be candid in me to let it pass without making it a little clearer.

"It is perfectly true that I had many reasons for not letting the farm of Timpandean to Mr. Scott; but I should consider myself acting unfairly if I did not say out at once that among them was the vote he gave at the election, nor do I see why I should not make this admission.

"I recollect a statement in a former article in your newspaper, 'that I did not allow my tenants to keep a conscience.' I do not think that expression was a wise or a happy one; but, letting that pass, I do not understand your making use of words so misleading, unless you were totally unaware of the nature of a 19 years' lease. Without entering into a discussion as to what a 19 years' lease means, it is a compact which there is not the smallest obligation, legal or moral, to renew after its conclusion. Either party may refuse to enter upon a new lease for any or no reason. I might illustrate this at some length, but it is, I hope, unnecessary for me to do so. What I was anxious Mr. Otto should say, and what he did say very effectually, was—first, that you had been mistaken in thinking that I had broken faith with Mr. Scott; and, secondly, that I had treated him with discourtesy. But there are one or two other points in your evidence to which I cannot help adverting. If my memory does not fail me, you talked of intimidation in Roxburghshire being entirely on the Conservative side. From what I have heard, my opinion on the matter is just the reverse of yours. The only case of landlord oppression (you do not call it intimidation) which you bring forward is that of Timpandean, and I need say nothing further about that, as your case has entirely broken down. But there has been intimidation of another sort, and that of a kind which did not come from the Conservatives. A tenant-farmer, with a 19 years' lease in his pocket, is not likely to be deterred from going to the poll for fear of his landlord, but any elector is likely to be deterred by knowing that he would have to run the gauntlet of a mob, and being pelted, and hustled, if no worse; and few members of a dissenting congregation like to be addressed in the spicy language which ministers of a certain sort bring to bear on those who vote the wrong way. Now mob violence and clerical denunciations have been very freely used in Roxburghshire, and these, as I think you admitted, are weapons which can only be used by the Liberals. Any pressure that the landlord can exercise is a mere straw in comparison, and yet even that pressure, such as it is, has been used, from what I can hear, on the Liberal side. I have even been told that your client, Mr. Scott, has been put in possession of a farm the late tenant of which was a Conservative, and voted according to his opinions; and his lease coming to an end at that time, Mr. Scott was provided for at his expense. I should not mention this if I thought it would cast a slur upon his new landlord, whom I feel myself honoured in considering as my friend. But this is not the only case I have heard of on the Liberal side: as Timpandean is the only case you bring forward against the Conservatives, it looks as if the balance lay rather against the former party than against the latter. Of course, I can only quote from hearsay evidence, and, like yourself, have only heard the accounts of one side, and therefore I am prepared to believe that I am as much mistaken as you seem to have been. However, you must recollect two things—first, that I have not the capability of deriving information from as many sources as you have; and, secondly, that I have not been called upon to give evidence before a Parliamentary Committee.

"I must allude to one more point in your evidence. It is not only my impression, as it was in the case I have just been mentioning, but a simple fact, for I took especial note of it, that you asserted that what you call female influence has been brought to bear on the Conservative side only. This assertion was to me astounding, and more especially was it so when you selected Kelso as the place where it has been most extensively exercised. I cannot go into this subject at all, because I do not wish to follow your example, when you went as near as you could to mention a lady by name without actually doing so. I can only meet you by a flat contradiction, and by saying that I cannot conceive from whence you get your information. This letter has been detained longer than it should have been, and is consequently perhaps a little late.

"I am, &c.
(signed) "Lothian.

"P.S.—I have not seen any report of Mr. Scott's examination yesterday; but I am informed that he adheres to his statement in contradiction to that of Mr. Otto, that the latter informed him that the lease was not to be renewed on account of his vote. All I can say is, that my instructions to Mr. Otto were to say nothing whatsoever as to my reasons for my decision. The question is not one of much importance, really, after what I have said to you; but it sheds a considerable light on the comparative correctness of Mr. Scott's and Mr. Otto's memory."

4e Circonscription Electorale.

10e SECTION.

L'an mil huit cent soixante-neuf, le 23 mai.

En exécution de l'Arrêté de M. le Préfet de la Seine, en date du 28 avril 1869, portant publication du décret impérial par lequel les Électeurs de la 4e Circonscription électorale sont convoqués à l'effet d'élire un Député au Corps Législatif, conformément au décret organique du 2 février 1852;

Nous Nestor Alexandre Treitt désigné conformément à l'art. 13, § 2 du décret réglementaire du 2 février 1852, par M. le Maire du 10e arrondissement, pour présider la 10e Section de ladite Circonscription, nous sommes rendu rue des Petites Ecuries, No. 9, dans de local désigné suivant l'Avis du Maire de l'Arrondissement;

Là, après avoir pris place au bureau comme Président et y avoir déposé:

1° Un Recueil contenant les dispositions de la Constitution, le Sénatus-Consulte du 27 mai 1857, les décrets organique et réglementaire du 2 février 1852, relatifs à l'élection des Députés au Corps Legislatif; le décret du décembre 1867, qui fixe le nombre des Députés à élire dans chaque département, et le Sénatus-Consulte du 17 février 1858, qui exige le serment des candidats à la députation;

2° Le Tableaux des Circonscriptions électorales du département de la Seine;

3° L'Instruction du Ministre de l'Intérieur relative à la tenue des assemblées électorales;

4° Le Tableau, certifié par le Préfet, des Candidats ayant prêté le serment exigé par le Sénatus-Consulte du 17 février 1858;

5° La Liste officielle des Électeurs, close le 31 mars dernier, et le Tableau des rectifications;

6° La Feuille d'appel et d'inscription des votants;

7° L'Avis du Maire contenant désignation des locaux où les Électeurs doivent voter;

Nous avons désigné, suivant l'art. 14, § 2 du décret réglementaire du 2 février 1852, parmi les plus âgés des Électeurs, pour nous assister pendant les opérations électorales, M. Labarre, Alex. Baur, né le 2 juillet 1803, demeurant Boulvart bonne nouvelle, No. 14.

M. Bernier, Charle Fred, né le 20 mars 1813, demeurant Boulvart Denain, 10.

Et parmi les plus jeunes:

M. Labarraque, Edouard, né le 4 mai 1846, demeurant Boulvart de Strasbourg, 35.

M. Collet,

M. Collet, François Emile, né le 20 décembre 1848, demeurant Cour des Petites Ecuries, No. 19, qui ont pris place au bureau, en qualité d'assesseurs.

Le bureau, ainsi constitué, a nommé secrétaire M. R. Verron Raphaël, demeurant rue d'Enghien, No. 16, qui a pris place et ouvert le présent procès-verbal.

Nous avons rappelé que les Électeurs étaient convoqués pour nommer un Député au Corps Législatif.

Nous avons aussi rappelé les conditions d'éligibilité, les incapacités et incompatibilités qui excluent des fonctions de Député, et les dispositions pénales relatives aux opérations électorales.

Nous avons fait placer sur la table, autour de laquelle siégent les membres du bureau, la boîte du scrutin. Après avoir ouvert cette boîte pour constater qu'elle ne renfermait aucun bulletin, nous l'avons fermée à deux serrures; une des clefs est restée entre nos mains et l'autre a été remise au plus âgé des assesseur, M. Labarre.

Nous avons ensuite proclamé l'ouverture du scrutin.

A l'appel de son nom, chaque Électeur nous a présenté sa carte, dont un des assesseurs a déchiré un coin; cet Électeur nous a remis un bulletin fermé, que nous avons déposé dans la boîte du scrutin, après nous être assuré qu'il n'en renfermait pas d'autre; nous avons fait constater le vote par un des assesseurs, lequel a pris soin d'apposer sa signature ou son paraphe en regard du nom du votant, sur la feuille d'appel et d'inscription disposée à cet effet.

La carte a été ensuite rendue à l'Électeur.

A six heures du soir, la boîte du scrutin a été fermée, scellée par nous et déposée sous clef dans une des salles de la Mairie.

Les scellés ont été également apposés à touts les issues de cette salle.

Un poste a été, pendant la nuit, préposé spécialement à la garde du scrutin.

Et le lendemain 24 mai, à huit heures du matin, après avoir constaté que les scellés apposés sur les ouvertures de la salle renfermant le boîte du scrutin étaient intacts, nous avons procédé à leur levée et avons pris place au bureau avec les quatre assesseurs et le secrétaire dénommés d'autre part.

La boîte du scrutin, dont les scellés ont été reconnus intacts, a été placée de nouveau sur la table du bureau; nous avons levé les scellés, et déclaré que les opérations allaient être continuées; nous avons fait l'appel de tous les Électeurs qui n'avaient pas voté la veille.

A quatre heures du soir, une heure après le réappel, nous avons déclaré la clôture définitive du scrutin.

La boîte du scrutin a été ouverte; les bulletins qu'elle contenait ont été comptés par le bureau, qui a reconnu que le nombre de ces bulletins était de* deux mille deux cent quartre.

Le nombre des votants, constaté par les signatures ou paraphes apposés par les assesseurs sur la feuille d'inscription et d'appel des votants, a été reconnu être de* deux mille deux cent quatre.

Le nombre des Électeurs inscrits sur cette feille et appelés à concourir au scrutin, de 2,820.

Les bulletins extraits de la boîte ont été devisés en groupes pour être dépouillés, sur quatre tables séparées, autour desquelles les Électeurs ont pu librement circuler.

La bureau a désigné, parmi les Électeurs présents sachant lire et écrire, des scrutateurs supplémentaires à raison de quatre au moins par chaque table, savoir:

Scrutateurs.

MM. Berthelot, Paulet, Gaulon, Baudin.

MM. Dommartin, Riboulet, Bordas, Armengaud.

MM. Lehmann, Garcin, Drivat, Goddet.

MM. Picart, Castellon, Lepinoy, Legrand.

Bureau n° 2, M. Bomier - - - - id.

Bureau n° 3, M. Collet - - - - - id.

Bureau n° 4, M. Labarre - - - - id.

Nous avons rappelé à ces citoyens que le décret organique du 2 février 1852, art. 35, punit d'un emprisonnement de un à cinq cinq ans et d'une amende de 500 fr. à 5,000 fr., tout scrutateur qui aura soustrait, ajouté ou altéré des bulletins, ou lu des noms autres que ceux inscrits.

* Ecrire en toutes lettres.

L'un des scrutateurs a lu successivement les bulletins à haute voix et les a passés à un autre scrutateur.

Les deux autres scrutateurs ont simultanément inscrit le nom du candidat et pointé les suffrages sur les feuilles de dépouillement.

Cé dépouillement terminé, les scrutateurs ont écrit en toutes lettres, dans chaque compartiment de cette feuille, le nombre de suffrages obtenus par chaque candidat, et ont apposé leurs signatures à la suite.

Les bulletins contenant plus d'un nom ont été admis comme valables ; mais le premier nom seul a été compté.

Ne sont pas entrés en compte dans le résultat du dépouillement, mais ont été annexés au présent procès-verbal, et classés suivant leur nature dans des dossiers distincts :

1° Les bullettins blancs, au nombre de - - - 10

2° Les bulletins illisibles ou sur lesquels il a été impossible de reconnaître un nom, au nombre de - néant

3° Les bulletins ne contenant pas une désignation suffisante, au nombre de - - - - - - 6

4° Les bulletins sur lesquels les votants se sont fait connaître, au nombre de - - - - - - néant

5° Les bulletins contenant le nom d'unne personne n'ayant pas prêté le serment exigé de tout candidat à la députation, au nombre de - - - - - néant

En tout - - - 16

Le recensement général des feuilles de dépouillement des quatre bureaux supplementaires a donné les résultats constatés dans l'État qui fait suite au présent procès-verbal, et où sont inscrits, par ordre de suffrages, les noms de tous les candidats qui les ont obtenus.

Nous avons ensuite rendu public ce résultat, et les bulletins ont été brûlés en présence des Electeurs, à l'exception de* seize bulletins ci-dessus détaillés, que nous avons paraphés et classés, comme il est dit plus haut, dans des dossiers distincts portant chacun l'indication des motifs qui n'ont pas permis de faire entrer ces bulletins en compte.

Nous avons rédigé le procès-verbal de toutes ces opérations en triple minute.

L'une de ces minutes a été transmise immédiatement à M. le Préfet de la Seine;

La seconde a été déposée au Secrétariat de la Mairie;

La troisième a été conservée par nous, et nous nous sommes chargé, conformément à l'article 33 du décret réglementaire du 2 février 1852, de la porter, avec les bulletins non comptés et toutes les pièces à l'appui, à la 1re Section, où doit être effectué le recensement général des votes de la Circonscription.

Les opérations de l'assemblée électorale étant ainsi terminées, le Secrétaire a donné lecture dudit procès-verbal, que nous et les membres du bureau ont signé en triple minute, et nous avons déclaré la séance levée.

Fait et clos à Paris, le 24 mai 1869.

Art. 81. Ogni elettore, dopo d' aver risposto alla chiamata, riceve dal Presidente un bollettino spiegato, sopra il quale scrive il suo voto: piegato poscia il bollettino, lo consegna a mani del Presidente, che lo pone nell' urna a tale uso destinata.

Se l'elettore, per l' eccezione di cui al n. 3 dell' art. 1 della presente Legge, o per fisica indisposizione notoria o regolarmente dimostrata all'Ufficio, trovasi nell' impossibilità di scrivere il bollettino, sarà ammesso a farlo scrivere da un altro elettore di sua confidenza: il Segretario ne farà risultare nel verbale.

La tavola a cui siede l' elettore scrivendo il voto, è separata da quella dell'Ufficio: quest' ultima, cui siedono il Presidente, gli Scrutatori ed il Segretario, è disposta in modo che gli elettori possono girarvi attorno durante lo squittinio dei suffragi.

ACCOUNTS (ELECTION EXPENSES:)

Grounds for the conclusion that all accounts, or returns of election expenses, are perfectly illusory, Darvill 530. 773–776. 806——Statement favourable to voiding the seat of the candidate returned at any Parliamentary election, if the agent for election expenses, or the candidate himself, makes a fictitious return of the expenses; present regulations on this point considered, West 3009–3023. 3032–3035——Approval of the candidate being unseated in the event of his making payments not included in the return, Forwood, 3471–3473.

Suggestion whether the seat should not be voided for a wilful keeping back of accounts, Sir S. Martin 10665, 10666——Proposed voidance of the seat if the candidate or his agent wilfully kept back any expenses which had been incurred, Sir C. Blackburn 11970–11973. 11975. 11993. 12031. 12064–12069. 12073–12075——Belief that at no place where witness presided was it the habit of members to postpone payment of expenses till a following election, ib. 12030.

Addyman, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is an alderman of Leeds; has been several years in the town council, 1378, 1379——There are twelve wards in the borough of Leeds, there being sixty-four councillors, including sixteen aldermen, 1380–1382——Total of about 40,000 municipal and Parliamentary voters, 1381——Election of one-third of the council every year, one-half the aldermen being elected every three years, 1383.

Statement relative to the prevalence of bribery and treating, and, to some extent, of intimidation at the Leeds municipal elections, 1384 et seq.——Proceedings taken against a member of the council in 1865 for bribery, when he was convicted in a penalty of 40 s., but was not thereby disqualified from sitting in the council, 1391–1394. 1404——Inquiry made in 1866, when much evidence was procured as to the prevalence of bribery and treating; threat of legal proceedings, which prevented this evidence being published or being laid before Parliament, 1395–1402——Very heavy expense incurred (about 200 l.) in obtaining the conviction against a member of the council, so that the case was not further followed up through fear of the expense, 1403–1406. 1411–1417. 1450–1465. 1477–1479.

Belief as to the impracticability of an effectual application of the present law for the prevention of bribery and treating, 1407, 1408——Conclusion favourable to the ballot as the most effectual, if not the only, mode of prevention of corrupt practices at both municipal and Parliamentary elections, 1409–1412. 1471, 1472. 1499, 1500. 1527——Expediency of simplifying the proceedings in cases of bribery, and of making the offence punishable by imprisonment instead of by fine, 1410–1417. 1493–1498.

Disorderly conduct at the Leeds elections, in consequence of the treating, so that the closing of the public-houses on the day of the election would be a great improvement, 1418–1421. 1517–1522——Approval, generally, of the system of voting papers at municipal elections, though some instances of tampering arise, 1422, 1423. 1442, 1443. 1500——Frequent instances of vexatious nominations for the town council at Leeds; advantage if the candidate's consent were necessary, 1424–1428. 1466–1468.

Strong feeling at Leeds in favour of an effectual check upon corrupt practices; in some of the wards this feeling does not prevail, 1431-1438. 1450-1456——Instances of prosecutions for personation at the Leeds elections, 1439-1441——Impression as to irregularities having occurred at elections of poor law guardians, 1444-1449——Belief that the bribery at the last municipal election had no reference to the Parliamentary election, 1469, 1470. 1491, 1492—— Advantage of a fine being imposed on persons making fictitious nominations, 1475, 1476 —— Extent to which politics enter into the municipal contests at Leeds, 1480-1490——Freedom from bribery at the Parliamentary elections, 1491—— Approval of a power of proceeding before two justices in the case of any town councillor charged with bribery, 1493-1498. 1523-1526. 1528-1530.

Growing opinion, not only of Liberals but of Conservatives, at Leeds, in favour of the ballot, 1502-1504—— Prevalence of feeling in favour of the ballot at municipal as well as Parliamentary elections, 1505-1507——Orderly character, generally, of the Parliamentary nominations at Leeds, 1508-1516——Great variation in the amount paid in bribes at the municipal elections, 1531-1534——Statement favourable to an abolition of the present mode of Parliamentary nomination, 1535-1545——Approval also of abolishing the declaration of the poll, 1536.

Agents. Suggestion that no person be considered an agent, or be allowed to act as a canvasser, unless he is formally recognised in writing by the candidate as an agent, Darvill 527, 528. 592-598——Proposed penalty in the case of persons acting as agents, or as canvassers without authority, ib. 528. 701-709.

Explanatory statement as to the interpretation given by the judges to the law relative to agency; concurrence between them on this subject, Sir S. Martin 10550-10560—— Opinion adverse to any greater immunity of candidates in respect of the acts of agents, ib. 10635-10638——Inability of paid agents to vote; question considered as to the expediency of an increased check in this respect, ib. 10673. 10703. 10709—— Doubt as to the expediency of prohibiting payments to attorneys as agents, ib. 10678-10680.

Information relative to the provisions on the subject of agency, and their operation as involving risks to the candidate; conclusion that the law is, on the whole, substantially just, Sir J. S. Willes 10766-10783. 10801, 10802. 10849-10853—— Effect of extensive bribery or intimidation in vitiating the election, even though agency cannot be proved, ib. 10775-10783—— Concurrence between the judges in Ireland and England as to the law of agency, ib. 10803—— Little, if any, difficulty experienced by witness as to what constitutes agency, ib. 10849-10853.

Expediency of an enlarged discretion in the judge as to what constitutes agency in each case, Sir C. Blackburn 11978——Necessity of the Member being held liable for the acts of his agent, though this is sometimes attended with hardship, ib. 11979, 11980 ——Difficulty in enforcing the provision as to a Member losing his seat, when retaining as agent a person who has been scheduled, ib. 12034, 12035——Great evil of the system of paid agents, witness hesitating, however, to recommend their total prohibition, ib. 12037-12039.

(Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a builder and contractor at Carlisle; took an active part in canvassing for Mr. Hodgson at the last election, 12442-12444. 12453-12456—— Unwillingness of Mr. Hodgson to canvass the men in the Carlisle works of the London and North Western Railway Company, he being a director of the company; representations by witness and others which induced him to visit the works, 12445-12448. 12502, 12503——Strong disposition evinced by these men to support Mr. Hodgson, who is very popular with them; great majority who eventually voted for him, 12449-12452. 12480-12487. 12500-12505. 12534-12536.

Particulars relative to the canvass of the men in the railway works by Mr. Hodgson, witness, and others; entire absence of any pressure by Mr. Hodgson, 12457 et seq —— Circumstance of the men having recently passed a resolution condemnatory of Mr. Irving's evidence before the Committee, 12459. 12468-12471——Denial that witness has dismissed workmen on account of their votes, 12493-12499.

Large majority of the men in the employment of the corporation who voted against Mr. Hodgson, 12506-12513——Large majority also of the men at the gasworks, which belong to the Corporation, who voted for the Liberal candidates, 12510-12515. 12531-12533—— Statement also as to the men at the works of Mr. Ferguson and other Liberal employers having nearly all voted against Mr. Hodgson; inference therefrom, 12516-12530. 12537-12540.

Arnold, Arthur. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Submits explanations in detail relative to the system of ball ballot in operation at elections in Greece; strongly advocates the system on the ground of secrecy, simplicity, and fairness, 10334 et seq.——Very orderly conduct of the elections, whereas the people are peculiarly excitable in political matters, 10373-10376. 10481-10490——Instances of abuse in connection with the elections, owing to the disorganized state of the country; conclusion that this is not consequent upon upon the ballot system, and that the elections are, generally, pure, 10370–10387. 10450-10461.

Opinion that secrecy cannot be absolutely secured by the ballot under the plan of the voter filling up the voting papers, 10388–10391——Practice as to canvassing in Greece, 10393–10396——Character of the candidates and of the Members elected; absence of objection to the ballot on this score, 10400–10407——Particulars relative to the system of compulsory requisition before any person is qualified as candidate, it being necessary that the requisition be signed by one-twentieth of the constituency: recommended adoption of this plan in England, in lieu of the present nomination system, 10408–10428. 10430–10444.

Very complicated character of a certain machine, invented in this country, for putting the ball ballot in force, 10429——Very small expenses of the candidates in Greece, 10476–10480——Conclusion as to the impracticability of preventing the state of the poll being known whilst the voting is open, there being no means of preventing afternoon bribery on the polling day, 10501–10503——Careful custody of the ballot boxes in Greece, 10504, 10505——Absence of interference on the part of the clergy, 10506-10508——Appointment of the returning officer, or eparch, by the Government, 10509-10511.

Ascroft, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Submits certain resolutions to the Committee, which were recently adopted by the town council of Preston, 4936-4938.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Election of 1868.

1. Municipal Elections:

Witness testifies in detail to the prevalence of intimidation, bribery, and treating at the municipal elections for the borough, these practices being confined to the Liberal party, Hampson 2506 et seq.——Intimidation by means of roughs at the municipal elections, ib. 2522, 2523. 2606-2608——Statement as to the undue influence exercised by the corporation and its officers, in the interests of Liberal candidates, ib. 2525–2532. 2552. 2609, 2610. 2640-2644——Violence at some of the municipal elections, there being no dread of legal proceedings, ib. 2582–2586——Grounds for the conclusion that undue influence was exercised as regards the municipal votes of the workmen at Hurst Mills, ib. 2669–2685.

Concurrence in the evidence of Mr. Hampson as to the prevalence of intimidation and undue influence at the local elections, Wilson 2761–2764——Undue influence exercised in the town council, on the Liberal side, in reference to the elections, ib. 2775-2778.

Statement to the effect that treatment has been practised by Conservatives as well as by Liberals at the Ashton municipal elections, and that Mr. Hampson's evidence on this subject is inaccurate, Darnton 3517-3527——Conclusion as to the inaccuracy of the charge, that servants of the corporation had been unduly influenced by the corporation in respect of their votes, ib. 3519. 3521. 3575. 3620-3625——Equal number of Conservatives and of Liberals on the town council, the aldermen, however, being all Liberals, ib. 3520, 3521.

Prevalence of much violence and drunkenness at the municipal elections in former years; doubt as to bribery having been resorted to, Darnton 3521-3525. 3527——Improvement as regards the municipal elections since the passing of Mr. Assheton Cross's Act, though it has not prevented treating or personation, ib. 3547-3552——Want of increased facilities for punishing those guilty of corrupt practices, ib. 3552 et seq.——Equal intensity of party feeling at the municipal elections, as in former years, ib. 3576–3581.

2. Parliamentary Election of 1868:

Particulars relative to a list of persons discharged from the mills of Mr. Oldham Whittaker and other employers, after the last Parliamentary election, for having voted on the Conservative side, Hampson 2532–2534. 2553 et seq.——Undue influence exercised over Mr. Hugh Mason's workmen and tenants, relative to their votes, ib. 2535, 2536. 2625–2630. 2727-2731——Absence of bribery at the last Parliamentary election, ib. 2545. 2631. 2652. 2709–2726——Intimidation and undue influence were the chief evils at the last election, ib. 2545. 2551 et seq.——Prevalence of treating to some extent, but only on the Liberal side, ib. 2546-2550.

Explanation as to the formation and operation of the Victim Fund, for the relief of workmen dismissed by Liberal millowners, Hampson 2554–2560. 2645–2649——Witness submits certain declarations made before magistrates at Ashton by different workmen, relative to their dismissal for having voted for Mr. Mellor; detailed explanations hereon, ib. 2562 et seq. 2739-2743——Exceedingly quiet character of the Parliamentary election, ib. 2580, 2581——Stop put to corrupt practices on the Conservative side; explanation hereon, hereon, as to legal proceedings not having been taken against the other side, Hampson 2587-2600.

Statement in explanation of the Victim List at Ashton; extent to which circulated, Hampson 2611-2620——Reference to a notice posted by Mr. Oldham Whittaker, as showing that he acknowledged having dismissed men for having voted contrary to his wishes, ib. 2620-2624—— Absence of intimidation on the part of workmen against each other, ib. 2636-2839——Strong feeling in the town, and more especially among the working classes, in favour of Mr. Mellor; statement hereon, that the extension of the franchise has rendered the Conservative party much the more numerous, ib. 2661-2668. 2749-2752.

Injury rather than benefit to the Conservative cause at Ashton, through the lectures of Mr. Murphy, before the Parliamentary election, Hampson 2732-2738——Further reference to the intimidation, as regards workmen of Mr. Hugh Mason; question hereon as to certain expenditure by Mr. Mason in the erection of schools and reading rooms, ib. 2752-2760.

Statement showing, that in consequence of witness's support of Mr. Mellor at the last Parliamentary election, several members of the Whittaker family, who were supporters of Mr. Milner Gibson, withdrew their custom from him, Wilson 2765-2768. 2772-2775—— Practice at Ashton for both Conservative and Liberals to support tradespeople according to their politics, ib. 2770, 2771. 2779-2784.

Information relative to the large number of public-houses and beerhouses engaged by the Conservatives at the last Parliamentary election: unduly large sum paid on this side for hire of rooms as compared with the payments on the Liberal side, Darnton 3519-3546. 3558-3566. 3603-3610—— Great excitement at the election, ib. 3519——Doubt as to the extent to which intimidation by masters may have been practised at the election, ib. 3572-3574.

Athlone. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Mr. Ennis, App. 580, 581.

at municipal elections, as at Nottingham, but that it would not be an effectual check, Bradshaw 382–393; 400–407. 420–426.

Several sources of expense at municipal elections which would be checked by the ballot, Darvill 526–539 —— Conclusions favourable to the ballot as the most effectual if not the only mode of prevention of corrupt practices at municipal elections, Addyman 1409–1412. 1471, 1472. 1499, 1500. 1527; Gaunt 1561–1567 ——Prevalence of feeling at Leeds in favour of the ballot at municipal as well as Parliamentary elections, Addyman 1505–1507.

Prevalence of much treating at the municipal elections at Liverpool; tendency of the ballot to correct this practice, Trippier 1660, 1661 ——Grounds for approving of the ballot at municipal elections, though witness objects to it at Parliamentary elections, Stanley 2214 et seq.——Advantage of the ballot at the municipal elections as a means of doing away with corrupt practices at the Parliamentary elections, ib. 2313–2316 —— Grounds for objecting to the ballot at the Staleybridge municipal elections, though some remedy against intimidation is essential, Saville 2469–2476. 2482, 2483——Approval of the ballot at municipal elections, Ellard 7195.

II. Parliamentary Elections:

1. State of Public Opinion upon the Question of the Ballot:

Statement that witness, though opposed to the ballot all his life, has of late become convinced that it is the only remedy against bribery, corruption, and intimidation, Darvill 195. 232. 515, 516. 529. 532–535. 561–563. 635–637. 769–772 ——Belief that large numbers are now favourable to the ballot who formerly were opposed to it, ib. 561——Decided advance of the movement at Windsor in favour of secret voting, ib. 857 ——Desire expressed for the ballot by some of the most respectable Conservatives at Windsor, ib. 858.

Witness has always been an advocate of the ballot as a preventive to bribery and intimidation, Herbert 918–922 ——Doubt as to the feeling in the Common Council of the City of London on the question of the ballot, Woodthorpe 982. 987–988——Explanation that witness does not profess to represent the views of his workpeople on the question of the ballot, but he has no reason to believe that the operatives in Lancashire are becoming favourable to secret voting, Bleckly 1226–1228. 1283–1287.

Growing opinion not only of Liberals but of Conservatives at Leeds in favour of the ballot, Addyman 1502–1504; Grant 1582–1587——Growing feeling at Liverpool in favour of the ballot; grounds for this statement, Trippier 1702, 1703. 1841–1850. 1857. 1892–1894. 1925–1927; Johnston 2009–2017. 2062, 2063. 2069, 2070.

Feeling of Conservative working men at Ashton, and of the working men generally, in favour of the ballot, Hampson 2661–2668. 2749–2752——Very general feeling at Bradford in favour of the ballot, a large number of Conservatives being amongst its advocates, Stanley 2852–2859——Feeling among the Conservatives at Blackburn, as well as Liberals, in favour of the ballot, Johnston 3213, 3214. 3227——Opinion that at Blackburn the majority of the inhabitants would gladly hail the adoption of vote by ballot, ib. 3227—— Illustration of the objection by working men at Liverpool to the ballot, Forwood 3378–3382.

Circumstance of the Conservative members for Staleybridge and Ashton being supporters of the ballot, Kirk 3991–3997 ——Recent conversion of witness in favour of the ballot; he still believes it an evil, but a far less evil than the system of open voting, Latham 6461–6463 —— Desire among the tenant farmers in Cheshire for the ballot; its advantage as causing them to take a greater interest in politics, ib. 6535–6540.

Copies of resolutions recently adopted by the Liverpool Conservative Working Men's Association in favour of open voting, Forwood 3378–3382——General feeling of Conservatives at Bristol opposed to secret voting; doubt, moreover, as to the ballot having grown in favour with the Liberals, Bush 4423, 4424. 4428–4436 ——Very general disapproval of the ballot by the Conservatives at Bristol, &c., Thomas 5761——Adverse feeling in Bolton towards the ballot, many of the Liberal party objecting to it, Edge 12964–12966.

2. Effect of the Ballot as regards Bribery:

Modified approval of the ballot as a check upon bribery, Barber 109, 110. 175, 176 ——Opinion that under the ballot the uncertainty as to the way in which men would vote would in time prevent candidates from risking their money in bribery, Darvill 638–656——Statement of the obstacles to candidates or their agents making corrupt agreements with a body of electors for paying them after the election on condition of success, ib. 639–673. 728–742. 781–805. 862.

Belief that under the ballot bribery would extensively prevail, and would take the form of payment after the election upon condition of success, Bleckly 1155, 1156. 1244–

II. Parliamentary Elections—continued.

1263. 1316. 1319–1337——Decided preference for open voting as compared with the ballot, witness believing that the ballot would act as a premium to bribery, Davies 3718–3720.

Conclusion that the ballot is the most effectual and desirable remedy for bribery and other corrupt practices, Addyman 1409–1412. 1471, 1472. 1499, 1500. 1527; Grant 1561–1567; West 2904–2906. 2923–2927. 2946 et seq.——Great improbability of candidates running the risk of bribery if there were the ballot, even though the lower class of voters might always continue open to bribery, West 2955–2963. 2994–3002——Little inducement for bribery under the ballot, there being no security how the vote should be given, Torrens 8967, 8968.

Possibility under the ballot of some candidates being prepared to bribe on the chance of those bribed supporting them, although it would be impossible to discover whether they had done so, Dalton 9079–9091——Possibility under the ballot of the payment of voters for staying at home, Muir 9915–9920——Improbability of the payment of money corruptly after the time for petitioning has expired, ib. 9934–9936.

Possibility under the ballot of voters being induced to refrain from voting, Sir C. W. Dilke 10293——Statement that in small boroughs the ballot would not prevent bribery in the form of a conditional payment in the event of the candidate's success; this, in fact, would be the only form of bribery feasible under the ballot, ib. 10316–10325.

Great difficulty under the ballot in detecting wholesale bribery, it being quite open to candidates or their friends to make arrangements for paying voters conditional on success, Fitzgerald 10874–10883——Belief that under the ballot bribery would still take place; illustration in support of this view, Edge 12791–12803. 12887–12890——Efficiency of the ballot as a means of preventing bribery on the polling day, ib. 12985.

3. Effect as regards Canvassing:

Advantage anticipated from the ballot in checking domiciliary canvassing, Darvill 851–856. 885–887——Tendency of the ballot to diminish systematic canvassing, Trippier 1897.

4. Effect as regards Intimidation and Undue Influence:

Full exercise of legitimate and moral influence under the plan of secret voting, Darvill 846–850——Frequent instance of coercive and mandatory canvassing which would not occur if the electors had the protection of the ballot, ib. 851–856. 873–875——Respects in which undue pressure might still be exercised as regards workpeople, if the ballot were adopted, Bleckly 1236–1243——Very little protection required at Leeds as regards undue influence or intimidation; advantage, however, of the ballot on this ground, Grant 1588. 1590–1593.

Opinion favourable to the ballot for the protection of working men both at municipal and Parliamentry elections, Hampson 2601–2603——Strong approval of the ballot as an effectual remedy for intimidation or undue influence, Johnston 3212; Briggs 3281, 3282——Beneficial effect anticipated in the discontinuance of undue influence, Harris 6350–6352. 6402–6406; Latham 6462——Effect of the ballot in preventing all intimidation, McDermot 8713.

5. Effect as regards Mob Violence:

Much more quiet conduct of elections if there were the ballot, Darvill 535——Conclusion that the ballot would not have had the slightest effect in diminishing the riots in Monmouthshire, Colborne 4754–4759——Tendency of the ballot to prevent riots, as the people would have faith in the fairness of the election, Collen 5044–5046——Opinion as to the efficacy of the ballot as a means of preventing the system of hired mobs, Raleigh 5578, 5579. 5652, 5653.

Approval of the ballot as a means of securing peaceable elections and freedom of voting, Thomas 5759——Advantage of the ballot as tending to modify the intimidation by mobs, Spaight 6950–6955. 6993, 6994. 7075——Conclusion as to the tendency of the ballot to prevent mob excitement and intimidation, Ellard 7270–7272; Taylor 12186–12192. 12205–12211——Tendency to quiet and order through the ballot, Dutton 9022.

6. Effect as regards Personation:

Belief that the ballot would not lead to any increase of personation, Darvill 743–746. 826——Equal means of preventing personation under the ballot as under the present system, Darvill 838–840; Dutton 9138, 9139.

Increased difficulty in dealing with personation if secret voting be adopted, Forwood 3402, 3403.

7. Question

BALLOT—continued.

II. Parliamentary Elections—continued.

7. Question as to Secrecy being Secured:

Conclusion as to its being perfectly feasible to keep the voting secret where there is the ballot; practice in foreign countries adverted to hereon, Darvill 860, 861. 881–884 —— Grounds for concluding that the ballot would not have the effect of securing secrecy, Cheese 5085–5088. 5098. 5135. 5223—— Expected secrecy as to the tenant's vote under the operation of the ballot, Russel 5949–5952.

Belief that in the smaller boroughs in England, secrecy would be easily maintained under the ballot, Torrens 8759——Conclusion that the ballot would be just as effectual in England as in Victoria, and that it would secure secrecy in small constituencies, Verdon 9638–9644. 9800, 9801—— Opinion that under the Australian system, with the addition of one provision, secrecy would be absolutely preserved, Sir C. W. Dilke 10216.

Opinion that secrecy cannot be absolutely secured by the ballot under the plan of the voter filling up the voting papers, Arnold 10388–10391——Belief that under the ballot it would be easy to ascertain how doubtful votes had polled, and that undue influence and bribery would be resorted to just as much as at present, Edge 12887–12890. 12983.

8. Question as to the Class of Candidates to be Returned:

Improved chances of candidates of high character if the ballot be adopted, Darvill 564–568—— Belief that under the ballot at Parliamentary elections an objectionable class of candidates would be returned, though the same result would not follow from the ballot at municipal elections, Stanley 2216 et seq.; 2330 et seq.——Tendency of the ballot to increase the influence of candidates of high character, Dutton 9136, 9137.

9. Question as to the Effect in a Party Sense:

Belief that the ballot would be no disadvantage to the Conservative party, Cheese 5136. 5224, 5225——Advantage of the ballot to the popular party, Murphy 5325—— Belief that the ballot would not increase the Liberal ranks, McDermot 8713.

10. Question as to Public Discussion being Discouraged:

Doubt as to the effect of the ballot as regards the expression of opinion at public meetings in favour of candidates, Barber 144–152. 294, 295—— Examination opposed to the view that secret voting is incompatible with the system of authorised canvassing, and with the practice of public political discussion previous to elections, Darvill 599 et seq. —— Belief that public discussion would be increased rather than diminished if the ballot were adopted, ib. 841–845—— Very free discussion of public questions in Australia notwithstanding the ballot, ib. 843–845.

11. Question as to Deception and Hypocrisy being Fostered:

Question considered whether lying and evasion would not be increased by the ballot; there is a great deal of lying at present, but evasion would probably be increased, Darvill 607–624. 676–679.

Decided objection to the ballot as necessitating continued falsehood on the part of voters, Storey 2838. 2857, 2858——Opinion that under the ballot a man's whole life is a lie, ib. 2857.

Question as to the effect of the ballot in leading to deception on the part of tenants; this being, however, a less evil than the abuse under the present system of intimidation, Harris 6350–6352. 6402–6406——Expectation that under the ballot deception will not be necessary, and that undue influence will not be brought to bear, Latham 6462—— Opinion that the ballot would lead to political hypocrisy, Norwood 8147. 8248–8251.

12. Expected Diminution in the Returning Officer's Expenses:

Grounds for the conclusion that the returning officer's expenses would be greatly diminished under the ballot, Taylor 12139, 12140. 12200–12204. 12262–12265.

13. Objection to the Ballot as not admitting of the Rectification of Mistakes in Polling:

Particulars in connection with certain mistakes in the recording of votes at the last Parliamentary election for Warrington through neglect of the poll clerk and check clerks; steps subsequently taken for rectifying the matter, such rectification not being feasible if the ballot had been in operation, Bleckly 1121. 1123–1146. 1157–1162. 1169–1175. 1278–1282. 1288–1301. 1305–1311. 1317, 1318. 1375–1377.

14. Possible Objection where there are Two or more Candidates to be returned out of several:

Possibility of the ballot being sometimes open to objection in cases where there are two or more candidates to be returned out of several, Verdon 9814——Instance at Melbourne of the ill-effect likely to ensue through one constituency returning several members under the ballot, Fitzgerald 10913–10925. 10970, 10971. 11031–11036.

 15. Other

Ballot—continued.

II. Parliamentary Elections—continued.

15. Other Evidence generally as to the Merits or Demerits of the Ballot at Parliamentary Elections:

Gradual change of witness's opinions on the subject of the ballot, which he now believes to be the only effectual remedy for intimidation and bribery, Darvill 515, 516. 532–535. 561–563. 635–637. 769–772——Conclusion that immorality is at least as great under the system of open voting as under the ballot, ib. 827–833——Advantage of the ballot in the state of the poll not being known till the voting is over, ib. 828, 829——Belief that by the ballot morality would be restored to Windsor, ib. 859.

Witness considers that the franchise should be used openly, and that the ballot would lower the standard of the voter, Woodthorpe 983–986——Approval of the ballot as a protection to the voter at municipal elections, though it is not expedient in the case of Parliamentary elections; examination as to the grounds for this distinction, Stanley 2214 et seq.——Approval of an extension of the ballot to Parliamentary elections if found successful at municipal elections, ib. 2400.

Belief that no penal enactment will prevent corrupt practices at municipal and Parliamentary elections so long as there is open voting, the ballot being the only effectual remedy, Trippier 1651–1659. 1691, 1692. 1714–1723. 1781. 1833–1835——Examination upon the question of the ballot being no real check under certain circumstances, ib. 1715–1723. 1836–1840. 1858–1861.

Approval of the ballot, both for municipal and Parliamentary elections, Wilson 2769–2771——Decided approval of the ballot as a means of preventing not only intimidation, but treating and bribery generally, West 2904–2906. 2923–2927. 2946 et seq.——Increased demand for the ballot at Bradford by reason of the large extension of the franchise, ib. 3045, 3046.

Approval of the present mode of voting as preferable to the ballot, Forwood 3377——Opinion as to the inadequacy of the ballot as a means of preventing riot or intimidation or treating, Bush 4423–4428.

Decided approval of the ballot, though as regards Staleybridge it would not have prevented several of the evils which occurred, Kirk 3943–3945. 4007–4021——Belief that the ballot is the only remedy for the evils which prevail at the Chippenham elections, Collen 5037–5039——Great value attached to the ballot, though at the same time something should be done to prevent or diminish paid canvassing, McGowan 6058–6060. 6072–6074.

Increased necessity for the ballot since the extension of the franchise; expediency of further extension in counties, if accompanied by the ballot, Latham 6463–6468. 6523–6525——Decided approval of the ballot in this country, judging from its working in Australia, Torrens 8933, 8934. 9006——Witness is convinced that the ballot tends to purity of election, and to quiet and order, Dutton 9022——Less expensive contests formerly in South Australia than in England, the ballot, however, being just as desirable in the latter country as a check upon corrupt expenditure, ib. 9157–9163.

Greater need of the ballot in this country than in a new country like Victoria, Verdon 9810, 9811——Dissent from the view that the ballot has the necessary effect of reducing political feeling, ib. 9812——About equal expedition in polling by ballot and by open voting, Fitzgerald 10887, 10888.

Conclusion that the ballot would be no protection against the kidnapping of voters, Edge 12807. 12809. 12887——Belief that corrupt practices would be resorted to just as much as at present, ib. 12887–12890. 12983——Tendency of the ballot to repress public opinion, ib. 12983.

III. Suggestions for the detailed Working of the Ballot:

Proposals for the detailed carrying out of the system of ballot; objection hereon to the plan adopted in Australia, Darvill 691–699——Consideration of the machinery for carrying out secret voting; contemplated employment of an officer at each booth, who should be sworn to secrecy, West 2976–2985. 3024–3028——Decided objection to a publication of lists of the voters, Torrens 8963–8966——Objection to the voting papers being preserved after the scrutiny, or to there being any means of discovering how a voter has polled, Dutton 9092–9102——Suggestion for facilitating voting by blind persons under the ballot system, ib. 9351.

Advantage, if the ballot be adopted, of a ballot box in each parish, and of the votes in the county being taken simultaneously, Rt. Hon. G. W. Hunt 9503. 9531–9534.

Objection to the voter handing the paper to the returning officer for deposit in the ballot box, Verdon 9669–9672. 9742; Muir 9887, 9888.

Opinion that it should be an essential part of every ballot system that the voting paper should be handed to the returning officer, or his deputy, Sir C. M. Dilke 10162, 10163. 10256. 10263. 10302——Advantage of the plan of the voter scratching out the name of

of the candidates for whom he does not vote, Sir C. M. Dilke 10251——Suggestion, that if the returning officer, in putting the voter into the box, should in any case see how the vote was given, such vote should be lost, ib. 10257, 10258. 10302——Advantage of the check afforded by the deputy returning officer putting his initials on each paper, ib. 10259. 10302.

Approval of the practice in Victoria, whereby the returning officer assists those who cannot read or write, Sir C. M. Dilke 10278, 10279——Varying practice in France, and in the several Australian Colonies, as to the destruction of the voting papers after the election, and as to the conduct of a scrutiny, ib. 10282. 10289, 10290——Conclusion, that with proper precautions against personation a scrutiny is unnecessary, and that the papers should at once be destroyed, ib. 10282–10290. 10302——Device suggested by witness, and adopted at the Manchester ballot, for enabling blind voters to poll with secrecy, ib. 10298——Advantage of conducting the ballot in rooms; economy thereby, ib. 10305, 10306.

Non-objection to the Australian plan of allowing a sworn returning officer to assist a voter who could not read or write, Taylor 12154, 12155. 12195–12197. 12241–12245——Doubt as to any confusion in respect of different colours on the voting card when there are several candidates, ib. 12180–12184. 12193–12198——Precaution necessary in giving a second card to a voter on the plea that he had damaged or spoiled the original card; there was no case of this kind at Manchester, ib. 12280–12282.

IV. Means of preventing the Tasmanian Dodge:

Ingenious device adopted in Tasmania for a substitution of the voting cards, involving the bribing of successive voters; facility of detection of this trick, Torrens 8751, 8752——Conclusion as to the impracticability of a voter bringing with him and using a voting paper previously signed and filled up, with the initials of the returning officer forged upon the back, and taking away the paper received from the returning officer, in order that it may be used by another voter; systematic fraud in this respect practised at an election in Tasmania, Verdon 9576. 9650–9673. 9733–9741. 9764–9786.

Opinion as to the impracticability of any systematic personation and fraud on the plan alleged to have been adopted in Tasmania, Muir 9884–9886. 9889–9892——Explanatory statement on the subject of the Tasmanian dodge; precautionary means by which it may be prevented, it being in any case very difficult of execution, Sir C. W. Dilke 10259–10277——Reference to a certain fraud under the ballot in Tasmania; this, however, being easy of prevention, Fitzgerald 10905–10912.

Efficiency of the checks upon personation under the system as tried at Manchester; statement hereon as to the facilities for detecting the Tasmanian dodge, Taylor 12130–12134. 12230, 12231. 12246–12250——Adequacy of the checks upon the voter, when in the polling booth, changing the voting card for a spurious one in his pocket, ib. 12134. 12169–12272——Description of the Tasmanian dodge; its clumsy character, ib. 12134.

V. Ball Ballot:

Particulars relative to different plans and machines invented with a view to ballot voting by balls; several advantages of the ball ballot, though witness hesitates to recommend its adoption, Sir C. W. Dilke 10213–10215. 10294–10301——Details relative to the operation of the ball ballot in Greece; conclusions strongly in favour of the system, Arnold 10334 et seq.——Very complicated character of a certain machine invented in this country for putting the ball ballot in force, ib. 10429——Evidence opposed to the ball ballot, on the ground that the voter could give more votes than he was entitled to, Taylor 12166–12178.

VI. Suggestion for the Adoption of the Ballot in a Modified Form:

Proposition that, if secret voting be not completely adopted in England, the votes might be taken by ballot, and made public a week after the election; facility thereby for detecting bribery, whilst intimidation would be diminished, Fitzgerald 10899–10904. 10957–10962. 10967, 10968.

VII. Conclusions of Members of the Committee, and Proposals in Draft Report of the Chairman:

Resolution proposed by Mr. Bright in strong approval of the ballot, Rep. xiv.

Resolutions submitted by Mr. Hunt, by Mr. Howes, and by Sir Frederick Heygate, adverse to the adoption of the ballot, Rep. xiv., xv.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee favourable to the adoption of the ballot in municipal elections, Rep. xvi.

VII. Conclusions of Members of the Committee, &c.—continued.

Consideration in Draft Report of the Chairman of the Committee of the arguments for and against the ballot, Rep. xix, xx.——Conclusion as to the beneficial effect of the ballot in preventing spiritual intimidation by the Roman Catholic clergy, ib.

Excellent effect of the ballot in Victoria, South Australia, &c., Rep. xix.——Inference as to the equally beneficial operation of the ballot in this country, as in foreign countries, and in the Australian Colonies, ib. xix, xx.——Beneficial effect of the ballot as a check upon bribery, ib. xix.

Conclusion (in Draft Report) that the ballot possesses many great advantages, that it would put an end to some of the evils of the present electoral system, and that it would tend to mitigate, rather than to aggravate, those which it would not entirely remove, Rep. xx.

Barber, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Mayor of Nottingham, 1——Statement of the number of municipal electors in each of the seven wards in the borough of Nottingham, the total number being 14,168; 2–4——Similar limits of the Parliamentary and of the municipal borough, 5——Notoriety of the practice of bribery at the municipal elections in the borough, money being given with little, if any, attempt at concealment, 6. 22, 23. 64–68——Careful inquiry made by witness, the conclusion being that about one-third of the municipal electors require money, and that the payments vary from 2*s.* 6*d.* upwards, accordingly as the contests are more severe, 7–19. 71–74.

Statement relative to the very large expenditure at the municipal elections in 1844; 14, 15. 181–186. 204–212——Considerable prevalence of treating, as well as bribery, at the Nottingham municipal elections, 20, 21. 109——Effect of the existing corruption in deterring respectable persons from standing for the municipal council, 24. 77. 179——Long period for which bribery has been practised at the elections, 25–27——Corrupt character of many small shopkeepers, as well as of the lower class of voters, 28. 173, 174.

Frequent instances of persons being nominated without their consent; great abuse arising from this practice, 29–32. 34–37. 40, 41. 187–189——Doubt as to the bribery at the municipal elections having any reference to the Parliamentary elections, 33. 196–203. 213–220——Suggestion that a small fee be charged for each nomination paper, and that no person should be nominated without his consent, 34, 35— Explanation of the present mode of preparing the voting papers, and of handing them in at the poll; abuse to which liable, 38–40.

Opinion favourable to the ballot, as a means of checking the existing bribery at the municipal elections; it is only of late that witness has arrived at this conclusion, and many others at Nottingham are adopting the same view, 42–44. 90–110. 175, 176——Statement as to the Act of 1859, for enforcing penalties for bribery at municipal elections, having never been enforced at Nottingham; sundry obstacles to putting the Act in force, 45–49. 123–133——Suggestion for some simple and speedy mode of proceeding, in cases of bribery, the expense to be borne by the town, except the proceedings are vexatious, 45. 49——Advantage of applying to municipal elections the law in regard to bribery at Parliamentary elections, 50.

Approval of a prohibition upon expenditure in the conveyance of municipal voters to the poll, 51, 52——Statement showing that personation frequently takes place at the municipal elections, 53–59. 114–122——Very little intimidation at the elections, 60–63——Strong desire for a suppression of bribery, some attempts to stop it having, however, been futile, 64–76——Large ratepayers selected for the town council, the affairs of the town being excellently managed by the council, 77–85. 310, 311——Selection of the most fitting persons for the council, if the elections were conducted purely, 85–87——Gradual spread of the system of taking money for votes, 88, 89.

Doubt as to treating being much resorted to if there were secret voting, 108, 109——Importance attached rather to good laws, than to secret voting, for the prevention of bribery; in the absence of the former, witness falls back upon the latter, 109, 110. 175, 176——Increased interest taken in the elections by the non-corrupt voters, but for the system of bribery, 111–113. 153–165——Statement as to the candidates for the council being elected with direct reference to their political principles, and yet without reference to the Parliamentary elections, 137–143. 177–186. 204–220.

Doubt as to the effect of the ballot, as regards the expression of opinion at public meetings in favour of candidates, 144–152. 294, 295——Indifference of a large number of municipal voters, as regards the elections, if it were not for the payments made, 153–165——Efficient discharge of their duty by those elected, their politics not leading to abuse, abuse, 166–171——Local objects by which candidates are induced to stand, and to give their services in the town council, 167. 172——Obstacle to bribery being suppressed by the united action of those who condemn it, 169. 180–186.

Further statement as to the mode of voting by means of voting papers, and as to there being no proper secrecy, 190–194. 221–231——Witness is only a recent convert to the ballot, and is not prepared to make any detailed suggestions for carrying out secret voting, 195. 232. 291–293——Doubt as to the expediency of the borough justices prosecuting for bribery at the municipal elections, 233–243——Less tendency to bribery at municipal elections if the state of the poll were not published till the close, 244–247——Instances of the same voters having polled for candidates on different lists, 248, 249.

Witness is not aware of any instance of Parliamentary Members for Nottingham subscribing towards the expense of municipal contests, 250——Advantage if there were a public prosecutor for initiating proceedings in cases of bribery at municipal elections, the expense to fall upon the town, 251–257. 269–271. 301–304——Check upon bribery if the election were invalidated in the event of corrupt practices being proved, 251. 328–335.

Understanding between the persons termed "managers," in the different wards, and the municipal voters, as to the money to be paid; question hereon whether there might not be a similar understanding, even though the ballot were adopted, 258–268——Check to fictitious nominations, if the persons nominating had to contribute to the expense, 272–275——Absence of public dissatisfaction on account of the expense of the municipal contests, 276–282.

Respects in which the expense is greater in the case of a Parliamentary election at Nottingham than of a municipal election, 283–288——Objection to placing the expenses of Parliamentary elections upon the towns, as tending to increase the number of candidates, and of contests, 289. 340–345——Small sums for which many of the smaller tradesmen sell their votes at the municipal contests, 305–309——Refusal of many of the working classes to receive bribes, 309. 339——Advantage if canvassing at municipal elections could be stopped, 319–327. 337–339.

Belfast. Facility of voting at Belfast, through the provision of an ample number of polling places, Norwood 8128.

Certificate and report, by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald, in the matter of the Belfast election petition, App. 581.

Beverley. Extensive bribery at Beverley, both for the municipal and Parliamentary elections, Sir S. Martin 10524. 10544–10547. 10639, 10640——The Beverley case was the only one before witness where it was proved that bribery was committed at a municipal election, in order to influence the Parliamentary election, ib. 10544. 10639.

Certificate and report, by Mr. Justice Martin, in the matter of the Beverley election petition; extensive exercise of corrupt practices, App. 560–563.

Bewdley. Very extensive treating at the Bewdley election, Sir C. Blackburn 11958. 12022——Explanation on the subject of witness's decision in the Bewdley case, as to the right of voters to vote who had been scheduled in respect of bribery, ib. 12061–12063.

Certificate and report, by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the matter of the Bewdley election petition, App. 593, 564.

Blackburn:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections:

Witness testifies to the very extensive prevalence of bribery and treating at the municipal elections at Blackburn, each of the six wards being equally corrupt, Johnston 3060–3073. 3145–3153. 3206–3209——Circumstance of legal proceedings having never been taken in respect of any corrupt practices, except personation, ib. 3074–3082. 3167–3175——Particulars relative to the intimidation and obstruction resorted to at the municipal elections, all these elections being conducted as political contests, ib. 3083 et seq.

Statement showing the great excitement in connection with the last municipal election on account of the effect of such election on the Parliamentary contest then near at hand; undue influence on the part of Conservative employers whilst bribery was very extensively practised, Johnston 3105–3124. 3135. 3151–3163——Very few unnecessary nominations at the municipal elections, ib. 3176, 3177——Importance of an increased number of polling places at the municipal elections, ib. 3232–3234. 3241–3245.

1. Municipal Elections—continued.

Great rioting at the last municipal election in witness's ward, Briggs 3252–3254. 3283–3294——Extensive prevalence of bribery at the municipal election, ib. 3255–3259. 3273–3276.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Evidence as to the intimidation at the Parliamentary election in November 1868, and also at the recent election in March; belief that bribery also was resorted to, Johnston 3098–3101. 3125–3150. 3178–3184. 3210, 3211——Very little feeling in the borough against bribery, ib. 3103, 3104——Danger of disfranchisement if there had been a searching inquiry after the Parliamentary election, ib. 3130, 3131——Large majority of operatives in the constituency, ib. 3178, 3179.

Different result of the Parliamentary elections but for the intimidation exercised, Johnston 3180–3184——Considerable bribery at some of the former Parliamentary elections, ib. 3185–3200——Small earnings of many of those placed on the register by the late Reform Act, ib. 3201–3205——Limited amount of treating at the Parliamentary elections, ib. 3219——Considerable intimidation at the Parliamentary election in November and at the preceding municipal election, Briggs 3260–3270. 3277–3280.

Explanatory statement relative to the undue influence extensively exercised in the Tory mills at Blackburn, chiefly by overlookers and fellow workmen, the election of 1868 inquired into by witness having been voided on this ground, Sir J. S. Willes 10718–10731.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Willes in the matter of the Blackburn election petition, App. 564, 565——Excessive exercise of undue influence, so that the election was voided, ib.

Blackburn, Sir Colin, Knight. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has tried election petitions at nine places, involving the question of corrupt practices, 11953——Impression as to each place having its own peculiar mode of conducting its election, 11955——Very extensive prevalence of corrupt practices at Bridgewater, so that on witness's report a commission has been issued, 11956, 11957——Reference also to Stafford as a very corrupt place, 11957. 11975. 12011——Desire evinced by Mr. Alderman Pochin, one of the successful candidates at Stafford, to keep clear of all corrupt expenditure; reluctance with which witness unseated him, on the score of intimidation, 11957. 11960 11962. 11975, 11976. 12011.

Prevalence of drinking at most of the places inquired into by witness, though, save at Bewdley and Hereford, treating was not made out to his satisfaction, 11958, 11959——Exceptional instance of intimidation having been proved before witness, though it was alleged in each petition, 11960–11962——Conclusion that instead of treating certain practices as a misdemeanour the loss of the seat would be a much more deterring penalty, 11963–11970——Inoperativeness of the provisions as to indicting for a misdemeanour or suing for penalties, 11963. 11969.

Limited extent to which the conduct of the municipal elections came before witness; exceptional instances of alleged bribery or treating for Parliamentary purposes, 11964. 12059, 12060——Want of further facilities for dealing with corrupt practices at municipal elections, there not being sufficient motive to put the law in force, 11965–11969——Suggestion that in the case of Parliamentary elections the period for petitioning should be extended till after the returns of the expenses have been made and published, 11970. 11975. 11989–11996. 12073–12075——Proposed voidance of the seat if the candidate or his agents willingly kept back any expenses which had been incurred, 11970–11973. 11975. 11993. 12064–12069. 12073–12075.

Objection to the judge being bound by a hard and fast line as to the particular acts which should void a seat, 11977——Expediency of an enlarged discretion in the judge as to what constitutes agency in each case, 11978——Necessity of the Member being held liable for the acts of his agent, though this is sometimes attended with hardship, 11979, 11980——Great difficulty in determining what amount of expenditure was lavish, as a ground for unseating a Member, 11982–11988.

Conclusion as to there being a great deal of corrupt expenditure which is not returned, and which escapes detection; advantage on this score of witness's proposition for extending the time for petitioning, 11989–11997——Possibility of much illegal and lavish expenditure without being able to connect it with agency, 11998, 11999——Way in which there may be illegal and lavish expenditure in treating, &c. without the election being necessarily invalidated; discretion exercised by the judge in such case, 11999, 12000——Belief as to the judges concurring in the view that unless treating is practised with intention to influence, the election is not voided thereby, 12001–12005.

Impracticability of preventing corrupt expenditure, though by degrees increased difficulties may be put in the way, 12006–12008——Incomplete evidence of corrupt practices which is brought out before the judge; consequent difficulty in reporting upon the character of the place, 12008-12011——Very little importance attached to the declarations of purity by candidates before commencing to canvass, 12012.

Further statement as to the alleged cases which were brought before witness of intimidation by landlords or employers having in almost every instance broken down, 12013. 12019. 12024, 12025——Evidence to the effect that intimidation by a landlord or employer would not vitiate the election unless agency can be proved, 12014–12021. 12025–12027——Failure of the attempt to prove coercion by landlords in the case of the North Norfolk petition, 12019. 12024, 12025——Approval of the necessity of proof of corrupt intention in the matter of treating, 12022, 12023.

Illustration in the Staleybridge case of the difficulty of deciding what constitutes agency, 12027——Very little paid agency at the election for North Norfolk, 12028, 12029——Belief that at no place where witness presided was it the habit of members to postpone payment of expenses till a following election, 12030——Liability to loss of seat under witness's proposal unless the expenditure be duly returned within a certain time, 12031.

Approval of a prohibition upon a member sitting for any other place during the Session, if unseated for intimidation, or treating done by his personal instigation or consent, 12033–12036——Difficulty in enforcing the provision as to a Member losing his seat when retaining as agent a person who has been scheduled, 12034, 12035——Great evil of the system of paid agents, witness hesitating, however, to recommend their total prohibition, 12037–12039——Harshness in making the loss of the seat a necessary result of any act of treating by the candidate, without leaving the question to the judge, whether corrupt intention was involved, 12040–12043. 12070–12072.

Consideration of the practice in regard to the furnishing of particulars as to alleged acts of bribery, &c., where a seat is claimed; objections to which open as affecting the sitting Member, 12044–12052——Explanation on the subject of witness's decision in the Bewdley case, as to the right of voters to vote who had been scheduled in respect of bribery, 12061–12063——Great improvement if public-houses were not used for committee rooms, 12079, 12080——Undue number of committee rooms at borough elections, 12081.

Valuable assistance and relief to witness when trying election petitions, if two laymen were to sit with him as assessors, in order to advise upon questions of fact, 12082, 12083. 12087–12089——Decided objection to a jury, 12084——Advantage of a public prosecutor in election matters, except that there would always be suspicion of bias, 12085, 12086. 12092——Probability of corrupt practices having been somewhat checked through fear of the new tribunal for trying petitions, 12091.

Ordinary legal course followed by witness in deciding as to the incidence of the expense of each petition; that is, that the cost should await the event, 12093——Danger of lavish expenditnre if the public were to be at the expense of petitioning, 12094——Necessity of the management and expense of the petition resting with the public if the matter be treated as a public inquiry, 12095——Difficulty as to a public officer taking up the inquiry upon condition that a primâ facie case was first made out by one of the parties, 12096.

Considerable amount of perjury in the cases that came before witness, 12097——Importance of the investigation being local, 12098——Concurrence in the view of Mr. Justice Willes, that in the event of a corrupt payment after a petition had been tried there might be a second petition; difficulty, however, involved in this question, 12099.

Bleckly, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a magistrate of the county of Lancaster; has been twice mayor of Warrington, and is member of a firm employing about 1,000 hands, 1032–1035——Very satisfactory manner in which the municipal elections have been conducted at Warrington since the Act 22 Vict. 1036 et seq.——Considerable amount of bribery and other undue influence at the elections previously to 1859; 1037. 1083——Belief that the improved state of things is due mainly to the moderate penalties under the Act of 1859, and to the probable enforcement of such penalties in cases of bribery, &c., 1040, 1041. 1049–1052. 1060–1066. 1083–1093.

Less political excitement in connection with the municipal elections in recent years; desire to enter the town council irrespectively of politics, 1053–1058. 1067–1072. 1099–1102——Little, if any, treating at the elections, 1059. 1073–1075——Belief that no occasion has arisen for putting the penal clauses of the Act of 1859 in operation, 1060–1066.

Orderly and respectable conduct of the Parliamentary elections at Warrington; failure of the attempt to unseat the present Members, 1077–1080——Severe character of the penalties under the Municipal Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, as compared with the moderate and easily enforced penalties under the Act 22 Vict., 1080–1085——Importance attached to a public prosecutor in cases of corruption at municipal elections, 1094–1098——General feeling at Warrington as to the satisfactory conduct of the municipal elections during the last ten years, 1109.

Approval of the system of voting papers, 1120–1122——Particulars in connection with certain mistakes in the recording of votes at the last Parliamentary election for Warrington, through neglect of the poll clerk and check clerks; steps subsequently taken for rectifying the matter, such rectification not being feasible if the ballot had been in operation, 1121. 1123–1146. 1157–1162. 1169–1175. 1278–1282. 1288–1301. 1305–1311. 1317, 1318. 1375–1377——Representation as to the expediency of some person of high character presiding at each polling booth at Parliamentary elections; also as to the want of improved machinery for the prevention and correction of mistakes in polling, 1121. 1123–1126. 1137–1146. 1274–1280. 1302. 1308–1311.

Evidence to the effect that witness and employers generally in the manufacturing towns do not exercise any undue influence in regard to the votes of their workpeople, 1147–1151. 1226. 1237–1239——Statement as to the political opinions of operatives being generally well known to each other, and as to there being thus a protection against their voting corruptly under the system of open voting, 1152–1154. 1163–1167. 1229–1235——Belief that, under the ballot, bribery would extensively prevail, and would take the form of payment after the election, upon condition of success, 1155, 1156. 1244–1263. 1316. 1319–1337.

Impression that there was no bribery at the last Parliamentary election for Warrington, 1176. 1370–1374—— Belief that there was no authorised treating at the election, though there might have been some treating by partisans. 1177–1184. 1352–1355. 1370–1374——Noisy and disorderly character of the proceedings at the nomination day at Warrington, 1185–1200——Improvement if the present system of nomination of candidates were abolished, and if, in lieu thereof, the names of candidates were required to be given in and published at the town hall or other public office, 1203–1221——Approval of a public declaration of the poll, though it might be an improvement if it were not made on the hustings, 1222–1225.

Explanation that witness does not profess to represent the views of his workpeople on the question of the ballot, but he has no reason to believe that the operatives in Lancashire are becoming favourable to secret voting, 1226–1228. 1283–1287——Respects in which undue pressure might still be exercised as regards workpeople if the ballot were adopted, 1236–1243——Contemplated consent on the part of candidates when nominated, in order that they may be deemed liable for the expenses of going to the poll, 1264–1273.

Statement relative to the present practice of recording votes at Parliamentary elections, showing the advantage anticipated from the electors polling by means of cards, to be supplied by the candidates, 1288–1302. 1338–1345——Nearly equal number of Parliamentary and of municipal voters at Warrington, 1312. 1356, 1357——Slight extent to which there has been any personation at the Warrington elections, 1313–1315——Fair wages earned by the operative class, only a very small proportion of whom are open to bribes, 1358–1366——With regard to the expense to candidates in sending out a polling card to each voter, they should, on the other hand, be relieved of the expense of polling booths, clerks, &c., 1367–1369.

Bodmin. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Willes in the matter of the Bodmin Election petition, corrupt practices not having been proved to any extent, App. 564.

Bolton. System at the Bolton municipal elections for paying the men for loss of time; belief that there has been no direct bribery, Edge 12773–12777——Considerable amount of mob intimidation at the last municipal election; voters were also kidnapped or "bottled," ib. 12778, 12779. 12786–12795. 12807, 12808——Very little intimidation at the Parliamentary elections by employers, ib. 12780–12785. 12796. 12930–12932.

him at the Parliamentary elections, Storey 2785–2790. 2801–2803. 2813–2821——Total of about 20,000 municipal voters, and 21,000 Parliamentary voters in Bradford, the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries being coterminous, ib. 2792–2794——Absence of political feeling at the municipal elections till November 1867, ib. 2795. 2826.

Statement as to the occurrence of treating and other corrupt practices at the municipal elections in 1867 and 1868; belief as to there having been some cases of bribery at the latter election, Storey 2796–2824. 2836——Frequency of personation at the municipal contests; inadequate means for its prevention, ib. 2809. 2811, 2812. 2836–2840.

Extensive treating at the Bradford municipal elections, West 2880. 2918——Frequency of fictitious nominations at the municipal elections, ib. 2986–2989——Large number of Irish voters on the municipal and Parliamentary registers, the wages of these being very low, ib. 2996. 3047–3050——Importance of increasing the number of polling places at the municipal elections, ib. 3009, 3010.

2. Parliamentary Elections.

Exercise of much intimidation at the Parliamentary elections; this is confined to the Liberal side, Storey 2829, 2830——Undue pressure brought to bear upon the small shopkeepers, ib. 2829.

Large meetings held by the Parliamentary candidates, though not necessary as a means of making public their political views, West 2872–2878——Prevalence of treating at the Parliamentary elections, ib. 2880. 2918——Exercise of intimidation on both sides, small tradesmen and shopkeepers being much subjected to undue influence, ib. 2883–2885——Great danger of a riot at the last declaration of the poll, ib. 2886.

Limited amount of corrupt practices at the Bradford Parliamentary elections, save in the shape of treating; great corruption on the latter score, West 2901–2927——Very pure character of the last Parliamentary election, ib. 2992. 2998——Exercise of undue influence at the Parliamentary elections, the small tradesmen being often put under pressure by the working men, ib. 2903. 2906. 2929–2931——State of local feeling on the subject of bribery and treating; absence of prosecutions on the subject, ib. 2919–2922. 2928. 3003–3007——Considerable amount of treating at low public-houses, used nominally as committee rooms, ib. 2938–2945.

Enormous treating at the Bradford election; great number of public-houses employed as committee rooms, Sir S. Martin 10518–10520. 10617——Failure of the allegations as to bribery at Bradford, ib. 10520.

Certificates and reports by Mr. Justice Martin in the matter of the Bradford election petitions, App. 565, 566.

Permission given for the withdrawal of one of the petitions against the return of Mr. Forster, App. 566.

Bradshaw, Job. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been several times a town councillor of Nottingham, 346, 347——Considers that the proportion of the municipal voters of the town open to bribery is much larger than one-third, 348–352. 431, 432——Statement relative to the very extensive and heavy bribery at the municipal election of 1844, from 7,000 l. to 8,000 l. having probably been spent, 353–356——Continuance of bribery in every ward in which, since 1844, there has been a contest, some of the contests being between candidates of the same political party, 357–360. 377–379.

Very few respectable persons who vote, the receipt of money being the only motive which induces the great majority to vote, 360, 361. 380, 381. 429–432——Desire of the respectable people of both political parties to see bribery suppressed, though individuals do not take active proceedings in the matter on account of the unpopularity to be experienced, 362–365. 394. 398, 399. 437——Belief that the municipal bribery arose out of the Parliamentary bribery, 366. 433–436——Origin of the municipal bribery previously to 1844, the object being to obtain political preponderance in the council, 367–370. 446–453.

Suggestion that the punishment of bribery be rendered much more simple and easy, and that for this purpose some non-local person should act as public prosecutor, 371–376. 408–419——Evidence to the effect that the ballot would operate as some check upon bribery at municipal elections at Nottingham, but that it would not be an effectual check, 382–393. 400–407. 420–426——Long period for which money has been largely spent in the Parliamentary elections at Nottingham, 395–397——Want of public reprobation of the existing practice, 420–428.

Better constitution of the town council, but that many respectable persons are deterred from becoming candidates through the corruption which prevails, 438——Conclusion as to there having been great corruption at the last Parliamentary election as well as at the municipal election just previously, 439-445——Statement that the municipal elections have no effect upon the Parliamentary elections, 442.

Brecon. Circumstance of a political meeting having been held in a Dissenting chapel at Brecon at the borough election of 1868, the minister having been present and addressed the meeting; exceptional character of this proceeding, Cheese 5059-5062. 5120-5125 5173-5177. 5208-5217——Instances at the Brecon election of 1866 of spiritual intimidation by a Dissenting minister, ib. 5067-5073. 5108, 5109. 5198-5201.

Undue payments made to agents at the Brecon election, Sir S. Martin 10672, 10673. 10676——Direct bribe proved in the case of Brecon, so that the seat was at once abandoned, ib. 10676. 10697.

Bribery:

Importance attached rather to good laws than to secret voting for prevention of bribery; in the absence of the former, witness falls back upon the latter, Barber 109, 110. 175, 176——Obstacle to bribery being suppressed by the united action of those who condemn it, 169. 180-186——Check upon bribery if the election were invalidated in the event of corrupt practices being proved, ib. 251. 328-335——Suggestion that the punishment of bribery be rendered more simple and easy, and that for this purpose some non-local person should act as public prosecutor, Bradshaw 371-376. 404-419.

The larger the constituency, the less liability to bribe, Darvill 511. 837——Liability under the present system to corrupt agreements with gangs of voters, ib. 834-836——Expediency of simplifying the proceedings in cases of bribery, and of making the offence punishable by imprisonment instead of by fine, Addyman 1410-1417. 1493-1498——Complete failure of all the Acts for the punishment of bribery and corruption, Trippier, 1834.

Beneficial effect of the last Bribery Act in restricting corrupt practices at the last Parliamentary election for Liverpool, Johnson 2080, 2081. 2163——Advantage if there were a public prosecutor as a check upon bribery at Parliamentary elections, Stanley 2214. 2264-3267. 2306-2308. 2317-2320. 2390, 2391; Johnson 2082, 2083. 2164, 2165; Davies 3735——Belief as to the salutary effect of the Corrupt Practices Act in deterring from bribery, Forwood 3474-3476; Sir S. Martin 10612-10614; Sir J. T. Willes 10819.

Want of some means of dealing with persons who engage in bribery under payment from the opposite side, with a view to evidence for a petition. Davies 3720-3725. 3733-3735——Deterrent effect if the judge at an election inquiry had power to commit for trial persons guilty of bribery, ib. 3736.

Belief that in only two of the 13 petitions tried by witness did bribery exist to any considerable extent, Sir S. Martin 10514, 10515, 10612. 10670, 10671——Statement that a voter found guilty of bribery, upon inquiry by petition, is not thereby disqualified from the franchise; approval of an alteration of the law in this respect, ib. 10629-10932——Almost total absence of bribery in the cases tried by witness, Sir J. S. Willes 10740.

Conclusions in draft report of chairman of the committee as to the prevalence of bribery at borough elections, but not at county elections, Rep. xvi, xvii.

Bridgwater. Very extensive prevalence of corrupt practices at Bridgwater, so that on witness's report a commission has been issued, Sir C. Blackburn 11956, 11957.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in the matter of the Bridgwater election petition, App. 567.

Brigg, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a manufacturer at Blackburn; concurs generally in the evidence of Mr. Johnston, 3246-3251. 3271, 3272——Great rioting at the last municipal election in witness's ward, 3252-3254. 3283-3294——Extensive prevalence of bribery at the municipal election, 3255-3259. 3273-3276——Considerable intimidation at the Parliamentary election in November, and at the preceding municipal election, 3260-3270. 3277-3280——Effectual check upon undue influence by the adoption of the ballot, 3281, 3282——Great improvement if the public-houses were closed at election time, 3295, 3296.

Bristol:

Bristol:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections:

Tolerably pure character of the municipal elections, though there is generally some treating on both sides, Bush 4162–4176. 4275–4284——Doubt as to the exercise of any undue influence by employers over their workmen, ib. 4170–4176.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Belief as to bribery being practised at the Parliamentary elections, in the shape of payments to voters or canvassers, Bush 4177–4182——Considerable amount of treating at the Parliamentary elections, ib. 4183–4189. 4285, 4286. 4398–4402——Details relative to the organised intimidation by means of paid mobs on the Liberal side at the last Parliamentary election; numerous acts of violence committed by these mobs, so that many Conservative electors were deterred from polling, ib. 4190 et seq.——Belief that there was ample ground for a petition on the score of intimidation, ib. 4211–4213. 4324, 4325.

Explanation as to some mobs having been employed by the Conservatives at the election in April 1868, in order to facilitate the polling; denial that any intimidation was practised at this election, Bush 4215, 4216. 4227–4236. 4262——Grounds for believing that the Liberal mobs at the last election were paid, ib. 4217–4221. 4237–4253. 4312–4316. 4347, 4348——Examination as to the occurrence of mob violence on the Conservative side as well as the Liberal side at the last election, ib. 4256–4262. 4363–4378——Reference to the unseating of Mr. Miles in 1868, bribery and treating having been proved, ib. 4263–4269. 4394–4402——Belief as to bribery at Bristol having greatly increased at the time of the election of Sir Morton Peto, ib. 4270–4274. 4330–4336.

Statement relative to the action of the police, and of the magistrates respectively, with reference to intimidation and riots on the part of the Liberal mob at the last election, Bush 4288 et seq.——Inadequacy of the police force for the dispersion of the mobs, ib. 4289, 4290. 4405. 4414, 4415——Impression that from 800 to 900 electors did not vote for Mr. Miles who had promised; large majority of the Liberal candidates adverted to hereon, ib. 4330. 4410–4413——Doubt as to any special precautions having been taken, though it was known beforehand that the Liberals intended to employ an organised mob, ib. 4353–4362. 4387–4393.

Witness voted at Bristol at the last election early in the day, without experiencing any obstruction, Hill 4640–4642. 4684, 4685——Strictly pure and legal principles upon which the Liberal party have conducted the elections, Thomas 5660, 5661——Refusal of the Conservative party to unite with their opponents in conducting the election in April 1868 on pure principles, ib. 5661–5665——Entirely pure conduct of the April 1868 election by the Liberals, ib. 5666, 5667. 5672. 5682——Statement as to the inaccuracy of Major Bush's evidence relative to the employment of hired and organised mobs by the Liberals at the November 1868 election, ib. 5668–5671. 5673–5678.

Inaccuracy of Major Bush's statement, that at the election in November Conservative voters were intimidated and prevented from polling by the Liberal mob, Thomas 5673. 5723–5738. 5752——Circumstance of the sheriff (a Conservative) having decided that there was nothing to prevent the polling, ib. 5673. 5747——Explanation as to some Liberal tea meetings, that the expense was paid by the working men, ib. 5673. 5708, 5709——Large number of roughs hired by the Conservatives at the last two elections; great abuse in this respect at the April 1868 election, ib. 5679, 5680. 5687–5689. 5693, 5694.

Very extensive treating and bribery on the Conservative side at the election in April 1868; Thomas 5681–5688. 5748, 5749. 5753——Decided deprecation by the Liberal party of the use of mobs, ib. 5689. 5764——Examination upon the question whether an enormous expense was not incurred in respect of Sir Morton Peto's election, ib. 5695–5705——Refusal of Sir Morton Peto's committees to pay certain bills for breakfasts, ib. 5705–5707.

Further denial that at the November 1868 election any mob was paid by the Liberal committees; examination hereon as to certain demands made for payment, and as to such payment having been made through agents from London, Thomas 5710–5722. 5742–5746——Excessive timidity owing to which a Conservative voter named Kearsey did not poll, ib. 5730–5737——Belief that the total expenses of the Liberal candidates at the last election were about 4,000*l.* to 5,000*l.*, ib. 5739–5746——Illustration of the more riotous character of the Conservative mob than of the Liberal mob at the November 1868 election, ib. 5750, 5751.

Bush, Major Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is member of the town council of Bristol: has taken an active part in the Parliamentary elections, 4158–4161. 4222–4225 ——Tolerably pure character of the municipal elections, 4162–4176. 4275–4284—— Doubt as to the exercise of any undue influence by employers over their workmen, 4170–4176——Belief as to bribery being practised at the Parliamentary elections, 4177–4182——Considerable amount of treating at the Parliamentary elections, 4183–4189. 4285, 4286. 4398–4402.

Details relative to the organised intimidation by means of paid mobs on the Liberal side at the last Parliamentary election, 4190 et seq.——Explanation as to some mobs having been employed by the Conservatives at the election in April 1868; 4215, 4216. 4227–4236. 4262——Grounds for believing that the Liberal mobs at the last election were paid, 4217–4221. 4237–4253. 4312–4316. 4347, 4348.

Examination as to the occurrence of mob violence on the Conservative side as well as the Liberal side at the last election, 4256–4262. 4363–4378——Reference to the unseating of Mr. Miles in 1868, bribery and treating having been proved, 4263–4269. 4394–4402 ——Belief as to bribery at Bristol having greatly increased at the time of the election of Sir Morton Peto, 4270–4274. 4330–4336.

Statement relative to the action of the police and of the magistrates respectively with reference to the intimidation and riots on the part of the Liberal mobs at the last election, 4288 et seq.——Doubt as to any special precautions having been taken though it was known beforehand that the Liberals intended to employ an organised mob, 4353–4362. 4387–4393.

Approval of public-houses being closed at election time, 4403, 4404——Probable advantage if a system of voting papers were adopted, 4407. 4416–4422——Advantage of doing away with the public nomination of candidates, 4407–4409——Opinion as to the inadequacy of the ballot as a means of preventing riot or intimidation, or treating, 4423–4428——General feeling of Conservatives at Bristol opposed to secret voting: doubt, moreover, as to the ballot having grown in favour with the Liberals, 4423, 4424. 4428–4436.

Butler, The Right Rev. George, D.D. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, 11490—— Inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. Spaight that witness took an active part in the last election for Limerick, and was about the town in his carriage on the polling day, 11491–11498. 11558–11564. 11567–11569. 11701, 11702 ——Support given by the Conservatives to Mr. Pigott, 11499–11502——Very exaggerated character of a statement by Mr. Spaight as to the injury done to his house at the election in 1865; 11503–11505——Employment of rival mobs at the last election, a Tory mob having first appeared on the nomination day, 11506–11510.

Explanation as to the Roman Catholic priests sometimes recommending refreshments to be given to the people; denial that they cause abuse in the way of dispensing drink, 11511–11514——Very active interference of the priests when there is some great principle at stake in the elections, as when the question is between Protestant ascendancy and religious equality: justification of such interference, 11515–11520. 11585 et seq.—— ——Action of the priests with a view to the people voting according to their convictions, and independently of bribery or landlord intimidation, 11515, 11516. 11519. 11553—— Great reluctance with which the priests interfere in political contests, 11517.

Decided approval of the ballot in Ireland, as a preventive to bribery and landlord intimidation, 11521–11523. 11555——Probability of the priests withdrawing very much from politics if there were the ballot: they would, however, still urge upon the people the duty of exercising the franchise, 11524. 11552, 11553. 11670. 11710, 11711——Statement to the effect that under the ballot the confessional would not be used by the priest as a means of discovering how a man had voted, nor could the priest divulge any information so obtained, 11523–11534. 11539–11551. 11583, 11584. 11647–11658.

Impression among the people that the military are used by Tory Governments for purposes of coercion at the elections, 11535–11538——Improbability of the people not maintaining secrecy about their votes if they had the ballot, 11554——Misfortune entailed by the franchise as involving possible eviction, 11556——Doubt as to the part taken by the priests in the polling booths at the last Limerick election, 11565, 11566.

Examination relative to some orders for drink given by priests at the Limerick election of 1865; question considered whether this practice should not meet with witness's disapproval, 11570–11582.

Examination in detail upon the question whether the priests are justified in exercising their spiritual influence from the altar and otherwise, with reference to the exercise of the franchise; argument in justification of their course of action in the matter, 11585 et seq.; 11696–11700.

Occasional disorder at Limerick elections through the meeting of opposing canvassing parties, 11663–11665——Advantage if the priests could conscientiously abstain from taking part in the turmoil of elections, 11666–11670——Instance of disorder at a municipal cipal election in Limerick; doubt, however, as to any pressing necessity for the ballot at municipal elections, 11671–11679.

Doubt as to the necessity of escorts in order to enable men to vote with their landlords, if so disposed conscientiously; danger, however, in times of excitement in dispensing with troops, 11685–11689 —— Notoriety of the fact, that when Roman Catholic tenants vote against the Liberal party, it is against their own convictions, 11690–11695 —— Absence of any necessity for troops at the elections if there were the ballot, 11703 —— Opinion as to the sufficiency of the number of polling-places in Limerick, 11704–11709.

Butler, John Sanders. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a town councillor of Nottingham; has for many years taken an active part in the conduct of municipal elections in support of his own political party, 454–458 —— Particulars relative to the extent of bribery at the municipal elections, and the sums paid, there being no contest without bribery, 459–479 —— Form of voting paper filled up by the electors, 463 —— Money has not passed through witness's hands in bribery, but he knows it to have been paid, 466–470.

Suggestion as regards Parliamentary elections, that no voter's name should appear on the register more than once, 480 —— Sundry suggestions for simplifying the conduct of municipal elections, and for lessening the expense, 482 —— Importance of preventing house-to-house canvassing, as being a great cause of bribery, 482, 483 —— Objection to the publication of the state of the poll till the final close of the poll, ib. —— Disapproval of the conveyance of voters to the poll, 482 —— Proposal that candidates be nominated by nomination papers, signed by two electors, and by the candidate accepting the nomination, ib.

C.

Cambridge. Effect of the system of open voting at Cambridge, in deterring many Liberal voters from polling; removal of this fear if the ballot were adopted, Torrens 8758. 8886–8890 —— Universal feeling of the Liberal party at Cambridge, that the ballot would stop bribery there, ib. 8891–8893.

Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of the sitting members, App. 567, 568.

Candidates. Belief as to the general desire of the candidates in the cases before witness' not to incur corrupt expenditure, Sir S. Martin 10543 —— Very little importance attached to the declarations of purity by candidates before commencing to canvass, Sir C. Blackburn 12012.

CANVASSING:

Advantage if canvassing at municipal elections could be stopped, Barber 319–327. 337–339 —— Importance of preventing house-to-house canvassing at municipal elections, as being a great cause of bribery, Butler 482, 483 —— Expediency of a prohibition of domiciliary or systematic canvassing for candidates, unless carried out by authorised agents, Darvill 592–612. 680–684. 701–709 —— Evidence in favour of a prohibition upon canvassing at municipal elections; that is, systematic canvassing, Trippier 1662, 1663. 1724–1732. 1804–1814.

Approval of a prohibition upon the employment of paid canvassers at Parliamentary elections, Johnson 2093-2109; Latham 6488 —— Importance of volunteer canvassing, as at Liverpool; paid canvassing might be prohibited, Forwood 3384–3392. 3436 —— Objection to personal canvassing by the candidate, ib. 3393 —— Importance of limiting the time allowed for canvassing, a protracted canvass causing much evil, Davies 3698. 3706–3711. 3804–3806. 3822.

Advantage if paid agents for canvassing could be done away with, Cheese 5138 —— Approval of personal canvassing being made illegal, as conducing to the employment of mobs, Murphy 5431–5334 —— Importance of abolishing canvassing in connection with the adoption of the ballot, Harris 6340. 6349-6354 —— Suggestion that paid canvassing might with advantage be forbidden, Sir S. Martin 10589–10591.

Resolution submitted by Mr. Fawcett for prohibiting the employment of paid canvassers and agents, Rep. xiv.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee unfavourable to the prohibition of paid canvassing, Rep. xix.

Cardiff. Witness voted at the last election at Cardiff, but was seriously assaulted by the Liberal mob; submits particulars relative to the violence of the mob, and states that many of the supporters of the Conservative candidate were intimidated from voting, Hill 4643 et seq. —— On the nomination day there was an organised mob in the Liberal interest, ib. 4654. 4678 —— Active part taken in the Cardiff election by the Dissenting ministers, and by the clergy generally, ib. 4668–4672. 4679–4683. 4692–4694 —— Valuable services of the Cardiff police and the Bute police at the election, ib. 4688–4690.

Cardiganshire. Nonconformist character of the great bulk of the people in Cardiganshire the great majority of them being Liberals, whilst the landlords are nearly all Conservatives, Harris 6209–6212——Great coercion used at the last election for the county by the landowners, such coercion having been shown in various forms, ib. 6213–6222——Belief in the county that about 200 notices to quit have been served on tenants on account of their votes at the last election, ib. 6223.

Inquiry made by witness in various parts of the county on the subject of notices to quit: particular cases submitted to the Committee, in proof of the undue influence exercised by the landlords, Harris 6224 et seq.; 6297–6299. 6390–6400——Active influence exercised by the Dissenting clergy in the elections, and also by the clergy of the Established Church; witness is not aware of any undue influence by the former, ib. 6284–6296——Belief that the Conservative candidate, instead of polling 1,918 votes, would not have polled more than 500 if the ballot had been in operation, ib. 6341–6345.

CARLISLE:

1. Evidence in support of a Charge of Undue Influence on the part of Mr. Hodgson at the last Election for the Borough.
2. Evidence in Denial of the foregoing Charge.

1. Evidence in support of a Charge of Undue Influence on the part Mr. Hodgson at the last Election for the Borough:

Total of 154 electors in the employment of the London and North Western Railway Company at Carlisle at the time of the last election, 136 of whom plumped for Mr. Hodgson, Irving 9361, 9362——Evidence in support of the conclusion that these men were for the most part Liberals, and were unduly influenced to vote for Mr. Hodgson, who is a director of the railway company, ib. 9363 et seq.——Particulars relative to a mechanics' institute in connection with the workshops of the company, in which, out of seven daily papers taken in, six are Liberal; inference as to the great majority of the voters in the works being Liberals, ib. 9365-9368. 9414-9417. 9462-9472——Statement relative to the canvass of the men in the works, and the improper course taken by Mr. Hodgson, as being a director, in personally canvassing them on one occasion, ib. 9369 et seq.

Discharge after the election of five men out of six who had voted against Mr. Hodgson, whilst a very small proportion was discharged who voted for him; details on this subject, Irving 9372. 9383-9387. 9395. 9418–9430. 9435-9461. 9473-9481——Statement issued by some of the men in the works on the nomination day denying certain allegations in respect of their canvass by Mr. Hodgson; inaccuracy of this statement, ib. 9378. 9380. 9485-9489——Circumstance of the directors of the North Western Company having declined any interference on the question of their workmen's votes; comment on their proceedings on the subject, ib. 9388-9394. 9431–9438——Satisfactory notice issued by the North Eastern Company, prohibiting canvassing at their Carlisle works; result as regards the voting of the men, ib. 9391. 9396–9398. 9439–9453——Circumstance of three men at the London and North Western Company's works having preferred disfranchisement rather than bear coercion, ib. 9398.

Witness submits that the great majority of the men in the railway works are Liberals, and that it was owing to undue influence so many of them voted for Mr. Hodgson at the borough election, Corbett 1269 et seq.——In canvassing the men in the works Mr. Hodgson did not use any undue influence; but his presence there as a director had a powerful influence over the men, ib. 12643-12646. 12717-12722——Particular instances of men who felt coerced into voting for Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12647-12658. 12708–12716——Accuracy of Mr. Irving's statement relative to the political character of the papers taken in at the reading room at the works, ib. 12663, 12664.

Grounds for the conclusion that the meeting recently called at the works was far from unanimous in protesting against Mr. Irving's evidence; undue pressure put upon witness to attend this meeting, though he declined to do so, Corbett 12665–12692. 12702, 12703. 12754–12763——Information relative to the dismissal of men after the election; conclusion as to the great prejudice shown towards those who voted against Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12693–12707. 12735–12743——Statement relative to the constitution of the reading-room or institute attached to the works; large proportion of the voters in the works who are not now members, though formerly membership was compulsory, ib. 12725–12734——Belief that the majority of the workmen concur in the evidence given by Mr. Irving, ib. 12750–12753.

Explanation that many of the voters in the railway works are not now members of the institute, though formerly all the men were necessarily members, Irving 12764–12766——Recent date at which a second Conservative paper has been taken in at the institute, ib. 12766.

2. Evidence in Denial of the foregoing Charge:

Witness explains the circumstances under which, very reluctantly, he canvassed the voters in the Company's works; positively denies that he used any pressure or undue influence influence in respect of their votes, Hodgson 12377 et seq.——Denial also that the reduction of the establishment at Carlisle, involving the dismissal of several voters who polled against witness, had any connection with the election, ib. 12391–12411. 12421–12441——Statement as to the great majority of the men in the Maryport and Carlisle Railway, at Carlisle, having voted for Sir Wilford Lawson, who is a director of the railway, ib. 12419, 12420——Large majority of the men in the employment of the corporation who voted against witness, ib. 12420——Admission as to the very large majority of the North Western Company's men having voted for witness, ib. 12421, 12422.

Unwillingness of Mr. Hodgson to canvass the men in the Carlisle works of the London and North Western Railway Company, he being a director of the Company; representations by witness and others which induced him to visit the works, Armstrong 12445–12448. 12502, 12503——Strong disposition evinced by these men to support Mr. Hodgson, who is very popular with them; great majority who eventually voted for him, ib. 12449-12452. 12480–12487. 12500–12505. 12534–12536——Particulars relative to the canvass of the men in the railway works by Mr. Hodgson, witness, and others; entire absence of any pressure by Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12457 et seq.

Circumstance of the men having recently passed a resolution condemnatory of Mr. Irving's evidence before the Committee, Armstrong 12459. 12468–12471——Denial that witness has dismissed workmen on account of their votes, ib. 12493–12499——Large majority of the men in the employment of the corporation who voted against Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12506–12513——Large majority also of the men at the gasworks, which belong to the corporation, who voted for the Liberal candidates, ib. 12510–12515. 12531–12533——Statement also as to the men at the works of Mr. Ferguson and other Liberal employers having nearly all voted against Mr. Hodgson; inference therefrom, ib. 12516–12530. 12537–12540.

Particulars relative to a meeting of the Company's men at the Carilsle works recently called, in order to repudiate the evidence of Mr. Irving, that they had been unduly influenced by Mr. Hodgson in respect of their votes at the borough election; unanimity at this meeting, which was attended by about 140 men, Richardson 12542–12555. 12559. 12572–12575. 12593–12600. 12608–12637——Frequent statement by Mr. Hodgson when canvassing the men, that they were at liberty to vote as they pleased, ib. 12556–12558——Belief as to the political opinion of the Company's men being fairly represented by the large majority which voted for Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12560–12571. 12601–12604——Statement as to witness's wages having been stopped for a week when canvassing for Mr. Hodgson, ib. 12576–12582. 12558–12592——Reference to the temporary dismissal of a workman named M'Grath as not having been owing to his vote at the election, ib. 12605–12607. 12616–12619.

Carlow. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return for Carlow borough, App. 581.

Carmarthenshire. Strong and undue influence exercised by the dissenting clergy at the Carmarthenshire election in November 1868, Cheese 5064–5066. 5075, 5076. 5167.

Evidence as to the extensive pressure put upon the tenants at the Carmarthenshire election; illustrations of this and of the issue of notices to quit in respect of their votes, Harris 6300-6319. 6357–6359.

Carrickfergus. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice O'Brien in the matter of the Carrickfergus election petition, App. 582.

Cheese, Arthur. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Solicitor at Hay, in Breconshire; was professionally engaged at the Brecon elections of 1866 and 1868, and the Carmarthenshire election of 1868; 5047–5052——Great interest taken by the clergy of all denominations in Wales in the last election, 5053–5057. 5170——Peculiarly active interest taken by the dissenting clergy in the Liberal cause; sundry instances of this, 5058 et seq.——Instances of dissenting ministers having acted as paid agents, 5058. 5065——Circumstance of a political meeting having been held in a dissenting chapel at Brecon at the borough election of 1868, the minister having been present and addressed the meeting; exceptional character of this proceeding, 5059–5062. 5120–5125. 5173–5177. 5208–5217.

Strong and undue influence exercised by the dissenting clergy at the Carmarthenshire election in November 1868; 5064–5066. 5075, 5076. 5167——Instances at the Brecon election of 1866 of spiritual intimidation by a dissenting minister, 5067–5073. 5108, 5109. 5198–5201——Evidence to the effect that Conservative landlords do not exercise undue influence over their tenants as to their votes, though they generally express a wish on the subject, 5077–5081. 5126–5134. 5164–5169.

Statement that, though having considerable experience as a land agent, witness knows no instance of tenants having suffered through voting in opposition to their landlords, 5077, 5078. 5168, 5169——Absence of any general feeling among farmers in Wales in favour of the ballot, 5082–5084——Grounds for concluding that the ballot would not have the effect of securing secrecy, 5085–5088. 5098. 5135. 5223——Advantage if the voters could poll parochially, instead of travelling a distance for the purpose, 5089–5101.

Statement as to the influence exercised by the dissenting clergy in Wales at the elections being of a much stronger and more objectionable character than that exercised by the clergy or the Church of England, 5102 et seq. 5196, 5197——Explanation that the Wesleyans do not interfere in the same way as other dissenting bodies, 5120——Objection to the influence exercised by the dissenting clergy as compared with the landlord's influence, 5121–5134. 5137–5143. 5163–5169. 5206, 5207. 5218–5221——Belief that the ballot would be no disadvantage to the Conservative party, 5136. 5224, 5225——Doubt as to the ballot having any effect in Wales in preventing spiritual influence, 5137. 5202–5205. 5222. 5226, 5227——Advantage if paid agents for canvassing could be done away with, 5138.

Exceptional instances of bribery at elections in Wales; few petitions consequent on the last general election, 5144–5156. 5161, 5162. 5189–5191——Statement as to the extent to which bribery has prevailed at the Brecon elections, 5145–5154. 5162. 5192–5195——Pure character of the late election for the Radnor contributory boroughs, 5155, 5156——Considerable amount of treating or drinking riots sometimes resulting, 5157–5160——Peculiar susceptibility of the Welsh in respect of religious influences, 5178. 5188——Safeguards required in connection with a system of voting papers; doubt as to much abuse arising, 5179–5187.

CHELTENHAM:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections:

Local government of Cheltenham by a body of Improvement Commissioners, thirty in number, ten of whom go out every year, Davies 3627–3635——Statement of the qualifications of electors of the Commissioners, owners as well as occupiers or ratepayers being entitled to vote, and there being a plurality of votes under Sturges Bourne's Act, ib. 3637–3644——Varying composition of the constituency in the different wards, ib. 3645–3648.

Very strong political feeling in the election of Commissioners, whilst much corruption has prevailed in the shape of treating, personation, and intimidation, Davies 3649 et seq.——Considerable corruption of late years in the shape of beer tickets, ib. 3651–3654——There is always mob intimidation in the east and north wards, ib. 3657, 3658. 3684——System of voting at the municipal elections by means of voting papers, ib. 3660, 3661.

Deterioration in the class of persons who become candidates for Commissionerships, persons of good position being unwilling to canvass for the office, Davies 3662–3667——Strong political bias shown in the appointment of officers by the Commissioners and by the officers themselves; instances of this, ib. 3668–3674——Excessive political corruption at the elections in 1866 and 1867 in the shape of beer tickets, ib. 3675–3678——Connection between the election of Commissioners in the autumn of 1868 and the following parliamentary election, ib. 3679–3681.

Operation of Sturges Bourne's Act at Cheltenham adverted to, Davies 3729–3732——Statement as regards certain misconduct on the part of officers at municipal elections at Cheltenham, that this could not have been discovered under the ballot, ib. 3737–3745——Blame attaching to the candidates at municipal elections and to their agents, ib. 3770–3790——Limited extent to which pressure is put upon tradesmen by their customers in respect of their votes, ib. 3791–3797.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Less terrorism at the Parliamentary elections than at the municipal elections, Davies 3684, 3685. 3715. 3799, 3800——Doubt as to treating, bribery, or intimidation being practised to much extent at the Parliamentary elections, ib. 3713–3716——Comparatively few of the higher class at Cheltenham who interest themselves in the Parliamentary elections, ib. 3823——Very full polling of the constituency at the last election, ib. 3824–3826.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin in the matter of the Cheltenham election petition, App. 568.

Chippenham. Serious disturbances at the Chippenham election of 1865, about fifty houses of Conservative voters having been attacked and damaged, Colborne 4699-4705—— Several claims made for compensation for damages, not a single claim having been allowed, ib. 4706-4708—— Punishment of several of the rioters after the election, ib. 4709, 4710 —— Denial as regards the riots at Chippenham, that these were owing to any intimidation having been resorted to in the case of Sir John Neeld's tenants, ib. 4767-4775.

Statement as regards the Liberal riots at the Chippenham election of 1865, that these were provoked by the conduct of the opposite side, Collen 4940-4952. 5030-5035—— Strong feeling at Chippenham as to intimidation and undue influence being exercised by certain Conservative landlords in respect of their tenants' votes; good grounds for this feeling, ib. 4949 et seq.——Particulars in connection with several notices to quit which were served upon tenants who had voted on the Liberal side, ib. 4958 et seq. 5040-5042.

Explanation as to there having been no petition against the return for Chippenham in 1868, notwithstanding the undue influence exercised on the Conservative side, Collen 5025-5029. 5036—— Belief that there was treating at the election of 1868; ib. 5027—— —— Very little bribery at the elections, ib. 5039.

City of London. Explanation of the system of nomination and election of aldermen, common councillors, and ward officers for the City, there being special Acts for the purpose, Woodthorpe 948-959. 989 et seq.——System of an open poll for the municipal elections, no voting papers being used, ib. 957-959——Conclusion as to the pure manner in which the municipal elections are conducted, neither bribery nor intimidation having ever come to witness's knowledge, ib. 960, 961. 971-977. 1018, 1019.

Statement of the qualification of liverymen of the City of London, and of their number; restriction as to number in the case only of some of the companies, Woodthorpe 962-966, 1024-1031——Total of about 12,000 municipal electors, and of about 18,000 Parliamentary electors, ib. 967, 968—— Respectable position occupied by most of the municipal voters, ib. 969, 970—— Witness is not cognizant of any bribery at the Parliamentary elections for the City, ib. 978-981.

Statement of the qualifications for the office of common councilman, Woodthorpe 994-996——Right of the liverymen to vote at the Parliamentary elections, if they be freemen of the City, ib. 997-1000—— Further explanation of the mode of election of the Lord Mayor, aldermen, common councilmen, &c.; the system works exceedingly well, ib. 1001-1016——Belief that politics do not enter into the municipal elections, ib. 1020-1023.

Clergy. Suggested enactment that the clergy of all persuasions be prohibited from interfering in elections as agents, Norwood 8130-8132.

Colborne, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Solicitor at Newport in Monmouthshire; formerly resided at Chippenham, 4695-4698—— Serious disturbances at the Chippenham election of 1865, about 50 houses of Conservative voters having been attacked and damaged, 4699-4705——Several claims made for compensation for damage, not a single claim having been allowed, 4706-4708——Punishment of several of the rioters after the election, 4709, 4710——Very excited and disturbed state of Newport at the last election for the Monmouth boroughs, serious damage having been done to Conservatives houses, and much intimidation exercised, 4711-4723——Numerous claims at Newport for compensation, none of which were allowed, 4721, 4722. 4724.

Particulars relative to the riotous proceedings at Tredegar, Pontypopl, Abersychan, and Blaenavon, on the occasion of the last election for Monmouthshire; great damage done to several houses, 4725-4746——Statement of the actual amounts claimed for damages, and of the amounts allowed against the hundred or district, 4730-4737——Very defective and anomalous state of the law as to compensation for damages at elections, 4747——Advantage if those who aggravate or foster riotous proceedings by mobs, could in some way be made responsible; suggestion whether the candidate in whose behalf such acts are committed, should not be liable to lose his seat, 4747-4754. 4776-4794.

Advantage if the polling places in Monmouthshire were not close to the large works, 4749——Conclusion that the ballot would not have had the slightest effect in diminishing the riots in the county, 4754-4759——Doubt as to any coercion of tenants by Conservative landlords, though a charge was made to that effect, 4760-4762. 4795, 4796. 4802. Belief that the riots in the county were due chiefly to political religious rancour; statement hereon as to the part taken in the election by Dissenting ministers and the clergy generally, 4762. 4837-4850.

Denial that at the election for the Monmouth boroughs the riots originated through any electors having been "bottled," 4763-4766—— Denial, also, as regards the riots at Chippenham that they were owing to any intimidation having been resorted to in the case of Sir John Neeld's tenants, 4767-4775——Very large number of attorneys employed on the Conservative side at the election for the county, 4797–4801——Heavy expenses of the Conservative candidates; explanation upon some of the items, 4803–4809.

Effect of the public nomination of candidates in aggravating disturbances, 4810——Considerable expense for polling places at the Monmouthshire election, 4811——Trouble and expense owing to the sudden nomination of candidates, these frequently not going to the poll; remedies suggested for this evil, 4812-4836.

Collen, Daniel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides at Chippenham, 4939——Statement as regards the Liberal riots at the Chippenham election of 1865, that these were provoked by the conduct of the opposite side, 4940-4952. 5030-5035——Strong feeling at Chippenham as to intimidation and undue influence being exercised by certain Conservative landlords in respect of their tenants' votes; good grounds for this feeling, 4949 et seq.——Particulars in connection with several notices to quit which were served upon tenants who had voted on the Liberal side, 4958 et seq.; 5040–5042.

Explanation as to there having been no petition against the return for Chippenham in 1868, notwithstanding the undue influence exercised on the Conservative side, 5025–5029. 5039——Belief that the ballot is the only remedy for the evils which prevail at the Chippenham elections, 5037–5039——Tendency of the ballot to prevent riots, as the people would have faith in the fairness of the election, 5044–5046.

Commissions of Inquiry. Exception taken to the section of the Act relating to the issuing of a commission when there have been excessive corrupt practices at any place, Sir J. S. Willes 10797.

Committee-rooms. Undue number of committee-rooms at borough elections, Sir C. Blackburn 12081.——See also Public Houses.

Compensation for Damages. Very defective and anomalous state of the law as to compensation for damages at elections, Colborne 4747.

Resolution to be proposed by Mr. Hardy on the subject of compensation for damages, Rep. xiv.

Corbett, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is employed in the London and North Western Railway Company's works at Carlisle, 12638——Submits that the great majority of the men in these works are Liberals, and that it was owing to undue influence so many of them voted for Mr. Hodgson at the borough election, 12639 et seq.——In canvassing the men in the works Mr. Hodgson did not use any undue influence, but his presence there as a director had a powerful influence upon the men, 12643–12646. 12717–12722.

Particular instances of men who felt coerced into voting for Mr. Hodgson, 12647–12658. 12708–12716——Accuracy of Mr. Irving's statement relative to the political character of the papers taken in at the reading-room at the works, 12663, 12664——Grounds for the conclusion that the meeting recently called at the works was far from unanimous in protesting against Mr. Irving's evidence; undue pressure put upon witness to attend this meeting, though he declined to do so, 12665–12692. 12702, 12703. 12754–12763.

Information relative to the dismissal of men after the election; conclusion as to the great prejudice shown towards those who voted against Mr. Hodgson, 12693-12707. 12735–12743——Statement relative to the constitution of the reading room or institute attached to the works; large proportion of the voters in the works who are not now members, though formerly membership was compulsory, 12725–12734——Belief that the majority of the workmen concur in the evidence given by Mr. Irving, 12750–12753.

Darnton, Henry Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is mayor of Ashton-under-Lyne, 3516——Statement to the effect that treating has been practised by Conservatives as well as by Liberals at the Ashton municipal elections, and that Mr. Hampson's evidence on this subject is inaccurate, 3517-3527——Information relative to the large number of public-houses and beerhouses engaged by the Conservative party at the last Parliamentary election: unduly large sum paid on this side for hire of rooms as compared with the payments on the Liberal side, 3519-3546. 3558-3566. 3603-3610.

Great excitement at the last Parliamentary election, 3519——Conclusion as to the inaccuracy of the charge that servants of the corporation had been unduly influenced by the corporation, in respect of their votes, 3519. 3521. 3575. 3620-3625——Equal number of Conservatives and of Liberals on the town council, the aldermen, however, being all Liberals, 3520, 3521——Prevalence of much violence and drunkenness at the municipal elections in former years; doubt as to bribery having been resorted to, 3521-3525. 3527.

Improvement as regards the municipal elections since the passing of Mr. Assheton Cross's Act, though it has not prevented treating or personation, 3547-3552——Want of some independent authority at Ashton for putting the law in force when personation and treating are practised at the municipal elections; great improvement if there were a stipendiary magistrate for dealing with such matters, 3552, 3553. 3576-3602. 3611-3619——Approval of the defeated municipal candidate being empowered to hold the seat if by a scrutiny he can prove corrupt practices on the part of the successful candidate, 3554-3557. 3567-3571.

Doubt as to the extent to which intimidation by masters may have been practised at the last Parliamentary election, 3572-3574——Equal intensity of party feeling at the municipal elections as in former years, 3576-3581——Failure of the present system, as regards the action of the magistrates or the town council for the suppression of corrupt practices, the appointment of an independent authority being very desirable, 3582-3602. 3611-3619——Necessity of a public prosecutor as well as a stipendiary magistrate, 3618.

Darvill, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is town clerk of Windsor; has had thirty years' experience of municipal elections, 484, 485——Belief that not only at Windsor, but in most other boroughs, a practice prevails of paying men for their day's work for voting, 486-493——Majority of Liberal electors at Windsor, so that bribery is resorted to by the other side, 492, 493. 543-545. 569-582——Frequent intimidation at municipal elections at Windsor, 494——Liability of the voting papers to be tampered with, 494-496. 517, 518——Peaceable conduct of the Windsor elections, 497——Estimate of from fifty to sixty voters as the number that would expect payment for their votes, the total number being about 630; 498, 499. 540-542.

Conclusion that when the Parliamentary election closely follows the municipal election, the former is affected by the latter, 501, 502——Explanation as to the penalty for bribery at municipal elections being inoperative at Windsor, 502-506. 519. 817-825——Grounds for suggesting that a residence of only twelve months should be sufficient as regards the municipal franchise, 507-510——Effect of increasing the number of electors in diminishing bribery, 511——Opinion that at the last Parliamentary election for Windsor 100 people were bribed, 512. 790. 807.

Improvement if, in lieu of the system of voting papers, personal voting were adopted for municipal elections, 513-515. 517, 518——Statement that witness, though opposed to the ballot all his life, has of late become convinced that it is the only remedy against bribery, corruption, and intimidation, 515, 516. 529. 532-535. 561-563. 635-637—— Increased facilities required for the disqualification of town councillors, returned by means of bribery committed by themselves or by agents, 519-528——Proposed trial of petitions before a county court judge, duly empowered for the purpose, 519. 549-552——Suggested definition of the term "agent," 527. 592-598——Proposed penalty in the case of persons acting as agents, or as canvassers, without authority, 528. 701-709.

Expediency of increased facilities for the prevention of treating, 529——Suggestion that town councillors and their agents be required to make a return on oath relative to the expenses and liabilities, 530. 532. 661-664——Belief that the returns made by agents for Parliamentary expenses are a perfect farce, 530——Probability of some of the municipal elections at Windsor costing a candidate 50*l.*; 531, 532——Several sources of expense at municipal and Parliamentary elections which would be checked by the ballot, 536-539.

Statement on the subject of the respectable townspeople at Windsor not taking legal proceedings for the punishment and prevention of bribery at the municipal elections; inference as to the expediency of its being some one's business to initiate proceedings, 546-560. 583-591. 710-722——Advantage of a public prosecutor with reference to cases of bribery, 548. 710-722——Belief that large numbers are now favourable to the ballot who formerly were opposed to it, 561——Improved chances of candidates of high character, if the ballot be adopted, 564-568.

Corrupt system of annual gratuities in force for many years at Windsor, with reference to the Parliamentary and municipal elections, 570-576. 669-672. 685——Purchase of cottage property at Windsor, with reference to the Parliamentary elections, the occupiers being intimidated as to their votes; removal of this abuse under the protection of the ballot, 576, 577. 607-610. 614-624. 674-676——Expediency of a prohibition of domiciliary or systematic canvassing for candidates, unless carried out by authorised agents, 592-612. 680-684. 701-709.

Examination opposed to the view that secret voting is incompatible with the system of authorised canvassing, and with the practice of public political discussion, previous to elections, 599 et seq.——Question considered whether lying and evasion would not be increased by the ballot; there is a great deal of lying at present, but evasion would probably be increased, 607-624.

Opinion that under the ballot the uncertainty as to the way in which men, though bribed, might vote, would in time prevent candidates from risking their money, 638-656 ——Statement of the obstacles to candidates, or their agents, making corrupt agreements with a body of electors for paying them after the election on condition of success, 639-673. 728-742. 781-805. 862——Further objection to the system of voting papers, as affording opportunities both for tampering and intimidation, 686-690. 700. 777-780.

Suggestions for the detailed carrying out of the system of ballot; objection hereon to the plan adopted in Australia, 691-699——Disapproval of paid canvassing, 707—— Further consideration of the circumstance of there having been no prosecutions on the part of the respectable inhabitants of Windsor in respect of bribery, both at municipal and Parliamentary elections, 710-722. 762-768. 810-825——Belief as to there having been much bribery at the Windsor municipal election in November last, 723. 724—— Probability of more importance being attached to municipal elections, now that the constituency has been assimilated to the Parliamentary constituency, 725.

Importance of a public inquiry further adverted to with reference to municipal elections, 726——Refusal of many tradespeople and others at Windsor to vote, through fear of giving offence, 727——Belief that the ballot would not lead to any increase of personation, 743-746. 826——Objection to the whole constituency being required to vote, as a public duty, 747, 748——Origin of the municipal corruption at Windsor further adverted to, 749-755——Very little interest taken in the municipal elections by many of the more respectable residents, 756-761.

Several election petitions from Windsor, in respect of different contests for the borough, 762-768——Explanation as to an inquiry not having been instituted with respect to bribery by Mr. Gardner at the last election, 768. 810-816——Gradual change of witness's opinions on the subject of the ballot, which he now believes to be the only effectual remedy for intimidation and bribery, 769-772——Grounds for the conclusion that all returns of election expenses are perfectly illusory, 773-776. 806.

Conclusion that immorality is at least as great under the system of open voting, as under the ballot, 827-833——Liability under the present system to corrupt agreements with gangs of voters, 834-836——The larger the constituency the less liability to bribe, 837——Equal means of preventing personation under the ballot, as under the present system, 838-840——Belief that public discussion would be increased rather than diminished, if the ballot were adopted, 841-845.

Full exercise of legitimate and moral influence under the plan of secret voting, 846-850——Frequent instances of coercive and mandatory canvassing, which would not occur if if the electors had the protection of the ballot, 851–856. 873–875——Decided advance of the movement at Windsor in favour of secret voting, 857——Desire expressed for the ballot by some of the most respectable Conservatives at Windsor, 858——Belief that by the ballot political morality will be restored to the town, 859.

Conclusion as to its being perfectly feasible to keep the voting secret where there is the ballot; practice in foreign countries adverted to hereon, 860, 861. 881–884——Doubt as to the present system being any check upon factory operatives voting against their known opinions, through fear of being twitted and reproached by their fellow workmen, 863–872——Probability of those voters at Windsor, &c., now open to bribes, polling according to their conscience if they could not get money, 876–878.

Effect of the ballot in checking domiciliary canvassing, 885–887——Absence of any instances of vexatious nomination for the town council of Windsor, 888–890. 894, 895——Important benefits anticipated from closing public-houses on election days, though it would be an unpopular measure, 891–893.

Davies, Henry. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a publisher at Cheltenham, and conducts one of the local journals, 3626——Local government of Cheltenham by a body of Improvement Commissioners, thirty in number, ten of whom go out every year, 3627–3635——Statement of the qualifications of electors of the commissioners, owners as well as occupiers or ratepayers being entitled to vote, and there being a plurality of votes under Sturges Bourne's Act, 3637–3644——Varying composition of the constituency in the different wards, 3645–3648——Very strong political feeling in the election of commissioners, whilst much corruption has prevailed in the shape of treating, personation, and intimidation, 3649 et seq.

Unsatisfactory result of the right of women to vote at the municipal elections, 3659. 3689. 3801–3803——System of voting at the municipal elections by means of voting papers, 3660, 3661——Deterioration in the class of persons who become candidates for commissionerships, persons of good position being unwilling to canvass for the office, 3662–3667——Strong political bias shown in the appointment of officers by the commissioners, and by the officers themselves; instances of this, 3668–3674——Excessive political corruption at the municipal elections in 1866 and 1867, in the shape of beer tickets, 3675–3678.

Connection between the election of commissioners in the autumn of 1868 and the following Parliamentary election, 3679–3681——Conclusion as to the necessity of a public prosecutor for dealing with cases of personation, 3682, 3683——Less terrorism at the Parliamentary elections than at the municipal elections, 3684, 3685. 3715. 3799, 3800——Statement in favour of the municipal franchise at Cheltenham being assimilated to the Parliamentary franchise; great saving of expense and trouble thereby, 3685–3692——Suggested retention of plurality of voting in the municipal elections where the occupier is the owner of his property, 3690, 3691.

Advantage if non-resident owners were not qualified to vote at municipal elections, as obviating one of the chief causes of personation, 3692——Further check to personation by a sub-division of polling districts, 3693——Evils of the present system of nomination of municipal candidates, no previous intimation being necessary; suggestion that a pre-nomination be necessary, as in the case of poor law guardians, 3694.

Very heavy expenses at Parliamentary elections under the present system, 3695–3698——Expediency of simplifying the registration, as being a source of annual expense, 3697——Great increase of expense and of corrupt practices caused by the present system of open nomination; witness would abolish this system altogether, 3698, 3699——Importance of limiting the time allowed for canvassing, a protracted canvass causing much evil, 3698. 3706–3711. 3804–3806. 3822——Grounds for recommending that it should be necessary for candidates to come forward a fortnight or a month before the election, 3706–3706. 3804–3822.

Approval of a public declaration of the poll, 3712——Doubt as to treating, bribery, or intimidation being practised to much extent at the Cheltenham Parliamentary elections, 3713–3716——Decided preference for open voting as compared with the ballot, witness believing that the ballot would act as a premium to bribery, 3718–3720——Want of some means of dealing with persons who engage in bribery, under payment from the opposite side, with a view to evidence for a petition, 3720–3725. 3733–3735——Obstacles to carrying out prosecutions for personation at Cheltenham, 3726–3728——Operation of Sturges Bourne's Act at Cheltenham adverted to, 3729–3732.

Advantage if there were a public prosecutor, who should deal with bribers, 3735——Deterrent effect if the judge at an election inquiry had power to commit for trial persons guilty of bribery, 3736——Statement as regards certain misconduct on the part of officers at municipal elections at Cheltenham, that this could not have been discovered under the ballot, 3737–3745——Objection to voting papers being collected at the houses of the voters, 3746–3748.

Grounds for concluding that it would be a great improvement at Cheltenham if those only only who are qualified for the Parliamentary register could vote at the municipal elections; large number and low class of municipal voters adverted to hereon, 3749–3786——Blame attaching to the candidates at municipal elections, and to their agents, in respect of the issue of beer tickets, 3770–3790——Limited extent to which pressure is put upon tradesmen by their customers in respect of their votes, 3791–3797——General feeling in the town in favour of abolishing the practice of nomination at the hustings, 3798.

Comparatively few of the higher class at Cheltenham who interest themselves in the Parliamentary elections, 3823——Very full polling of the constituency at the last election, 3824-3826——Almost inoperative effect at Cheltenham of the Act conferring the lodger franchise, on account of the compulsory attendance at the revising court; improvement if claims were admitted, subject to objection, as for the county franchise, 3827.

Declaration of the Poll. Approval of a public declaration of the poll, though it might be an improvement if it were not made on the hustings, Bleckly 1222–1225——Recommended abolition of the declaration of the poll, Addyman 1536; Trippier 1755——Conclusion that the public declaration of the poll is both useless and dangerous, West 2887.

Approval of a public declaration of the poll, Davies 3712——Advantage if the declaration of the poll were abolished, Ellard 7245; Harkness 8397-8404——Objection to an abolition of the declaration of the poll, Sir S. Martin 10645, 10646.

Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth, Bart. (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is conversant with the mode of conducting elections in many foreign countries, 10136——Explanations in detail relative to the two systems of election by ballot in France, the one not being necessarily secret in all cases, and the other being necessarily secret, 10137 et seq.——Preparation of the polling cards in France by the Government, these showing the right to vote, and being generally obtained by the voters by personal application at the mairie, 10138–10151——Supply of bulletins to the voters by the candidates' agents; use made of these in polling, 10139–10142. 10149, 10150.

Statement of the means for the prevention of personation at the French elections, 10141. 10144. 10146. 10307–10309——Return of the voting card to the voter after it is examined in the polling booth, it being available for a second election, 10141. 10146. 10217. 10233–10235——Necessity of the bulletin being folded by the voter, after which it is handed to the assessor or deputy returning officer, and is placed in the ballot-box, 10141, 10142. 10163.

Use of a polling-card, similar to that in France, at the test ballot in Manchester, 10146——Practice at Manchester as to signing the voting paper, 10148——Loss of the vote, in France, if the voter's name be put on the bulletin, 10149. 10155, 10156——Practice of sealing up the ballot-box when the day's voting is over, 10151——Statement of the process in counting up the votes or bulletins, the result being set forth in the procès-verbal, 10151, 10152. 10157——Several classes of bad or lost votes; course pursued as regards these, 10151–10157——Absence of nominations in France, each candidate being merely required to take the oath, 10158–10161.

Opinion that it should be an essential part of every ballot system that the voting paper should be handed to the returning officer or his deputy, 10162, 10163. 10256. 10263. 10302——Details relative to the system of ballot in the States of New York and Massachusetts, and other American States; this system is generally identical with the French system, secrecy not being necessary, but is conducted with less care, and is attended with much abuse, 10164–10167. 10174–10180. 10189 et seq.——Very extensive frauds and bribery at Boston and New York; how carried out, 10166, 10167. 10174, 10175. 10205–10207. 10218–10224.

Statement showing that, under the French system, a voter can prove to a fellow-voter how he has voted, 10167–10172. 10201–10204——Almost complete exemption from bribery in France; exceptional instance to the contrary at an election at Toulon, in 1868; 10169. 10221——Practice in Paris for the voters to observe secrecy, this not being the rule in the rural districts, 10170–10173. 10230–10232——Belief that the Australian system is not known in America, 10178——System in America of sometimes voting for several offices on the same ticket, 10180. 10194–10196.

Incidence of the expenses in France upon the authorities, the candidates having generally but small amounts to pay for printing, &c. 10181–10188. 10228, 10229——Incidence of the expense in America upon the local authorities, the amount being very limited, 10182, 10183——Question as to the check, under the French system, for preventing an undue number of voting-cards being put into the ballot-box or urn, 10208–10211. 10256——Particulars relative to different plans and machines invented with a view to ballot-voting by balls; several advantages of the ball-ballot, though witness hesitates to recommend its adoption, 10213–10215. 10294–10301.

Opinion that, under the Australian system, with the addition of one provision, secrecy would be absolutely preserved, 10216——System of voluntary canvassing in the rural districts in France, 10225, 10226——Prohibition, both in France and America, of allowance ance for travelling expenses of voters, 10227——Absence of treating at the candidate's expense, either in America or France, 10236, 10237——Peaceable conduct of the elections in France and the States, voters going to the poll without obstruction, 10238, 10239. 10244–10246 —— Absence of any disturbances at the declaration of the poll in France, 10240–10243——Belief as to a system of registration having been adopted in the States since the war, 10248, 10249.

Description of the points of difference between the ballot in Tasmania, New South Wales, and Victoria, on the one hand, and in South Australia on the other, 10250, 10251. 10256——Advantage of the plan of the voter scratching out the names of the candidates for whom he does not vote, 10251——Exceedingly few bad or lost votes at the Manchester ballot, from one-half to two-thirds of the constituency having voted, 10251–10255——Suggestion that if the returning officer, on putting the voting paper into the box, should, in any case, see how the vote was given, such vote should be lost, 10257, 10258. 10302.

Explanatory statement on the subject of the Tasmanian dodge; precautions by which it may be prevented, it being in any case very difficult of execution, 10259–10277—— Advantage of the check afforded by the deputy returning officer putting his initials on each paper, 10259. 10302——Approval of the practice in Victoria whereby the returning officer assists those who cannot read or write, 10278, 10279——Advantage of the French system, in the case of uneducated voters, 10280.

Varying practice in France and in the several Australian Colonies, as to the destruction of the voting papers after the election, and as to the conduct of a scrutiny, 10282. 10289, 10290——Conclusion that, with proper precautions against personation, a scrutiny is unnecessary, and that the papers should at once be destroyed, 10282–10290. 10302 ——Impression that in America there is no scrutiny, though Members have been unseated, 10291, 10292.

Possibility, under the ballot, of voters being induced to refrain from voting, 10293—— Device suggested by witness, and adopted at the Manchester ballot, for enabling blind voters to poll with secrecy, 10298——Incidence of the legal expenses of Australian elections upon the rates, 10303——Objection to the permission, in Australia, to pay for the conveyance of voters to the poll, ib.——Advantage of conducting the ballot in rooms; economy thereby, 10305, 10306.

Statement showing that it is perfectly possible, without the ballot, to prevent the state of the poll being known, and thus to prevent afternoon bribery on the polling day, 10310–10316. 10326–10333——Statement also that, in small boroughs, the ballot would not prevent bribery in the form of a conditional payment, in the event of the candidate's success; this, in fact, would be the only form of bribery feasible under the ballot, 10316–10325.

Draft Report. Copy of Draft Report, as prepared by the Chairman of the Committee, Rep. xv–xx.

Drogheda. Excessive violence and rioting at Drogheda during the last election, Lord Strathnairn 11745—— Advantage if there had been a polling place at the railway station, ib. 11793.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Keogh in the matter of the Drogheda election petition, App. 583——Voidance of the election of Mr. Whitworth on account of the intimidation and violence which prevailed, ib.

Dublin City and County:

1. Municipal Elections for the City.
2. Parliamentary Elections for the City and County.

1. Municipal Elections for the City:

Particulars relative to the Dublin municipal elections; the qualifications of electors, and the part taken by the Roman Catholic priests; instances of bribery of Liberal electors in one of the wards, Stokes 4458–4474. 4529–4542—— On the whole, very little bribery has prevailed at the municipal elections, ib. 4460. 4529.

Powerful influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at the election for the Dublin mayoralty in 1868; examination hereon whether this influence was not properly exercised, as bearing upon the question of the Irish church, Norwood 8116. 8197–8210.

2. Parliamentary Elections for the City and County:

Much more peaceable character of the Dublin Parliamentary election of 1852 than of the election in 1847, owing to the increase in the number of polling places, Stokes 4480–4482——Prevalence of bribery on both sides at the Parliamentary elections for Dublin; this applies, probably, more to Roman Catholics than to Protestants, 4483–4486. 4628–4635.

2. Parliamentary Elections for the City and County—continued.

Evidence as to the very general exercise of priestly influence and spiritual intimidation at the elections for Dublin and for Dublin county, Stokes 4487–4507. 4514–4520. 4543 et seq.——Statement relative to the steps taken by the Conservative party at the election before the last for the county of Dublin in bringing a large number of country voters into the city and keeping them away from the priests; denial that these men were under undue custody, ib. 4504–4506. 4514–4520. 4560–4597. 4624–4627.

Directions received by witness from Lord Strathnairn as to military escorts at the Dublin county election in 1868; consultation also of Sir Thomas Larcom on the subject, McMurdo 7534, 7535——Inordinate force of military and police sent to Balbriggan at the last election for the county, no occasion having arisen for so large a force, ib. 7545–7550.

Very active part taken by the priests in the Dublin city and county elections, Norwood 8115.

Reference to a written report by General McMurdo as contradicting his evidence relative to the inordinate employment of troops at Balbriggan at the last election for the county of Dublin, Lord Strathnairn 11724–11726. 11801–11808.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Keogh in the matter of the petition against the return of Sir Arthur Guinness, the election being declared void, App. 584——Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Mr. Pim, ib. 585.

Dumfries Burghs. Information relative to the elections for the Dumfries burghs, and the prevalence of treating formerly; great improvement in this respect at the last election, McGowan 5989–5998—— Absence of bribery either in the burghs or county of Dumfries, ib. 6001——Considerable intimidation in one of the burghs at the last election, ib. 6006, 6007——Great abuse in the burgh of Dumfries, in connection with the licensing system, with reference to the election of 1868, ib. 6008–6013——Absence of paid canvassing on witness's side at the burgh election, witness, as agent, having accompanied the candidate in his canvass, ib. 6060–6070.

Denial of the accuracy of Mr. McGowan's evidence as to the prevalence of treating at the burgh elections, Harkness 8390–8394——Denial also of Mr. McGowan's statement that there was great abuse by the magistrates, in the granting of licenses in 1868, with reference to the election; examination in detail upon this subject, ib. 8395–8397. 8405–8454.

DUMFRIES-SHIRE:

1. Charge of Undue Influence against Conservative Landlords.
2. Denial of the foregoing Charge; Counter Statement against the Liberals.
3. Employment of Agents.
4. Action of the Clergy.
5. Treating.
6. Feeling on the Subject of the Ballot.

1. Charge of Undue Influence against Conservative Landlords:

Opportunities of witness for becoming conversant with cases of pressure by landlords in the counties of Dumfries and Roxburgh at the last election; publicity of these cases, Russel 5804–5813. 5892, 5893.

Witness submits sundry details as showing that in the second Dumfries-shire contest there was a very extensive pressure put upon tenants by their landlords to vote for the Conservative candidate, McGowan 5967–5988. 6014 et seq.——At the first election Sir S. Waterlow was in a majority of forty-four, and at the second in a minority of thirty-six, ib. 5970——A careful analysis of the votes was made by witness, and a careful personal inquiry conducted, as the result of which he cites several cases in illustration of the intimidation and undue influence by the landlords or their factors, ib. 5970–5988. 6014 et seq.

Particulars relative to two cases in which tenants suffered by loss of their holdings through having voted for Sir Sydney Waterlow; examination as to the outgoing and incoming rent in each case, McGowan 5978–5980. 6046–6048. 6101–6110——Notoriety in the county of the undue influence exercised by the landlords; the latter, however, justifying their action in the matter, ib. 6033–6040——Strong political feelings of the tenants which induced them to go against their landlords, ib. 6041–6043.

Explanation as to a petition not having been presented against Major Walker's return for Dumfries-shire, notwithstanding, as witness submits, there was ample evidence of undue influence; difficulty chiefly as to agency, McGowan 6078–6090. 6196, 6197—— Belief that numerous cases of intimidation did not come to witness's knowledge at all, ib. 6097. 6194, 6195.

Conclusion as to the undue influence of the landlords having been the sole cause of the defeat defeat of Sir Sydney Waterlow at the last election, McGowan 6127-6131——Belief, as the result of witness's investigation relative to the county voting, that there were only two tenants who could be evicted as not having leases, ib. 6132–6153——Opinion that on the Liberal side there was no undue influence, though there might have been influence exercised upon tradesmen by their customers, ib. 6168–6177.

1. Charge of Undue Influence against Conservative Landlords—continued.

2. Denial of the foregoing Charge; Counter Statement against the Liberals:

Two-fold cause to which the defeat of the Conservative candidate at the election in 1868 was owing, the chief cause being that the tenant farmers did not come forward, Kennedy 7800–7802. 7854-7856——Great dissatisfaction of the tenant farmers at the return of a stranger in 1868, ib. 7800–7804. 7854–7856——Very active part taken by the tenant farmers generally in behalf of Major Walker at the last election; their action in the matter was entirely voluntary, and the reports of intimidation by landlords and agents are altogether unfounded, ib. 7805 et seq.——Major Walker's success was entirely owing to the active part taken by the tenant farmers, the great majority of whom voted for him, ib. 7818–7821. 7854–7856.

Disorderly conduct on the Liberal side at the elections in question, Kennedy 7827–7833——Indignant feeling of the tenant farmers in respect of the charge of intimidation, ib. 7850–7852——Statement that more voters changed from the Conservative side to the Liberal side than from the latter to the former, at the second election, ib. 7884-7888.

Witness confirms the evidence of Mr. Kennedy, and positively denies that the result of the last election was brought about by landlords' intimidation, Yorstown 7897–7904——Denial of the accuracy of a statement by Mr. McGowan relative to the non-renewal of the lease of a certain tenant through his having voted on the Liberal side, ib. 7902–7904——The tenancy was let out to the new tenant at a considerable advance of rent, which the old tenant declined to give, ib. 7902, 7903.

3. Employment of Agents:

Objectionable employment of a large number of bank agents and lawyers at the Dumfries-shire election on the Conservative side, McGowan 6059. 6154–6164——Much larger number of paid agents on the Conservative side than on the Liberal side at the county election; expenses of each side adverted to hereon, ib. 6122–6126. 6154–6164.

Explanation relative to the number of agents employed on each side at the first and second election, Kennedy 7844–7849. 7891–7893.

4. Action of the Clergy:

Active interest taken in the county election by the clergy on both sides; opinion as to the legitimate character of such influence, McGowan 5987. 6049–6054. 6121——Strong influence exercised by the Dissenting ministers in favour of Sir Sydney Waterlow, Kennedy 7836–7838. 7871–7876.

5. Treating:

There was no treating at the last county election, McGowan 6032——System of treating on both sides till the last general election, ib. 6075–6077.

6. Feeling on the Subject of the Ballot:

Very general support given in Dumfries-shire, after the county election in 1869, to a petition in favour of the ballot, the signatures including many Conservative voters, McGowan 6021–6023. 6034. 6055–6057. 6117–6120. 6187–6193——Inaccuracy of the statement that since the last election public opinion in the county was strongly in favour of the ballot, Kennedy 7839-7843.

Dutton, Francis S. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was a Member of the Legislature of South Australia from 1851 to 1865, and was also a Member of the Government for several years, 9016–9019——Has had ample experience of the ballot in the colony, and of the previous system of open voting, 9020, 9021. 9037–9039——Is convinced that the ballot tends to purity of election and to quiet and order, 9022——There was much opposition to the adoption of the measure, but now all parties approve of it, 9023, 9024.

Very similar plan of registration of electors in South Australia and in England, 9026. 9055, 9056——Appointment by Government of the returning officer, the latter appointing the deputy returning officers, 9026, 9027——Clause of the Electoral Act of 1858, explanatory of the arrangements laid down for the working of the ballot, 9028——Correction of an inference drawn from Colonel Torrens's evidence that the ballot was not secret, 9030–9033——Inaccuracy also of an inference that the state of the poll became known before the declaration, 9033–9036.

Opportunities of the candidates for addressing the electors within twenty-four hours of the election, their being, however, a prohibition upon canvassing by candidates, 9039.

9068, 9069. 9197–9209. 9245. 9291–9296——Very rare instances of petitions, 9040, 9041—— Explanation relative to a petition which was successful on the score of bribery in the shape of travelling expenses of voters, 9042–9045. 9085–9089——Destruction of the voting cards immediately after the scrutiny, 9046——Form of voting paper in use, 9046——Doubt as to any coercion of voters under the ballot, 9047, 9048——Sufficiency of the checks and penalties in regard to personation, 9049-9052.

Statement of the number of electors for the House of Assembly and for the Upper House respectively, and of the composition of each House; use of the ballot in each case, 9053–9066——Total of eighteen electoral districts returning two members each, there being two districts in Adelaide, 9053, 9054. 9317–9319.

Very orderly conduct of the elections, though there is a good deal of political excitement, 9067. 9070-9072. 9127, 9132–9134. 9148, 9149——Frequent re-election of the same men, 9073–9076——Conclusion as to the very beneficial operation of the system of secret voting in the colony, 9077, 9078. 9127 et seq.

Possibility, under the ballot, of some candidates being prepared to bribe on the chance of those bribed supporting them, although it would be impossible to discover whether they had done so, 9079-9091——Objection to the voting papers being preserved after the scrutiny, or to there being any means of discovering how each voter polled, 9092–9102——Disadvantage of those voters in the colony who live at a distance from the polling places, it being illegal to convey voters to the poll; this is unavoidable, 9103–9110. 9140-9145. 9150-9156——Average of from sixty to seventy per cent. of the electors who vote; similar proportion before the adoption of the ballot, 9110. 9299–9301.

Information relative to the constitution and working of the court for the trial of petitions in South Australia; satisfactory result in the few cases hitherto tried, 9111–9121——Total of about nine per cent. of the electors who cannot read; decided objection to these having any assistance in order to enable them to vote, 9121-9126. 9351, 9352——Very riotous character of the elections when the voting was open; disappearance of this under the ballot, 9127. 9132–9134. 9183-9185. 9210-9221. 9251——Great expenditure formerly in treating, whereas now there is no inducement to incur this expense, which is moreover illegal, 9127–9132. 9218–9221——Advantage of the state of the poll not being known, 9133——Simplicity and efficiency of the machinery under the ballot, 9135.

Tendency of the ballot to increase the influence of candidates of high character, 9136, 9137——Equal check upon personation under the ballot as under open voting, 9138, 9139——Continued unanimity of the colonial feeling in favour of the ballot, 9145-9147——Less expensive contests formerly in the colony than in England, the ballot, however, being just as desirable in the latter country as a check upon corrupt expenditure, 9157–9163——Absence of similar political parties in the colony as in England; there, are however, opposing parties in the Legislative Assembly, 9164-9166. 9181, 9182. 9226–9228.

Credit taken by witness for being the father of the ballot in Australia; no act of his political life has given him so much satisfaction, 9167, 9168——Dissent from the view that the ballot has caused any deterioration in the constitution of the Legislative Assembly, or in the efficiency of the Government, 9169–9180. 9246-9250. 9341, 9342——Denial that candidates generally promise to support a large expenditure of public money, 9178–9180——Description of the process of ballot voting in the colony; belief as to there being no fraud in respect of voting papers, 9186–9196.

System of canvassing in the colony by the candidate's friends or agents; there has been less of this since the ballot, 9203-9208. 9241-9244. 9294-9298. 9316——Frequent changes of administration, 9222——Local character of most of the questions at elections, 9223, 9224—— Explanation of the legal provisions for dealing with corrupt practices, the Act of 1851 having been superseded by the Act of 1858; 9229–9240—— Circumstance of an election not being voided by personation, the check upon personation being, however, very efficient, 9252, 9253. 9257-9265——Rejection of many votes as being informal, 9254-9256. 9353-9355.

Satisfactory operation of the ballot as regards the Irish population in the colony; absence of religious animosity, or of undue pressure on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, 9267–9290. 9343, 9344——Belief that the ballot would operate just as well in Ireland as in South Australia, 9286——Further statement as to the circumstances attending the adoption of the ballot in the colony; how the details were settled, 9302-9312.

Much less expense to candidates since the ballot, there being in fact no corrupt expenditure now, 9314, 9315. 9330-9339——Greater facility of bribery under the ballot in a small than a large constituency, 9320–9325——Circumstance of some members in Victoria having been recently expelled for bribery and been re-elected, 9328, 9329—— Statement as to all the legal expenses of elections in South Australia being paid by the State, 9340. 9345-9350. 9356-9358——Suggestion for facilitating voting by blind persons under the ballot system, 9351.

Edge

E.

Edge, Thomas Broughton. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a member of the Middle Temple; practised at Bolton for several years as a solicitor, and had considerable experience of the Parliamentary and municipal elections there, 12768–12772 ——System at the Bolton municipal elections of paying the men for loss of time; belief that there has been no direct bribery, 12773–12777——Considerable amount of mob intimidation at the last municipal election; voters were also kidnapped or "bottled," 12778, 12779. 12786–12795. 12807, 12808—— Very little intimidation at the parliamentary elections by employers; decrease of this practice generally, 12780–12785. 12796. 12930–12932.

Belief that under the ballot bribery would still take place; illustration in support of this view, 12797–12803. 12887–12890——Opinion that voting papers would be the best means of checking, if not preventing, bribery and intimidation, 12804——Explanations in detail relative to the scheme of voting papers proposed by witness, being a modification of the plan in use for the election of poor law guardians, 12805 et seq.

Suggestions relative to the issue of the voting papers by the returning officer, and their delivery at the houses of the electors, 12806, 12807. 12813——Proposal that the papers be delivered three days before the election, and that during this period no canvassing be allowed, 12806, 12807. 12839–12857. 12942–12945——Expectation that witness's system of voting papers would prevent bribery on the polling day, as well as intimidation by mobs, and the bottling or kidnapping of voters; grounds for this conclusion considered, 12806 et seq.

Explanation of the arrangements proposed for the collection of the voting papers; doubt as to any abuse arising on this score, or as to an unduly long time being occupied in a house to house collection, 12807. 12813–12820. 12891–12893. 12912–12916. 12948–12951. 12971–12980——Proposed publication of the votes after the election; check thereby upon personation, 12807. 12811, 12812. 12823–12832. 12858–12863 ——Conclusion that the ballot would be no protection against the kidnapping of voters, 12807. 12809. 12887.

Question considered whether in the signing of the voting papers the voters might not be subjected to undue influence or bribery; grounds for dissenting from this view, 12821 et seq. 12987–13001—— Difficulty as to the voters signing in the presence of the collecting officer though this would obviate any chance of intimidation, 12878–12815——Belief that under the ballot it would be easy to ascertain how doubtful voters had polled, and that undue influence and bribery would be resorted to just as much as at present, 12887–12890. 12983.

Hardship, in the opinion of many of the working classes, through the loss of time and of wages in going to the poll, 12917——Opinion as to the facility of checking fraud or personation in the signing of voting papers, 12918–12929——Possibility of the loss of many votes through the papers not being signed when called for, or being lost, 12933–12939. 12952, 12953——Limited extent to which witness is aware of falsification of voting papers at elections of guardians or local boards, 12958–12963 ——Adverse feeling in Bolton towards the ballot, many of the Liberal party objecting to it. 12964–12966.

Avoidance of much of the evils of the present system of elections if the poll were conducted without the public knowing how it was going on, 12967–12970——Suggested modification of the university system in applying a system of voting papers to county elections, 12981, 12982 ——Tendency of the ballot to repress public opinion, 12983 —— Efficiency of the ballot as a means of preventing bribery on the polling day, 12985 —— Penalty contemplated as a check upon employers exercising undue influence as to the signing of voting papers, 12987–12994.

Edinburgh. Very pure character for several years past of the municipal and Parliamentary elections in Edinburgh, Russel 5778. 5785–5787.

Education. Occurrence of treating and bribery at Bradford in the case, chiefly, of the uneducated class of voters, West 2994–3000——Expediency of improved education in Ireland before the introduction of the ballot, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11881. 11948, 11949.—— See also Scotland, 1.

Ellard, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is town clerk of Limerick, and is well conversant with the local elections, 7139–7141——Considerable influence exercised at the elections by the mobs; frequent instances of violence and intimidation on their part, 7142–7146. 7157. 7183–7191. 7231–7233——Confirmation of Mr. Spaight's evidence as to the attack upon his house at a former election, 7144. 7274——Particulars relative to the petition consequent upon the last election; explanation as to intimidation not having been charged, 7146–7151. 7247–7256——Statement as to witness having been conducting agent for Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott, 7151–7156. 7227–7230.

Great influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at the elections, 7158, 7159. 7175–7179. 7234——Influence exercised in the rural districts by the landlords and their agents; very little of this influence in Limerick city, 7160. 7237 ——Reference to the hiring of mobs at the last election; denial that there was any mob on Sir Peter Tait's side, 7161. 7255, 7256——Statement as to Sir Peter Tait not having been brought forward or supported by the Conservatives as a body; explanation as to his having issued no address, and having been put forward unexpectedly, 7162-7174. 7203-7208——Circumstance of Archdeacon Gould's tenants not having voted at all, 7162. 7239-7244.

Belief that the ballot would be an immense advantage at the Limerick elections, and that under it the Roman Catholic clergy would not exercise any undue influence over their flocks, 7180-7182. 7197-7202. 7215-7217. 7237, 7238. 7257-7261.

Instances of objectionable conduct of the Limerick municipal elections, more especially in the way of intimidation, 7192-7194. 7210-7214——Approval of the ballot at municipal elections, 7195——Strong feeling in Limerick in favour of the ballot, the Conservatives, however, being afraid that priestly influence would still prevail, 7197, 7198——Advantage if the state of the poll were not declared till some time after the election, 7232, 7233——Instance of unjustifiable language used towards witness by a priest at the last election; this would hardly have occurred under the ballot, 7234-7239. 7262-7269.

Approval of an abolition of public nominations, 7245——Advantage also of doing away with the public declaration of the state of the poll, ib.——Also of closing public-houses on the day of election, and the previous day, 7246——Tendency of the ballot to prevent the use of organised mobs, 7270-7272——Anxiety of the Roman Catholic clergy for the intervention of Sunday between the nomination day and the polling day; objection to this arrangement, 7273-7275.

Employment of Voters. Inadequacy of the provision in the Representation of the People Act, which disentitles electors to vote who are employed and paid as committee men or canvassers; suggestion that the voting of such persons should void the election, Sir J. S. Willes 10853-10859——Inconvenience in questioning voters when about to poll as to their being employed or paid, Sir S. Martin 10861.

Enniskillen. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Lord Crichton, App. 585.

EXPENSES OF ELECTIONS:

Objection to placing the expenses of Parliamentary elections upon the towns, as tending to increase the number of candidates, and of contests, Barber 289. 340-345——Belief that the return made by agents for Parliamentary expenses are a perfect farce, Darvill 530. 773-776. 806——With regard to the expense to candidates in sending out a polling card to each voter, they should, on the other hand, be relieved of the expense of polling-booths, clerks, &c., Bleckly 1367-1369——Doubt as to the local feeling at Liverpool being favourable to paying out of the rates the expenses of the Parliamentary elections, Johnson 2106. 2152-2159.

Objections to the expense of Parliamentary nominations being borne by the borough, West 2890. 2932, 2933——Statement favourable to voiding the seat of the candidate returned at the Parliamentary election, if the agent for election expenses, or the candidate himself, makes a fictitious return of the expenses; present regulations on this point considered, ib. 3009-3023. 3032-3035——Objection to the expense of Parliamentary elections being thrown upon the town, Forwood 3421-3423. 3437-3442——Non-objection to the election expenses being thrown upon the town, if candidates not polling a certain number of votes be required to contribute, ib. 3443, 3444——Approval of the candidate being unseated in the event of his making payments not included in his return, ib. 3471-3473.

Very heavy expenses at Parliamentary elections under the present system, Davies 3695-3698——Disapproval of the election expenses being thrown upon the borough, instead of being borne by the candidates, Kirk 3946-3951. 4027, 4028.

Statement that in the trial of petitions witness had no means of ascertaining the candidates' expenditure, beyond the amount officially returned, Sir S. Martin 10523, 10524——Suggestion made by Mr. Justice Willes whether there should not be an enactment that extravagant general expenditure should void the seat, ib. 10535-10538. 10615——Suggestion whether the seat should not be voided for a wilful keeping back of accounts, ib. 10665, 10666.

Consideration of the question whether an election should not be vitiated, on the general ground that there had been a much larger expenditure than in the opinion of the judge was reasonable, Sir J. S. Willes 10744-10751. 10798-10800.

Suggested liability to loss of seat, unless the expenditure be duly returned within a certain time, Sir C. Blackburn 11970-11973. 11975. 11993. 12031. 12064-12069. 12073-12075——Great difficulty in determining what amount of expenditure was lavish, as a ground for unseating a Member, ib. 11982-11988——Conclusion as to there being a great deal of corrupt expenditure which is not returned, and which escapes detection; advantage on this score of witness's proposition for extending the time for petitioning petitioning, Sir C. Blackburn 11989–11997——Possibility of much illegal and lavish expenditure without being able to connect it with agency, 11998, 11999.

Way in which there may be illegal and lavish expenditure in treating, &c., without the elections being necessarily invalidated; discretion exercised by the judge in such case, Sir C. Blackburn 11999, 12000——Impracticability of preventing corrupt expenditure, though by degrees increased difficulties may be put in the way, ib. 12006–12008——Belief that at no place where witness presided, was it the habit of Members to postpone payment of expenses till a following election, ib. 12030——Very large proportion of the expenditure due to paid agents and canvassers, ib. 12037.

Resolution proposed by Mr. Fawcett in favour of the necessary expenses of elections being borne by local rates, Rep. xiv.

F.

Fitzgerald, John Foster Vesey. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was Colonial Secretary in Victoria for several years; has been elected under the system of open voting, and under the ballot, 10862–10864——Almost total absence of venality in the elections before the ballot was introduced, 10865.10868. 10948, 10949. 11026——Considerable amount of mob intimidation when the voting was open; removal of this since the ballot, 10866. 10884–10886. 10952–10958——Very exceptional instances of corrupt payment under the ballot, 10867. 10950, 10951. 11027——Peculiar circumstances of the colony which render bribery much less probable than in this country, 10868–10873. 10948. 10951.

Great difficulty under the ballot in detecting wholesale bribery, it being quite open to candidates or their friends to make arrangements for paying voters conditional on success, 10874–10883——About equal expedition in polling by ballot and by voting, 10887. 10888——Impression in the colony as to the exercise of undue influence by the Roman Catholic priesthood, 10889, 10890. 11017——Very little secresy preserved by the voters, though the ballot enables them to be secret, 10890–10893. 11004–11007. 11028–11030. 11055——Much less canvassing than in England, 10894, 10895.

General feeling in the colony in approval of the ballot, more especially as preventing intimidation and disorder, 10896–10898. 10952–10958——Advantage of open voting, as facilitating the amendment of a fraudulent return, 10890——Suggestion that if secret voting be not completely adopted in England, the votes might be taken by ballot and made public a week after the election; facility thereby for detecting bribery, whilst intimidation would be diminished, 10899–10904. 10959–10962. 10967, 10968——Reference to a certain fraud under the ballot in Tasmania, this, however, being easy of prevention, 10905–10912.

Instance at Melbourne of the ill effect likely to ensue through one constituency returning several members, 10913–10925. 10970, 10971. 11031–11036 — Particulars relative to the certificates supplied to voters and required to be produced at the poll; abuse in connection with these, 10926–10947. 11019–11025——Entire absence of any undue influence in the colony, 10963–10966——Disapproval of the ballot only by the Roman Catholics, 10969. 11014–11018.

Important differences between the conditions and circumstances of Victoria and of England, so that it does not follow that the effect of the ballot would be identical in each country, 10974–10983——Large number of polling places in Victoria; varying size of the constituencies adverted to hereon, 10984–10992——Belief that it is impossible under open voting to prevent the state of the poll becoming known, and thus to prevent excitement, 10993, 10994.

Statement relative to candidates' expenses in Victoria, these chiefly being for printing and advertising, 10995–11003 — Disqualification for the franchise if persons are in receipt of charitable relief, 11013. 11055——Great deterioration in the constitution of the Legislative Assembly; witness does not attribute this to the ballot, 11037–11042 ——Excellent effect of the abolition of public nominations in the colony, 11043–11045 ——System of public meetings and of committees, by which the opinions of the candidates are made known, 11046–11054.

Forwood, Arthur Bower. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Merchant and shipowner at Liverpool; took an active part at the last Parliamentary elections for South-west Lancashire and Liverpool, 3299, 3300——Statement as to the want of facilities for increasing the number of polling places at the South-west Lancashire elections, 3301–3306. 3497, 3498 ——Amount of expenditure on each side at the last Parliamentary election for Liverpool; Grounds for the conclusion that no corrupt practices were resorted to by either party, 3307. 3425–3434 et seq.

Steps taken by the Conservative party at Liverpool to prevent corrupt practices on their side, 3324——Very little drunkenness in the town on the polling day; inaccuracy of a former witness on this point, 3331–3333. 3383. 3505–3508——Improvement if the working classes at Liverpool could record their votes near their places of employment, 3336-3339—— Unsatisfactory state of the law as to the hiring of conveyances for voters in boroughs; advantage of entire prohibition, or of rendering the practice legal, so as to facilitate the polling of workmen, 3340-3345. 3486-3496.

Prevalence of corrupt practices at the municipal elections in some of the wards, 3346-3352—— Limited increase of drunkenness in the town at the municipal elections in 1867 and 1868; 3353-3356——Inaccuracy of some evidence as to bribery on the Conservative side at the last municipal election, 3357-3359——Distinct conduct of the municipal and Parliamentary elections in 1868, the former not having influenced the latter, 3358-3364 ——Statement in favour of an assimilation of the municipal franchise at Liverpool to the Parliamentary franchise, so as to have but one register, 3365-3376.

Approval of the present mode of voting, as preferable to the ballot, 3377——Copies of resolutions recently adopted by the Liverpool Conservative Working Men's Association in favour of open voting, 3378-3382——Denial by the association of evidence given to tha Committee by Messrs. Trippier and Johnson; explanation hereon, 3382. 3477-3485. 3502-3515——Importance of volunteer canvassing, as at Liverpool; paid canvassing might be prohibited, 3384-3392. 3436——Objection to personal canvassing by the candidate, 3393.

Obstacles at Liverpool to dispensing with public-houses as the place of meeting of committees; approval of prohibiting the use of public-houses for public meetings held by the candidates, 3394, 3395. 3445-3465——Difficulty experienced in following up prosecutions for personation at Liverpool, a public prosecutor being desirable, 3396-3401—— Increased difficulty in dealing with personation if secret voting be adopted, 3402, 3403 ——Suggestion that the same laws and penalties be applied to municipal as to Parliamentary elections, and that the candidate be unseated in the event of bribery being proved, 3406-3411.

Feeling at Liverpool as to the uselessness of nominations, 3412-3420——Objection to the expense of Parliamentary elections being thrown upon the town, 3421-3423. 3437-3442—— Personal character of the bribery at the Liverpool municipal elections, party having nothing to do with it, 3424. 3435——Non-objection to the election expenses being thrown upon the town, if candidates not polling a certain number of votes be required to contribute, 3443, 3444.

Inaccurate returns rendered of the expenses of the last Parliamentary election at Liverpool, 3466-3470. 3499-3501——Approval of the candidate being unseated in the event of his making payments not included in the return, 3471-3473——Valuable check supplied by the Corrupt Practices Act, 3474-3476.

France (Ballot System):

Explanations in detail relative to the two systems of election by ballot in France, the one not being necessarily secret in all cases, and the other being necessarily secret. Sir C. W. Dilke 10137 et seq.——Preparation of the polling cards in France by the Government, these showing the right to vote, and being generally obtained by the voters by personal application at the mairie, ib. 10138-10151——Supply of bulletins to the voters by the candidates' agents; use made of these in the polling, ib. 10139-10142. 10149, 10150——Statement of the means for the prevention of personation at the French elections, ib. 10141. 10144, 10146. 10307-10309.

Return of the voting card to the voters after it is examined in the polling booth, it being available for a second election, Sir C. W. Dilke 10141. 10146. 10217. 10233-10235——Necessity of the bulletin being folded by the voter, after which it is handed to the assessor or deputy returning officer, and is placed in the ballot box, ib. 10141, 10142. 10163—— Loss of the vote if the voters' name be put on the bulletin, ib. 10149. 10155, 10156—— Practice of sealing up the ballot box when the day's voting is over, ib. 10151 ——Statement of the process in counting up the votes or bulletins, the result being set forth in the procès verbal, ib. 10151, 10152—— Several classes of bad or lost votes; course pursued as regards these, ib. 10151-10157.

Absence of nomination in France, each candidate being merely required to take the oath, Sir C. W. Dilke 10158-10161——Statement showing that under the French system a voter can prove to a fellow voter how he has voted, ib. 10167-10172. 10201-10204 ——Almost complete exemption from bribery in France; exceptional instance to the contrary at an election at Toulon in 1868, ib. 10169. 10221——Practice at Paris for the voters to preserve secrecy, this not being the rule in the rural districts, ib. 10170-10173 10230-10232.

Incidence of the expenses in France upon the authorities, the candidates having generally but small amounts to pay for printing, &c., Sir C. W. Dilke 10181-10188. 10228, 10229——Question as to the check under the French system for preventing an undue number of voting cards being put into the ballot box or urn, ib. 10208-10211. 10256——System of voluntary canvassing in the rural districts, ib. 10225, 10226—— There is no system of paid agency, ib. 10226.

Peaceable conduct of the election in France and in the States, voters going to the poll without obstruction, Sir C. W. Dilke 10238, 10239. 10244-10246——Absence of any disturbance at the declaration of the poll in France, ib. 10240-10243——Advantage of the French system in the case of uneducated voters, ib. 10280.

Examples of the procès-verbal, voting cards, and bulletins, in use at the elections, App. 594-600.

Franchise. Grounds for suggesting that a residence of only twelve months should be sufficient as regards the municipal franchise, Darvill 507-510——Effect of increasing the number of electors in diminishing bribery, ib. 511. 837——Suggestions for assimilating the municipal and parliamentary franchise, Johnstone 3236——Statement in favour of an assimilation of the municipal franchise at Liverpool to the Parliamentary franchise, so as to have but one register, Forwood 3365-3376.

Unsatisfactory result of the right of women to vote at the municipal elections at Cheltenham, Davies 3659-3689. 3801-3803——Statement in favour of the municipal franchise at Cheltenham being assimilated to the Parliamentary franchise; great saving of expense and trouble thereby, ib. 3685-3692——Suggested retention of plurality of voting in the municipal elections where the occupier is the owner of his property, ib. 3690, 3691——Grounds for concluding that it would be a great improvement at Cheltenham if those only who are qualified for the Parliamentary register could vote at the municipal elections; large numbers and low class of municipal voters adverted to hereon, ib. 3749-3786.

Resolution of the town council of Preston in favour of an assimilation of the two franchises, App. 589.

Freedom of Election. See Ballot.

Galway. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Keogh in the matter of the Galway borough election petition, App. 585, 586.

Gaunt, Edwin. (Analysis of his Evidence).—Is a town councillor of Leeds; concurs generally in the evidence of Mr. Addyman, 1546-1549——Explanation as to the heavy cost incurred in some county court prosecutions at Leeds in 1865, for bribery at the municipal elections, 1550-1553——Apprehension of increased expense which prevented the following up of these prosecutions in order to disqualify a member of the council convicted of bribery, 1554-1559——Instance formerly of a serious riot at a nomination for the borough, 1560.

Conclusion that the ballot is the most effectual and desirable remedy for bribery at municipal and Parliamentary elections, 1561-1567——Increase of corruption in some of the wards in Leeds as regards the municipal elections, 1568——Pure character of the last Parliamentary election, 1569——Explanation as to the corrupt character of the municipal elections whilst the Parliamentary elections are pure, 1570-1574——Less demand for the ballot in those wards where the electors are of the superior and educated classes, 1575-1581.

Growing feeling in the town, on the part of Conservatives as well as Liberals, in favour of the ballot, 1582-1587——Very little protection required at Leeds as regards intimidation; advantage however of the ballot on this ground, 1588. 1590-1593——Peaceable conduct of the last Parliamentary election, 1590——Prevalence of bribery at the municipal elections chiefly when the contests are close, and at a late period of the day, 1594-1597——Less probability of bribery if the poll were not published till the contest is over, 1598, 1599.

Gloucester. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of the sitting members, App. 569.

Gravesend. Quiet manner in which the municipal elections of the borough have been conducted, Troughton 4037-4042——Particulars relative to the Parliamentary election and to the bribery and intimidation practised on the Liberal side, but for which the Conservative candidate would have been returned, ib. 4043 et seq.——Circumstance of a petition not having been presented; difficulty in proving the bribery, ib. 4055, 4056. 4072-4074——Violence displayed by an organised mob from Northfleet, ib. 4057-4064. 4082-4093. 4115-4121.

Statement of the number of the constituency and the number polled on each side; majority of 100 calculated upon by the Conservatives, whereas this was turned into a minority by the practices of the Liberals, Troughton 4065-4071. 4094-4111——Further information relative to the constituency of Gravesend, and the number who polled on each each side, Troughton 4122-4129—— Statement in further support of the conclusion that but for intimidation and bribery on the part of the Liberals there would have been a Conservative majority, as shown by the previous canvass of the electors, ib. 4130-4155—— Non-promotion of a petition further adverted to and explained, ib. 4156, 4157.

Greece (Ball-Ballot):

Witness submits explanation in detail relative to the system of ball-ballot in operation at elections in Greece; strongly advocates the system on the ground of secrecy, simplicity, and fairness, Arnold 10334 et seq.—— Facility with which the most illiterate persons may vote, ib. 10355—— Very orderly conduct of the elections, whereas the people are peculiarly excitable in political matters, ib. 10373-10376. 10481-10490.

Instances of abuse in connection with the elections owing to the disorganised state of the country; conclusion that this is not consequent upon the ballot system, and that the elections are generally pure, Arnold 10377-10387. 10450-10461—— Practice as to canvassing, ib. 10393-10396——Character of the candidates and of the members elected; absence of objection to the ballot on this score, ib. 10400-10407.

Particulars relative to the system of compulsory requisition before any person is qualified as candidate, it being necessary that the requisition be signed by one-twentieth of the constituency; recommended adoption of this plan in lieu of the present nomination system, Arnold 10408-10428. 10430-10444——Very small expense of the candidates in Greece, ib. 10476-10480—— Careful custody of the ballot boxes, ib. 10504, 10505——Absence of interference on the part of the clergy, ib. 10506-10508——Appointment of the returning officer or eparch by Government, ib. 10509-10511.

Greenock. Certificate and report by Lord Barcaple in the matter of the Greenock Election petition, App. 580.

Guildford. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Willes in the case of the Guildford petition, App. 569, 570.

H.

Hampson, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is general agent for the Conservative party at Ashton-under-Lyne, 2501-2503—— Testifies in detail to the prevalence of intimidation, bribery, and treating at the municipal elections for the borough, these practices being confined to the Liberal party, 2506 et seq.—— Statement as to the undue influence exercised by the corporation and its officers in the interests of Liberal candidates, 2525-2532. 2552. 2609, 2610. 2640-2644—— Particulars relative to a list of persons discharged from the mills of Mr. Oldham Whittaker and other employers after the last Parliamentary election for having voted on the Conservative side, 2532-2534. 2553 et seq.

Undue influence exercised over Mr. Hugh Mason's workmen and tenants relative to their votes, 2535, 2536. 2625-2630. 2727-2731—— Absence of bribery at the Parliamentary election, 2545. 2631. 2652. 2709-2726——Intimidation and undue influence were the chief evils at the last election, 2545. 2551 et seq.——Prevalence of treating to some extent, but only on the Liberal side, 2546-2550—— Explanation as to the formation and operation of the Victim Fund, for the relief of workmen dismissed by Liberal millowners, 2554-2560. 2645-2649.

Witness submits certain declarations made before magistrates at Ashton by different workmen relative to their dismissal for having voted for Mr. Mellor; detailed explanations hereon, 2562 et seq.; 2686-2697. 2739-2743—— Exceedingly quiet character of the Parliamentary election, 2580, 2581——Violence at some of the municpal elections, there being no dread of legal proceedings, 2582-2586——Stop put to corrupt practices on the Conservative side; explanation hereon as to legal proceedings not having been taken against the other side, 2587-2600.

Recommendation that the same law as to bribery, treating, and intimidation be applied to municipal as to Parliamentary elections, 2594. 2604—— Opinion favourable to the ballot for the protection of working men, both at municipal and Parliamentary elections, 2601-2603. 2650, 2651——Statement in explanation of the Victim List at Ashton; extent to which circulated, 2611-2620.

Reference to a notice posted by Mr. Oldham Whittaker as showing that he acknowledged having dismissed men for voting contrary to his wishes, 2620-2624——Absence of intimidation on the part of workmen against each other, 2636-2639—— Strong feeling in the town, and more especially among the working classes, in favour of Mr. Mellor; statement hereon that the extension of the franchise has rendered the Conservative party much the more numerous, 2653-2660. 2698-2704—Feeling of Conservative working men at Ashton, and of the working men generally, in favour of the ballot, 2661-2668.

Grounds

Grounds for the conclusion that undue influence was exercised as regards the municipal votes of the workmen at Hurst mills, 2669-2685——Injury rather than benefit to the Conservative cause at Ashton through the lectures of Mr. Murphy before the Parliamentary election, 2732-2738——Further reference to the intimidation as regards workmen of Mr. Hugh Mason; question hereon as to certain expenditure by Mr. Mason in the erection of schools and reading rooms, 2752-2760.

Hankel, Allan Stewart. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is conversant with the system of elections in South Carolina; left the country six or seven years ago, 9955-9959. 10027-10029——Regulation by each State in the Union of its own mode of elections, 9960——Preliminary proceedings at elections in South Carolina; there is no nomination, 9961-9972——Appointment by the Governor of the State of managers who conduct the elections, and act as returning officers, 9965-9967——Necessity of a poll even though there are not more candidates than vacancies, 9973-9979——Steps taken to bring the candidates before the public, and to canvass for them, 9980-9987.

Particulars relative to the form of ballot in use in South Carolina; option of the voter to use any kind of voting paper he pleased, 9988-9994. 10002—— Option of the voter as to folding up the voting paper before placing it in the ballot-box, there being no rule as to the voting being kept secret, 9993, 9994——Very little check upon personation or disqualification, 9995-10001. 10041-10044. 10089-10091——Information relative to the qualification for the franchise, 9997. 10030-10040. 10084-10088——Circumstance of there having been no registration of voters in South Carolina, or in the other States; explanation hereon as to an attempt to register by means of a capitation tax, 9998. 10041-10044. 10050, 10051. 10069-10071. 10080.

Practice in South Carolina as to the custody of the ballot-boxes, and the counting of the votes after the ballot, 10002——Statement that under the ballot intimidation, mob violence, bribery, and personation have been practised to an excessive degree, the elections in this country being conducted in an infinitely preferable manner, 10003 et seq.——System of voting "early and often" at the elections in the States, 10019. 10044. 10133-10135.

Examination upon the question whether the ballot, as in South Carolina and other States, is not very badly devised and carried out, and therefore is no sound argument against the adoption of an efficient ballot system, 10041 et seq.——Great obstruction to the voting of respectable persons at elections in New York, 10063-10065. 10092-10101——Anxious inquiry in America for many years with a view to preventing the corruption at the elections, 10072-10074.

Very general feeling in South Carolina in disapproval of the present system of voting, 10102-10113. 10119——System in some of the States of voting for a number of candidates for different offices at the same election, 10120-10129——Absence of any effort by law to enforce secrecy, though it is very frequently practised by the electors, 10130, 10131.

Harkness, Christopher. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Provost of Dumfries; has acted as agent for Liberal candidates at several elections for the burgh, 8388, 8389——Denial of the accuracy of Mr. McGowan's evidence as to the prevalence of treating at the burgh elections, 8390-8394——Denial also of Mr. McGowan's statement that there was great abuse by the magistrates in the granting of licenses in 1868 with reference to the election; examination in detail upon this subject, 8395-8397. 8405-8454——Avoidance of much tumult and riot at the Dumfries elections if there were no public nomination, and no declaration of the poll, 8397-8404.

Harris, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides in Cardiganshire, and has taken an active interest in the politics and elections of the county; has also a general knowledge of the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke, 6199-6207. 6327-6330. 6347——Nonconformist character of the great bulk of the people of Cardiganshire, the great majority of them being Liberals, whilst the landlords are nearly all Conservatives, 6209-6212——Great coercion used at the last election for the county by the landowners, such coercion having been shown in various forms, 6213-6222.

Belief in the county that about 200 notices to quit have been served on tenants on account of their votes at the last election, 6223——Inquiry made by witness in various parts of the county on the subject of notices to quit; particular cases submitted to the Committee in proof of the undue influence exercised by the landlords, 6224 et seq.; 6297-6299. 6390-6400——Statement that nearly all the farmers in Wales are tenants at will, and have not, as a rule, any means of receiving compensation for improvements, 6282, 6283. 6320-6326.

Active influence exercised by the dissenting clergy in the Cardiganshire elections, and also by the clergy of the Established Church; witness is not aware of any undue influence by the former, 6284-6296——Evidence as to the extensive pressure put upon the tenants at the Carmarthenshire election; illustrations of this, and of the issue of notices to quit in respect of their votes, 6300–6319. 6357–6359.

Strong feeling in Wales in favour of the ballot, 6331. 6339——Independent feeling of the tenants in Church matters and in general politics, the protection of the ballot being greatly needed, in order to secure freedom of election, 6332 et seq.——Importance of abolishing canvassing in connection with the adoption of the ballot, 6340. 6349–6354.

Question as to the effect of the ballot in leading to deception on the part of tenants, this being however a less evil than the abuse under the present system of intimidation, 6350–6352. 6402–6406——Expectation alike of Whig and Tory landlords that their tenants will vote with them, the latter having great repugnance to the constraint put upon them, 6355–6382. 6407–6409——Strong feeling of the tenants as to the want of leases or of tenant right, 6368, 6369.

Hartlepool. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of the sitting Members, App. 570.

Hebbert, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a house agent at Windsor, and receives rents for the corporation, 896, 897——Opinion that there are not more than thirty-five or forty municipal voters at Windsor who receive payment for their votes, 898–904——Practice at Windsor of purchasing cottage property for political or election purposes, 905–909——Belief as to the last municipal election having been worked with reference to the Parliamentary election, 910–912——Prevalence of bribery and intimidation at the Parliamentary elections, so that the ballot has become a positive necessity, 913–946.

Hereford. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the matter of the Hereford City Election Petition, App. 570.

Hill, Colonel Edward S. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a large employer of labour at Bristol and Cardiff; is a member of the Cardiff Town Council, 4636–4639——Voted at Bristol at the last election, early in the day, without experiencing any obstruction, 4640–4642. 4684, 4685——Voted also at Cardiff, but was seriously assaulted by the Liberal mob; submits particulars relative to the violence of the mob, and states that many of the supporters of the Conservative candidate were intimidated from voting, 4643 et seq.——On the nomination day there was an organized mob in the Liberal interest, 4654–4678.

Active part taken in the Cardiff election by the dissenting ministers, and by the clergy generally, 4668–4672. 4679–4683. 4692–4694——Expediency of mobs being prevented by force from intimidating and molesting the electors, 4686——Approval of the use of voting papers under proper safeguards, 4686, 4687——Valuable services of the Cardiff police and the Bute police at the election, 4688–4690.

Hodgson, William Nicholson (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was a candidate for Carlisle at the last election; is now member for West Cumberland, 12370, 12371——Is a director of the London and North Western Railway Company; the Company having works within the borough of Carlisle, 12372–12376——Explains the circumstances under which, very reluctantly, he canvassed the voters in the company's works; positively denies that he used any pressure or undue influence in respect of their votes, 12377 et seq——Denies also that the reduction of the establishment at Carlisle, involving the dismissal of several voters who polled against witness, had any connection with the election, 12391–12411. 12421–12441.

Statement as to the great majority of the men in the Maryport and Carlisle Railway at Carlisle, having voted for Sir Wilfred Lawson, who is a director of the railway, 12419, 12420——Large majority of the men in the employment of the corporation who voted against witness, 12420——Admission as to the very large majority of the North Western Company's men having voted for witness, 12421, 12422.

Hours of Polling. Proposed extension of the hours of polling in large constituencies of working men, Johnstone 3236–3240.

Hughes, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Boot and shoe dealer at Liverpool; acted as secretary for the Conservatives at the municipal election of 1867; 4851–4853——Submits that certain statements of Mr. Johnson to the committee relative to treating and bribery on the part of the Conservatives at the Liverpool municipal elections are entirely untrue, 4854–4866——Entire inaccuracy of the evidence of Mr. Johnson with respect to the election and conduct of witness as assessor for his ward on the Conservative side, 4857, 4858. 4867–4872.

Explanation as to witness not acting as overseer, though recommended to the magistrates for the purpose, 4873–4875——Particulars relative to the functions and mode of action of witness as one of the assessors for his ward at the municipal elections; nomination nation or election of one assessor on each side, who acts with the alderman, 4877–4893. 4910–4935——Positive denial of certain charges with reference to the conduct of witness at the elections; he has never been proceeded against for bribery, &c., 4894–4909.

Hull. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Messrs. Norwood and Clay, App. 571.

Hunt, The Right Honourable George Ward (Member of the Committee). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Great inconvenience and expense in county elections through the voters having frequently to go many miles to the polling places, the expense of providing conveyance falling upon the candidates, 9490. 9534, 9535——Proposition that county voters be enabled to vote in their own parishes, the votes to be taken by the overseer and forwarded to the returning officer, 9490 et seq.

Suggestion for making the register answer the purpose of a poll-book, as part of witness's scheme, 9490——Proposal that every voter should receive from the overseer a duplicate of the entry of his vote, it being also contemplated that the poll sheets for each parish be published; check thereby upon falsification, 9490. 9521–9523——Consideration of objections to the scheme on the ground that the overseers are not fit to be trusted with the duty of taking the votes, and would moreover require assistance; belief that there is no good ground for these objections, 9491–9496. 9503–9505. 9519, 9520. 9525–9530.

Explanation that the scheme does not include any facilities for non-resident voters, though some arrangement might be made for taking their votes away from their parishes, 9497. 9510, 9511——Means of checking the expense of conveyance to the poll by increasing the number of polling places; increased expense however in the latter case, 9501, 9502. 9516–9518——Great saving of expense under witness's scheme, even if the overseer required assistance, and if check clerks were employed, 9502, 9503. 9508. 9512–9515.

Equal neeessity for a polling place in each parish if the ballot be adopted, 9503——Proposal that under witness's scheme the conveyance of voters to the poll be declared illegal, 9507–9509——Doubt as to facilities for undue influence by landlords and others under the plan of local or parish voting, 9527–9530——Advantage if the ballot be adopted, of a ballot box in each parish, and of the votes in the county being taken simultaneously, 9531–9534.

I.

Illegal Acts. Explanation as to there being certain illegal acts which involve penalties, but cannot be held as vitiating the election, Sir S. Martin 10524–10526. 10621–10628——Doubt as to the expediency of enacting that certain illegal acts shall void the election, ib. 10621–10625.

Imprisonment. Objection to any extensive exercise by the judge of his power to imprison for certain offences, Sir S. Martin 10663, 10664.

I. Influence exercised at the Elections by the Landlords and the Roman Catholic Clergy respectively:

1. Evidence in Condemnation of the Action of the Landlords, and in Defence of that of the Priests:

Active and undue influence exercised in the rural districts by the landlords, and way in which it is shown; counteracting influence exercised by the priests, Murphy 5302–5305. 5308–5313. 5356–5367. 5373–5381. 5441, 5442. 5497–5500. 5516–5526——Belief that the influence of the priests is exercised in the direction in which the people themselves would like to vote, if uncontrolled by the landlords, ib. 5308–5313. 5326. 5376, 5377. 5518. 5521. 5540–5542——Part taken by the Liberal candidates and by the priests in addressing the people on Sunday when that day precedes the polling day, ib. 5415–5420.

Very great influence exercised by the priests, who come between the landlord and the voter, Raleigh 5584-5586. 5602–5607——The principles of the voter and the priest generally agree, ib. 5585.

The great majority of the tenant voters go with the escorts against their own inclinations, in order to vote according to the wishes of the landlords; frequent instances of this, McMurdo 7510–7515. 7576–7596. 7676, 7677. 7758——Conclusion as to the majority of the tenants being unduly influenced by the landlords, the result being that a counteracting influence is exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy; preference for the latter influence, as compared with the former, ib. 7515. 7554, 7555. 7589–7596. 7635. 7650–7652. 7688–7699. 7779, 7780——Doubt as to the priests ever interfering to prevent mob influence, 7628–7635——Question considered whether, notwithstanding the alleged landlord influence, Liberal representatives have not been very generally returned, ib. 7688–7699.

Belief as to the great spread of Fenian projects if the priests kept aloof from political subjects, McDermot 8577–8579——Little, if any, influence of the priests at elections if they went counter to the opinions of the people, ib. 8583–8590——Fear of public opinion and not the influence of the priests, which neutralises the action of the landlords, ib. 8593, 8594.

Opinion that the issue of the general election in Ireland was peace or rebellion, McDermot 8597. 8618–8621——Extent to which it may be said that Roman Catholicism in Ireland is identified with Liberalism, ib. 8616–8618. 8651–8653. 8675–8684.

Very active interference of the priests when there is some great principle at stake in the elections, as when the question is between Protestant ascendancy and religious equality; justification of such interference, Right Rev. G. Butler 11515–11520. 11585 et seq.——Action of the priests with a view to the people voting according to their convictions, and independently of bribery or landlord intimidation, ib. 11515, 11516. 11519. 11553——Great reluctance with which the priests interfere in political contests, ib. 11517——Tendency to revolutionary projects but for the counsel of the priests, ib. 11518——Misfortune entailed by the franchise, as involving possible eviction, ib. 11556.

Examination in detail upon the question whether the priests are justified in exercising their spiritual influence from the altar and otherwise, with reference to the exercise of the franchise; argument in justification of their course of action in the matter, Right Rev. G. Butler 11585 et seq.; 11696–11700——Advantage if the priests could conscientiously abstain from taking part in the turmoil of elections, ib. 11666–11670——Notoriety of the fact that when Roman Catholic tenants vote against the Liberal party it is against their own conviction, ib. 11690–11695.

2. Evidence to a contrary purport.

Very general exercise of priestly influence at elections in Ireland, Stokes 4457——Great advantage if the clergy of all persuasions could be debarred from taking any part in the elections, Spaight 6885.

Great and undue influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at the elections generally; particular instances of this, Norwood 8105–8118. 8117–8120. 8228–8244——Absence of undue interference by the Presbyterian clergy in Ireland, ib. 8133. 8159–8162.

Impression as to there being priestly intimidation in Ireland, rather than landlord intimidation, Percy 11336, 11337. 11413–11434.

Reference to a confidential report of witness as showing the immense influence exercised at the elections by the priests, Lord Strathnairn 11748–11750——Numerous instances of violence at the last elections owing to the harangues of the priests; reference to the charge of Judge Keogh at Drogheda, in illustration of this, ib. 11764–11782——Particular instance of excessively violent language of a priest: testimony given by a policeman in this case, ib. 11765–11770. 11776–11791——Conclusion as to the improper and unconstitutional position assumed by the priests as regards the elections, ib. 11782.

II. Employment

IRELAND—continued.

II. Employment of Troops and Escorts at the Elections :

1. Evidence in Condemnation of the present System, and of the Arrangements at the General Election :

Witness submits that the wholesale employment of troops at the elections, more especially as escorts for rural voters, is extremely objectionable and prevents all freedom of election, McMurdo 7510 et seq.——Statement to the effect that the military officers regard the voters under escort in the light of prisoners; instructions issued by witness adverted to hereon, ib. 7516-7522. 7653-7668——Strong disapproval of the present system of employing the military fully armed, for the suppression of election riots: memorandum prepared by witness on this question consequently upon the Drogheda riots, ib. 7524-7529. 7537. 7539. 7568.

State of military occupation of the country at the last elections involving great expense, McMurdo 7530-7533. 7556-7558——Explanation of the practice in regard to requisitions for escorts: action in this respect of the landlords as resident or local magistrates, ib. 7543, 7544. 7572-7575. 7599-7618. 7733-7757. 7788-7791——Effect of the presence of the military in inducing riots, ib. 7550. 7649. 7724. 7727-7730 —— Very long period for which it has been the practice of successive governments to employ the military at the elections, ib. 7551, 7552.

Question considered, whether under the ballot, military escorts would not still be required ; objection in any case to such escorts, save as citizens or special constables, not armed with deadly weapons, McMurdo 7565-7571. 7576 et seq.——General feeling of army officers in disapproval of the present system of military escorts in Ireland, ib. 7584. 7759-7761. 7782-7787——Probability of many voters not polling at all, if not escorted by military conveys, ib. 7589-7617——Belief as to the military being usually asked for by the Conservative landlords, ib. 7618.

Impression among the people that the military are used by Tory governments for purposes of coercion at the elections, Right Rev. G. Butler, 11535-11538. 11680-11684 ——Doubt as to the necessity of escorts in order to enable men to vote with their landlords, if so disposed conscientiously ; danger however in times of excitement in dispensing with troops, ib. 11685-11689.

2. Explanation and Defence of the System, and of the Action of Government and the Magistrates :

Opinion that the military should still be available at Irish elections, but should be kept out of the way until really required, Norwood 8152, 8153——Obstacle to dispensing with the military even if the ballot be introduced, ib. 8154-8158.

Practice of witness and of stipendiary magistrates generally as to the granting of escorts upon application by agents and others without sworn informations, Percy 11179-11183——Impression as to some voters being under the notion that they cannot leave the escort, ib. 11189-11191——Great advantage if military escorts could be dispensed with: conclusion that the voters generally might reach the poll safely if really anxious to vote, ib. 11237-11253——Opinion as to the necessity of military escorts being accompanied by a magistrate, whilst the constabulary can act on their own responsibility, ib. 11273-11277. 11375-11385.

Further evidence to the effect that the voters under escort are free to leave the escort, and that certain statements made on this subject by General McMurdo are not well founded, Percy 11280-11295. 11366-11374—— Belief as to escorts being applied for by the Roman Catholic party at elections in the north of Ireland, ib. 11303-11306—— Opinion as to the sufficiency of a constable for accompanying a military escort, when a magistrate is not available, ib. 11435-11437.

Witness explains the general character of the instructions in force relative to the employment of troops at the last general election in Ireland, Lord Strathnairn 11713-11723. 11825——There is no ground whatever for any impression that military officers consider voters under escort in the light of prisoners, ib. 11727-11731. 11809, 11810. 11826-11828—— Conclusion as to many voters going under escort and voting with their landlords very much against their own convictions, ib. 11732, 11733. 11811.

Statement of the practice in regard to requisitions and orders upon which escorts are granted; the utmost impartiality is observed in the matter by Government, Lord Strathnairn 11734-11741——Instruction by witness for the employment of cavalry if available; illustration at Drogheda of the prudence of this instruction, ib. 11744, 11745.

Entire inaccuracy of the impression that the troops are ever used for political purposes, Lord Strathnairn 11753. 11758, 11759—— Obligation in regard to the troops or escorts being accompanied by a magistrate, or, when that is not possible, by a sub-constable, ib. 11754-11758. 11812-11817. 11826——Impossibility of dispensing with troops at the elections, ib. 11760, 11761. 11792.

Further statement that the officer in command of an escort would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty if he did not allow each voter freely to leave the escort, Lord

IRELAND—continued.

II. Employment of Troops and Escorts at Elections—continued.

2. Explanation and Defence of the System, &c.—continued.

Strathnairn 11809–11821. 11826–11828——Large expense of the movement of troops at the elections, ib. 11822.

Statement as to the inaccuracy of General McMurdo's evidence on the subject of voters under military escort being considered as prisoners, or under control, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11829–11835——Comment upon a statement by General McMurdo to the effect that too many troops were employed at the elections; conclusion that the precautions taken by the late Government in this respect were in no instance excessive, ib. 11836–11840.

Comment upon the course taken by Liberal candidates or their friends in spreading the impression that the military and police were used by Government for purposes of coercion, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11852–11855. 11859, 11860. 11926, 11927——Impartial way in which escorts were provided, ib. 11856–11858——Belief that in the present state of Ireland it is essential to employ troops at the elections, ib. 11866.

Concurrence in the view that if possible the use of troops at the elections should be dispensed with, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11882——Necessity of the orders of a magistrate before the troops can act; this does not apply to the constabulary, ib. 11883–11886——Distinctive features of elections in Ireland compared with English elections, so that the employment of troops is indispensable, ib. 11932–11940——Impartial employment of resident magistrates at the elections, without any reference to their political views, ib. 11942–11947.

3. Question as to the mode of Arming the Troops:

Proposition that two-thirds of the troops employed at Irish elections should be armed with sticks or truncheons, instead of with deadly weapons which they do not use; one-third of each contingent should be fully armed and kept in reserve, McMurdo 7521. 7524–7528. 7541, 7542. 7562–7564. 7623–7625. 7670. 7709–7726.

Strong objection to General McMurdo's suggestion, that the military at elections should be armed only with sticks, Percy 11319–11322——Letter from witness to General McMurdo, objecting to the arming of the troops with sticks, Lord Strathnairn 11746.

III. Employment of the Constabulary:

Very large constabulary force available for use at the elections, McMurdo 7566. 7626, 7267——Statement to the effect that when employed in large bodies at elections the constabulary should not be armed with deadly weapons, ib. 7762–7772——Inadequacy of the constabulary for preserving peace at the elections, Lord Strathnairn 11823, 11824.

Testimony to the conduct of the constabulary generally during the elections: great care taken to prevent their influencing the elections, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11842. 11851, 11852——Impossibility of a magistrate accompanying every constabulary escort, ib. 11847. 11884.

IV. Polling Places:

Advantage of a minute sub-division of polling places, Stokes 4491——Importance attached to an increase in the number of polling places for the counties; great evil at present through the long distances which many voters have to travel, McMurdo 7538. 7553. 7559–7561. 7636–7648. 7679–7686.

Great evils arising from the insufficiency of polling places in Ireland, a large increase in the number being urgently required, Norwood 8125–8129. 8259. 8278. 8307, 8308 —— Necessity of military escorts so long as the polling places are so far apart, ib. 8125–8127——Increased opportunities for mob intimidation and violence through the insufficiency of polling places, ib. 8125–8129——Great expense to the voters in having to travel long distances to the poll, ib. 8125——Probability of the military being still required in some cases even though the polling places be increased in number, ib. 8211–8217.

Concurrence in the view as to the importance of an increased number of polling places at county elections, as in Sligo and Tipperary, Percy 11323–11328; Lord Strathnairn 11793–11795. 11800; Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11887.

V. Question of the Ballot:

1. Evidence favourable to the Introduction of the Ballot in Ireland:

Opinion that the ballot is the only remedy for the evils experienced at the elections: expectation that it would prevent not only corrupt influences but the employment of mobs and the consequent riots and intimidation, Murphy 5314–5326. 5372–5377. 5395–5399. 5404–5410. 5479–5487. 5501——Doubt as to Roman Catholic voters not being perfectly perfectly able to maintain secrecy under the ballot; they would not feel bound to divulge to their priests how they voted, Murphy 5320–5326. 5479–5487——Very little difficulty as to the ballot, through the state of education of the people, most of whom can read and write, ib. 5446–5448.

Belief that the ballot would be an immense advantage at the elections, and that under it the Roman Catholic clergy would not exercise any undue influence over their flocks, Ellard 7180–7182. 7197–7202. 7215–7217. 7237, 7238. 7257–7261——Strong feeling in Limerick in favour of the ballot, the Conservatives however being afraid that priestly influence would still prevail, ib. 7197, 7198——Inaccuracy of the view that the confessional would be used as a means of ascertaining how votes were given, ib. 7197–7202. 7257–7259.

Evidence strongly in favour of the ballot in Ireland as the most effectual means of preventing undue influence, and as tending to obviate the necessity for escorts, McMurdo 7537, 7538. 7553. 7565–7571. 7576–7579. 7621, 7622——Less political interference of the priests if the ballot were in force, ib. 7781.

Opinion that the ballot can alone secure freedom of voting in Ireland; that is, if perfect secrecy be secured, McDermot 8591–8594. 8603. 8609, 8610——Inaccuracy of the view that priestly influence would be increased by the ballot, ib. 8593——Effect of the ballot in removing that public or popular influence by which landlord intimidation is now neutralised, ib.

Statement that in the confessional voters would not declare how they had voted, whilst if the priest obtained such knowledge in the confessional he would be debarred from divulging it, McDermot 8595–8602. 8685–8690.

Belief that the ballot would operate just as well in Ireland as in South Australia, Dutton 9286.

Decided approval of the ballot in Ireland, as a preventive to bribery and landlord intimidation, Right Rev. G. Butler 11521–11523. 11555——Probability of the priests withdrawing very much from politics if there were the ballot: they would however still urge upon the people the duty of exercising the franchise, ib. 11524. 11552, 11553. 11670. 11710, 11711.

Statement to the effect that under the ballot the confessional would not be used by the priest as a means of discovering how a man had voted, nor could the priest divulge any information so obtained, Right Rev. G. Butler 11523–11534. 11539–11551. 11583, 11584. 11647–11658——Improbability of the people not maintaining secrecy about their votes if they had the ballot, ib. 11554——Absence of any necessity for troops at the elections if there were the ballot, ib. 11703.

2. Evidence opposed to the Ballot:

Grounds for the conclusion that the ballot in Ireland would be no protection against priestly influence and would operate very adversely towards the Conservatives, Stokes 4495–4507. 4598–4623.

Argument that as regards the Limerick elections the ballot would be no effectual check upon priestly influence and intimidation, though it might protect the voter against the landlord, Spaight 6881–6885. 6906–6912. 6950–6954. 7006. 7015–7025. 7076–7089.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that in Ireland the ballot would not prevent priestly influence, and would not secure secrecy of voting, Norwood 8134–8147. 8218–8251——Instances of Roman Catholics in Ireland opposed to the ballot, whilst it is disapproved by Protestants generally, ib. 8147. 8248–8251.

Unfairness of the ballot as admitting of undue influence on the part of the priests, Lord Strathnairn 11793. 11796——Improbability of the ballot enabling the military to be dispensed with, though there might not be the same amount of rioting, ib. 11797–11809.

Grounds for the conclusion that the adoption of the ballot in Ireland would not tend to promote tranquillity at the elections, the opposing parties being clearly defined, and well known to each other, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11867–11881. 11950–11952——Probability of the ballot increasing the influence of the priests, ib. 11878, 11879——Want of better education before the ballot is introduced, ib. 11881. 11948, 11949.

VI. Conclusions and Recommendations in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee:

Comment on Draft Report of the Chairman of the Committee upon the extensive exercise of landlord intimidation in Ireland, Rep. xviii——Powerful influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy in opposition to the landlords' influence, ib.——Organised mobs employed at the elections, so that it becomes a necessity to employ troops for the protection of voters, ib.

VI. Conclusions and Recommendations in Draft Report, &c.—continued.

Conclusion that the influence which is first exercised, and which provokes, if it does not justify, the counter influence set in motion, is that of landlords and their agents, Rep. xviii——Absence of freedom of election in many boroughs and counties under the present system, ib. xviii, xx.

Conclusion as to the expediency of the adoption of the ballot as the best remedy for the abuses of the existing system, Rep. xix, xx——Advantage of the ballot as a means of enabling the authorities to dispense with the employment of troops, ib. xx.

Irving, John. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a member of the corporation of Carlisle for some years, and is well conversant with the political opinions of the working classes in the borough, 9359, 9360. 9363, 9364. 9443, 9444——Total of 154 electors in the employment of the London and North-Western Railway Company at Carlisle at the time of the last election, 136 of whom plumped for Mr. Hodgson, 9361, 9362——Evidence in support of the conclusion that these men were for the most part Liberals, and were unduly influenced to vote for Mr. Hodgson, who is a director of the railway company, 9363 et seq.

Particulars relative to a mechanics' institute in connection with the workshops of the company, in which out of seven daily papers taken in six are Liberal; inference as to the great majority of the voters in the works being Liberals, 9365–9368. 9414–9417. 9462–9472——Statement relative to the canvass of the men in the works, and the improper course taken by Mr. Hodgson, as being a director, in personally canvassing them on one occasion, 9369 et seq.——Discharge after the election of five men out of six who had voted against Mr. Hodgson, whilst a very small proportion was discharged of those who voted for him; details on this subject, 9372. 9383–9387. 9395. 9418–9430. 9455–9461. 9473–9481.

Statement issued by some of the men in the works on the nomination day denying certain allegations in respect of their canvass by Mr. Hodgson; inaccuracy of this statement, 9378–9380. 9485–9489——Circumstance of the directors of the London and North-Western Company having declined any interference on the question of their workmen's votes; comment on their proceedings on the subject, 9388–9394. 9431–9438——Satisfactory notice issued by the North-Eastern Company, prohibiting canvassing at their Carlisle works; result as regards the voting of the men, 9391. 9396–9398. 9439–9455——Circumstance of three men at the London and North-Western Company's works having preferred disfranchisement rather than bear coercion, 9398.

[Second Examination.]—Explanation that many of the voters on the railway works are not now members of the institute, though formerly all the men were necessarily members, 12764–12766——Recent date at which a second Conservative paper has been taken in at the institute, 12766.

ITALY (BALLOT SYSTEM):

Sundry details in connection with the ballot system in Italy, showing that the elections are conducted without undue influence or bribery, with little expense to the candidates, and with very beneficial results generally, Probyn 12283 et seq.——Strictly secret character of the Italian ballot, ib. 12291——Way in which the voting papers are procured by the electors, and character of the precautions against fraud, ib. 12292–12303. 12316–12324——Arrangements as to the voter writing on the voting paper the name of the candidate for whom he polls, the candidates being well known through public meetings, &c., and there being no nomination, ib. 12292–12298. 12352–12354. 12357–12364.

Conservative majority in the Italian Chamber under the ballot system of election, Probyn 12300. 12349, 12350——Out of a population of 25,000,000, about 1,000,000 are qualified to vote, ib. 12305. 12323, 12324——Considerable interest taken by the voters in the elections; statement hereon as to the proportion who poll as compared with the proportion in this country, ib. 12306–12309. 12335–12338. 12365–12369——Effect of the ballot in Italy in neutralising all unfair influence on the part of the priests, ib. 12312–12314. 12325–12331.

Contrast between the elections in Italy and in England, Probyn 12332——Witness's experience of the ballot in Italy has thoroughly converted him to that system of voting, ib. 12332——Very orderly conduct of the elections, the military never being employed, ib. 12333, 12334.

Forms of the voting papers in use in Milan, App. 603.

J.

Johnson, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Carries on business at Liverpool in the Toxteth North and South Wards, comprising voters chiefly of the middle and working classes, 1931–1937——Testifies in detail to the great prevalence of bribery and treating at the municipal elections for these wards, on the part both of Liberals and Conservatives, 1938 et seq.——Particulars as to the bribery by the Conservatives at the municipal elections in November 1868, whilst there was no bribery on the part of the Liberals, witness having been chairman of the Liberal committee of his ward, 1960–1972. 2021. 2023.

Proceedings taken for the punishment of one of those guilty of bribery; great expense incurred, a verdict having been obtained, with costs, 1973–1980. 2033–2038. 2146–2151——Contemplated proceedings against the assessor at the polling-booth for bribery; circumstance of his having been recently elected as overseer, 1980. 1985–1991——Obstacles at the polling-booths from the crowd, whilst there was much drunkenness, 1992–1994.

Decided effect of the bribery at the municipal elections at Liverpool upon the voting at the Parliamentary elections, 1995–1998. 2071–2078——Belief that there was no bribery at the last Parliamentary election, but there was much intimidation; instance of this on the part of the Conservatives, 1997. 2010–2026——Approval of the proposal for closing the public-houses on the day of the election, and for prohibiting the use of public-houses as committee-rooms, 2004–2008. 2090–2092. 2110–2113.

Statement that in consequence of the intimidation and other corrupt practices at the Liverpool elections, witness has at length come to the conclusion that the ballot is essential, many local Conservatives being of the same opinion, 2009–2017. 2062, 2063. 2069, 2070——Low class of persons who receive bribes at the municipal elections; very similar class of persons on the Parliamentary register, 2027–2032. 2160–2168——Information on the subject of the revision of the list of municipal electors at Liverpool, 2041–2052. 2126–2142.

Corrupt practices in some of the other wards in Liverpool as well as in the Toxteth wards, 2064–2068—— Large majority of the successful candidate in the Toxteth wards, both at the municipal and Parliamentary elections, 2071–2078——Beneficial effect of the last Bribery Act in restricting corrupt practices at the last Parliamentary election for Liverpool, 2080, 2081. 2163——Importance of a public prosecutor, and of greatly increased facilities of punishment for corrupt practices, 2082, 2383. 2164, 2165.

Advantage of an increased number of polling places at the Liverpool elections, 2084–2088——Very little treating at the last Parliamentary election, 2089——Approval of a prohibition upon the employment of paid canvassers, 2093–2109——Doubt as to the local feeling being favourable to paying out of the rates the expenses of the Parliamentary elections, 2106. 2152–2159——Conveyance of voters to the poll at the last municipal election, but not at the Parliamentary election, 2114–2117. 2143–2145.

Reference to the bribery at the municipal election of 1867, as having been practised on both sides, whereas no prosecutions followed, 2118–2125——Statement on the subject of the existence of bribery at the municipal elections, but not at the last Parliamentary elections; that is, with reference to the character of the constituency in each case, 2160–2170.

Johnston, Frank. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a manufacturer at Blackburn; has for several years taken part in the municipal and Parliamentary elections, 3056–3059——Testifies to the very extensive prevalence of bribery and treating at the municipal elections, each of the six wards being equally corrupt, 3060–3073. 3145–3153. 3206–3209——Circumstance of legal proceedings having never been taken in respect of any corrupt practices except personation, 3074–3082. 3167–3175——Particulars relative to the intimidation and obstruction resorted to at the municipal elections, all these elections being conducted as political contests, 3083 et seq.

Evidence as to the intimidation at the Parliamentary election in November 1868, and also at the recent election in March; belief that bribery also was resorted to, 3098–3101. 3125–3150. 3178–3184, 3210, 3211——Very little feeling in the borough against bribery, 3103, 3104——Statement showing the great excitement in connection with the last municipal election on account of the effect of such election on the Parliamentary election then near at hand; undue influence on the part of Conservative employers, whilst bribery was very extensively practised, 3105–3124. 3134, 3135. 3151–3163.

Danger of disfranchisement if there had been a searching inquiry after the Parliamentary election, 3130, 3131——Very few unnecessary nominations at the municipal elections, 3176, 3177——Large majority of operatives in the constituency, 3178, 3179——Different result of the Parliamentary elections but for the intimidation exercised, 3180–3184——Considerable bribery at some of the former Parliamentary elections, 3185–3200——Small earnings of many of those placed on the register by the late Reform Act, 3201–3205.

Strong approval of the ballot as an effectual remedy for intimidation, 3212——Feeling among Conservatives at Blackburn as well as Liberals in favour of the ballot, 3213, 3214. 3227——Approval of an abolition of nominations, the practice, as at Blackburn, leading to much abuse, 3215-3227——Limited amount of treating at the Parliamentary elections, 3219——Importance of an increased number of polling places at the municipal elections, 3232–3234. 3241–3245.

Expediency of the same system of voting at municipal as at Parliamentary elections, 3235, 3236——Suggestion for assimilating the municipal and Parliamentary franchises, 3236——Proposed extension of the hours of polling in large constituencies of working men, 3236–3240.

Jones, The Rev. Michael Daniel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is principal of the Independent College of Bala, in Merionethshire; has taken an active interest in the county elections, 6541–6548——Information relative to the elections of 1859 and 1865, showing that great intimidation was exercised by the Conservative landlords, and that in several instances tenants were evicted or had their rents raised, as a consequence of not voting on the Tory side, 6549-6585. 6678-6685——Reduction of the rents of some tenants for voting on the Tory side in 1865; 6576, 6577——General rule of landlords in requiring their tenants to vote with them, 6586——Retirement of the Tory candidate at the election in 1868, the Liberal constituency having been increased in number, and a strong feeling having arisen on the subject of the Irish Church, 6587, 6588. 6600–6607. 6613-6618. 6660–6677.

Dread with which the farmers in Merionethshire regard an election; meeting about a year ago at which they resolved to petition Parliament either to relieve them of the franchise or to give them the ballot, 6589-6594. 6608—6612——Instance of a Dissenting congregation in Montgomeryshire having been deprived of their chapel after the election in 1862; examination whether this might not have been owing to the use of the chapel for political meetings, 6595. 6637–6659. 6761–6788——Instance of a chapel having been sold because of the part taken by the clergyman in elections, 6595. 6770. 6775–6778——Denial that the Dissenting clergy in Wales exercised any undue spiritual influence the elections, 6596–6599. 6627. 6697–6702. 6743–6748.

Particulars relative to the quarrymen in Merionethshire, these being of a very independent character, and being chiefly Liberals, 6603, 6604. 6620–6626. 6663–6677. 6696. 6703–6707.

Belief as to the absence of coercion on the Liberal side at the elections in Wales, 6619–6624. 6687-6695. 6802——Considerations as to the influence of the Dissenting clergy in forming the political opinions of the quarrymen and of the voters generally; denial of any undue influence in this respect, 6625–6629. 6696–6728. 6789-6797——Statement as to the landlords in the county being generally against the Liberal side; there are, however, several exceptions to this rule, 6630–6632. 6686. 6729-6737.

Desire among the voters for the ballot, 6635, 6636——Examination on the subject of the use of Dissenting chapels in Wales for political meetings; this is frequently done, and witness approves of the practice, when other accommodation is unavailable, 6639–6659. 6738–6742. 6793–6801. 6803–6814——Doubt as to any difficulty in the working of the ballot in Wales, notwithstanding the defective education of the people, 6749–6760.

Jones, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has acted as agent for the Mostyn estate and for Sir Watkin Wynn's estate in North Wales, for some years, 8455–8460——Inaccuracy of the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Jones, of Bala, implying that intimidation was practised towards Sir Watkin Wynn's tenants in Merionethshire, and that evictions followed in the case of several who voted on the Liberal side in 1865; 8460–8472——Denial that rents have been reduced by Sir Watkin Wynn as a result of support at the elections, 8470, 8471——Explanation as regards the notice to quit given in the case of a Dissenting chapel in Montgomeryshire, that this had nothing to do with the elections, 8474–8479.

Inclination generally of the Welsh tenants to vote with their landlords, 8480–8486——Belief that the ballot in Wales would give increased influence to the Dissenting clergy, their influence being already very great, 8482–8488——Statement as regards the sale of a certain chapel in Merionethshire, that this took place long before the election of 1859, and had nothing to do with it, 8489–8491——Inability of witness to speak to the question of evictions by Sir Watkin Wynn, after the election of 1859; 8492–8494.

Juries. Uselessness of attempting to enforce penalties through juries for breaches of the election law, Sir S. Martin 10593–10597.

K.

Kennedy, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a tenant farmer in Dumfriesshire and other counties, 7792–7797——Took an active part on the side of the Conservative candidate date at the Dumfriesshire election in March 1869; 7798, 7799——Twofold cause to which the defeat of the Conservative candidate at the election in 1868 was owing, the chief cause being, that the tenant farmers did not come forward, 7800–7802. 7854-7856——Great dissatisfaction of the tenant farmers at the return of a stranger in 1868; 7800-7804. 7845-7856——Very active part taken by the tenant farmers generally in behalf of Major Walker at the last election: their action in the matter was entirely spontaneous and the reports of intimidation by landlords and agents are altogether unfounded, voluntary, 7805 et seq.

Disorderly conduct on the Liberal side at the elections in question, 7827–7833——Strong influence exercised by the Dissenting ministers in favour of Sir Sydney Waterlow, 7836-7838. 7871–7876——Inaccuracy of the statement that since the last election public opinion in the county was strongly in favour of the ballot, 7839-7843——Explanation relative to the number of agents employed on each side at the first and second election, 7844–7849. 7891-7893——Statement that more voters changed from the Conservative side to the Liberal side, than from the latter to the former, at the second election, 7884-7888.

King's Lynn. Attempt to prove undue influence in the case of the King's Lynn petition; its failure, Sir S. Martin 10539–10541.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin, in the matter of the King's Lynn petition, App. 571.

Kingstown. Regulation of the municipal elections in Kingstown and Rathmines by Local Acts; qualification in each case, Stokes 4441–4447——Statement that in the Kingstown elections, the Conservative voters are greatly obstructed in polling, there being in fact no freedom of election; steps being taken to remedy this, ib. 4448–4457. 4508-4513. 4521–4528.

Kirk, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Mayor of Staleybridge; has been for several years member of the town council, 3828–3830——Dissent from Mr. Stanley's statement that intimidation and treating prevailed extensively at the Staleybridge municipal elections, 3831, 3832. 3835 et seq——Refutation of a statement by Mr. Stanley, that some railway workmen at Staleybridge, were discharged from employment for voting for the Liberal candidate at the last Parliamentary election, 3832——Inaccuracy of a statement that the town clerk or borough surveyor had taken part in canvassing servants of the Corporation for the Liberal candidate, ib.

Denial, also, of a statement by Mr. Stanley, that some servants of the corporation were discharged for not voting for the Liberal candidate, 3832, 3833——Conclusion as to intimidation not having been practised on the part of Liberal employers; examination on this point generally, and on the reported discharge of certain men by witness's firm, 3834. 3849–3868. 3877 et seq——Explanation relative to the expenditure at municipal contests, and the practice of the committees on each side in regard to treating, 3835–3849. 3869–3876.

Intimidation at the last Parliamentary election on the part of the Murphyite section, 3849–3853. 3908–3916. 3967–3970——Prevention of much treating at Parliamentary elections, if committees were not allowed at public-houses, 3917–3920——Particulars relative to the expenses at the last Parliamentary election for Staleybridge, which came under witness's cognizance as returning officer; statement hereon as to witness not having examined the vouchers, 3921–3938. 4004–4006. 4022–4026——Advantage if public meetings for hearing the views of the candidates were not allowed to be held at public-houses, 3939, 3940. 3998–4003——Decided approval of the ballot, though as regards Staleybridge, it would not have prevented several of the evils which occurred, 3943–3945. 4007–4021——Disapproval of the election expenses being thrown upon the borough instead of being borne by the candidates, 3946–3951. 4027, 4028——Satisfactory operation of the present system of nomination of town councillors at Staleybridge, 3952–3955——Limited amount of personation at the municipal elections, 3957, 3958.

Excitement on the day of Parliamentary nomination and of election, though persons were hardly deterred from voting, 3959–3964——Belief that on neither side was intimidation practised at the mills, 3971–3974——Proceedings on the nomination-day adverted to as showing the expediency of abolishing public nominations from the hustings, 3975–3990——Circumstance of the Conservative Members for Staleybridge and Ashton being supporters of the ballot, 3991–3997——Decided objection to the payment of Members, 4029——Statement relative to the police force of Staleybridge, 4030–4034.

Latham, George William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a magistrate for Mid-Cheshire; was chairman of Mr. Warren's central committee at the last election, 6410–6413 —— Large majority of the farmers in Mid-Cheshire who are Dissenters, whilst the land is nearly all in the hands of Conservative landlords, 6414, 6415, 6526–6531——Numerous signatures of tenant farmers to a requisition to Mr. Warren, and numerous promises to vote for him, whereas nearly 400 of those who were pledged to support him afterwards voted on the Conservative side, 6416–6418. 6439–6445. 6494–6498. 6532.

Conclusion as to the tenantry having largely voted for the Conservative candidates in order to please their landlords, and under coercion by them or their agents, 6418 et seq. ——Excess of Liberal votes polled in the towns beyond the pledges, 6418. 6469–6472 —— Belief that there was no case of eviction of any tenant for his vote; instance, however, of threatened eviction, 6419. 6429, 6430. 6515, 6516——Free permission given to the tenants on Mr. Lloyd's estate at Minshull to vote as they pleased, 6420——Constraint in the case of the tenants on the Wheelock estate of Mr. Ackers, so that they broke their promise to vote for Mr. Warren, 6421, 6422 ——Rare instances of leases in Cheshire, 6428.

Explanation that the landed interest in the county is exercised at elections alike by Liberal landlords and by Conservative landlords, 6432, 6433. 6454——Instance of Liberal tenants having voted on the Conservative side, though assured that they should not suffer for voting according to their conscience, 6435–6438——Majority for the Liberal candidate if the promises received had been fulfilled, 6446–6450——Little interest taken by Cheshire farmers in politics, they being, as a rule, an uneducated class, 6451–6453 —— Undue influence in respect of tradesmen's votes; instances of loss of custom through not voting on the Conservative side, 6455. 6457–6460——Strong influence exercised by the clergy of the Established Church, 6455–6458.

Recent conversion of witness in favour of the ballot; he still believes it an evil, but a far less evil than the system of open voting, 6461–6463——Expectation that under the ballot deception will not be necessary, and that undue influence will not be brought to bear, 6462——Increased necessity for the ballot since the extension of the franchise; expediency of further extension in the counties, if accompanied by the ballot, 6463–6468. 6523–6525——Reference to the action of Lord Egerton of Tatton, and other landlords, in not facilitating the free voting of their tenants; different course pursued by the father of the Liberal candidate, 6473–6480.

Suggested abolition of nominations, 6481——Advantage of closing public-houses on the day of the poll, 6481. 6520——Proposal that all meetings be held at places not public-houses, such as school-rooms, 6481–6483. 6521——Expediency of prohibiting expense for the conveyance of voters to the poll, with certain exceptions, 6484–6487. 6533, 6534——Doubt as to the necessity of any further increase in the number of polling-places in Mid-Cheshire, 6485–6487——Approval of the abolition of paid canvassing, 6488.

Expenditure of about 3,500 l. on the Liberal side at the Mid-Cheshire election in respect of one candidate, the expense on the other side having been about double, 6489–6491——Exception in the case of Congleton of voters having expected a bribe, 6492, 6493——Statement relative to the tumult at some of the meetings in the towns; riotous mob at Sandbach on the Conservative side, 6502–6514——Occurrence of treating on both sides, 6517, 6518——Desire among the tenant farmers for the ballot; its advantage as causing them to take a greater interest in politics, 6535–6540.

II. Parliamentary Elections:

1. Employment of Mobs, and consequent Disturbances and Riots:

Universal practice of employing hired mobs on each side chiefy on the nomination day; frequent riots and disturbances in consequence, Murphy 5287. 5290–5307. 5327 5348. 5393, 5394. 5413–5430. 5457–5471——Employment of the mobs for the purpose of accompanying the canvassing party, and for cheering and shouting, so as to give prestige and popularity to the candidate, ib. 5295, 5296. 5328. 5335. 5433——Statement that on the polling day in Limerick the mobs are quiet, and that voters may go to the poll without obstruction; this was so at the last election, ib. 5300, 5301. 5387–5392. 5400–5402. 5424–5430. 5502——Effect of mob intimidation as regards Roman Catholic shopkeepers and voters who are suspected to vote on the Conservative side, ib. 5302. 5306, 5307——Payment of the mobs at the rate of 2 s. 6 d. per man per day, no voters being included, ib. 5327. 5457–5471.

Further statement as to the use of mobs being recognised, and as to disturbances and assaults being the general result; explanation hereon as to the action of the magistrates in the matter, Murphy 5328–5348. 5393——Expediency of something being done to put down the mobs and riots; difficulty of effectually preventing the evil by means of the military and police, ib. 5370, 5371. 5393, 5394. 5502–5512.

Details relative to the employment of hired mobs at the Parliamentary elections; expediency of a suppression of the evil, Raleigh 5569, 5570. 5573. 5578–5582. 5614 et seq.——Action of the mobs in intimidating the voters and in damaging their houses, ib. 5580–5582. 5592–5595. 5642–5651——Particulars relative to the hiring of the mobs, the men employed being generally without character, ib. 5614–5624.

Great violence at the election in 1837, when Mr. Monsell was the Conservative candidate, Spaight 6820–6824——Dreadful violence also at the election in 1852, the supporters of Mr. Russell having been in great danger, and the houses of many of them having been wrecked by the mob, ib. 6825–6827——Attacks made upon well-known Conservatives, as well as upon Roman Catholic voters who do not support the Liberal side, ib. 6873–6876.

Practice of wrecking Conservatives' houses as a means of intimidation, Spaight 6863–6868. 7120–7125——Necessary precautions taken by witness at election times, in order to prevent his house being wrecked; statement as to its having been wrecked in 1865 in the presence of the military, ib. 6874. 7055–7062——Further statement as to the inaccuracy of Mr. Murphy's evidence, that intimidation by mobs does not prevail on the polling day, ib. 6897–6905. 7120–7125——Employment of mobs on both sides for canvassing; practice in this respect at the last election, ib. 6913–6923. 6941–6949.

Considerable influence exercised at the elections by the mobs; frequent instances of violence and intimidation on their part, Ellard 7142–7146. 7157. 7183–7191. 7221–7233——Confirmation of Mr. Spaight's evidence as to the attack upon his house at a former election, ib. 7144. 7274——Very great violence at Mr. Russell's election in 1852, ib. 7145. 7186–7191. 7233.

Very exaggerated character of a statement by Mr. Spaight as to the injury done to his house at the election in 1865, Right Rev. G. Butler 11503–11505——Occasional disorder at the elections through the meeting of opposing canvassing parties, ib. 11663–11665.

2. Influence exercised by the Roman Catholic Clergy:

Very active part taken by the priests in the elections; witness is not aware, however, of any political addresses delivered in the chapels, Murphy 5411, 5412——Denial that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, was present in the polling booths at the last election, ib. 5492–5494.

Statement as to the priests not having actively interfered to prevent the employment of mobs, Raleigh 5625–5641.

Evidence in detail relative to the extremely active part taken in the Limerick elections by the Roman Catholic secular clergy or parish priests; great intimidation exercised by them, Spaight 6843–6846. 6876, 6877. 6885–6896. 6985 et seq——Influence used by the priests in order that Sunday shall intervene between the day of nomination and of polling, ib. 6847–6849——Practice of the priests as to addressing the people outside the chapels, ib. 6864.

Grounds for the statement that the priests have been active, not only in the organization of mobs, but in the distribution of whisky to them, Spaight 6886–6895. 6985–6992 —— Very active part taken by the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick, in the last election on the polling-day, ib. 6896——Active part taken by the priests in the polling-booths as agents, landlords or their agents not exercising any similar influence, ib. 6999–7002. 7063–7074. 7096–7105. 7111, 7112——Conclusion as to the poorer class of voters in the city voting generally as the priests wish, ib. 7003–7014. 7040.

Great influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at the elections, Ellard 7158, 7159. 7175-7179. 7234——Instance of unjustifiable language used towards witness by a priest at the last election; this would hardly have occurred under the ballot, ib. 7234-7236. 7262-7269——Anxiety of the Roman Catholic clergy for the intervention of Sunday between the nomination day and polling day; objection to this arrangement, ib. 7273-7275.

Inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. Spaight, that witness took an active part in the last election, Right Rev. G. Butler 11491-11498. 11558-11564. 11567-11569. 11701, 11702——Explanation as to the Roman Catholic priests sometimes recommending refreshments to be given to the people; denial that they commit abuse in the way of dispensing drink, ib. 11511-11514——Doubt as to the part taken by the priests in the polling-booths at the last Limerick election, ib. 11565, 11566.

Examination relative to some orders for drink given by priests at the Limerick election of 1865; question considered whether this practice should not meet with witness's disapproval, Right Rev. G. Butler 11570-11582——Strict prohibition upon altar denunciations in Limerick diocese, ib. 11586. 11696.

3. Influence exercised by the Landlords:

Practice of the landlords and their agents to bring the tenants into Limerick the night before the polling and to keep them in houses and stores, whence they go to the poll in batches, Murphy 5442, 5443——Instances of voters having complained of coercion by their landlords, Raleigh 5571, 5572.

Practice of the landlords and their agents to accompany the tenants, escorts being necessary to protect them from the mobs, Spaight 6869-6872——Practice of bringing in the country voters the night before the polling, in order to avoid intimidation, ib. 6898-6905——Question as to the side on which those voters would poll who are brought in from the country districts by their landlords, if they were entirely uncontrolled; belief that very many of them would not vote at all, ib. 7080-7088. 7113-7117——Influence exercised in the rural districts by the landlords and their agents; very little of this influence in Limerick city, Ellard 7160. 7237.

4. Question as to the Existence of Bribery and Treating:

Very little bribery at the Parliamentary elections for Limerick, Murphy, 5285——General practice of treating non-electors; influence produced thereby upon the publicans, ib. 5286. 5288, 5289.

Circumstance of Mr. Murphy having been conducting agent for Mr. Bell, when Major Gavin was unseated for bribery, Spaight 6850.

5. Polling Places:

Ample facilities at Limerick in regard to polling places, Murphy 5435——Opinion as to the sufficiency of the number of polling places in Limerick, Right Rev. G. Butler 11704-11709.

6. Particulars in connection with the last Election:

Combination between the Conservatives and the Fenians at the last election for Limerick; employment of a paid mob on this side, as well as of an unpaid Fenian mob, Murphy 5292-5300. 5349-5353. 5368, 5369. 5488-5490. 5514, 5515. 5532-5539——Very little interference of the landlords at the last election, ib. 5366, 5367. 5520——Circumstance of many Roman Catholics in Limerick having voted against the wishes of the priests, ib. 5379-5382——Small number polled by Mr. Pigott, ib. 5403——Punishment of some of the rioters at the election; difficulty of a more rigid enforcement of the law in this election, ib. 5436-5440.

Interest taken by the Protestant clergy in the last Parliamentary election for Limerick city, though they were not active in the matter, Murphy 5513——Minority of seventy-four between Sir Peter Tait and the lowest Liberal candidate, about 200 Roman Catholics having voted for the former, ib. 5514, 5515——Explanation as to neither Mr. Pigott nor Sir Peter Tait having issued addresses; they acted, however, in combination, ib. 5530. 5532-5539. 5543-5545——Failure of the petition against the return of the Liberal Members, ib. 5531.

Circumstance of Sir Peter Tait not having regularly come forward as a candidate, Raleigh 5608-5611——Information relative to the extent of injury and violence committed by the mob at the last election on the polling day, or after the election was over, ib. 5642-5651. 5654-5657.

Examination to the effect that at the last election there was no coalition between Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott, and the Conservative party did not support the latter, Spaight 6851-6862——Statement that Sir Peter Tait was not put forward by the Conservative party, and did not issue an address, ib. 6860-6862. 6924-6929. 7136, 7137——Great intimidation of Sir Peter Tait's supporters on the election day; the town was, however, quiet up to about one o'clock, ib. 6863-6868. 7120-7125——Failure of the petition against the return for Limerick at the last election, Spaight 7033–7036——Instances of intimidation in connection with the petition, ib. 7108–7110.

Particulars relative to the petition consequent upon the last election; explanation as to intimidation not having been charged, Ellard 7146–7151. 7247–7256——Statement as to witness having been conducting agent for Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott, ib. 7151–7156. 7227–7230——Reference to the hiring of mobs at the last election; denial that there was any mob on Sir Peter Tait's side, ib. 7161. 7255, 7256——Statement as to Sir Peter Tait not having been brought forward or supported by the Conservatives as a body; explanation as to his having issued no address, and having been put forward unexpectedly, ib. 7162–7174. 7203–7208——Circumstance of Archdeacon Gould's tenants not having voted at all, ib. 7162. 7239–7244.

Support given by the Conservatives to Mr. Pigott, Right Rev. G. Butler 11499–11502——Employment of rival mobs at the election, a Tory mob having first appeared on the nomination day, ib. 11506–11510.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald in the matter of the petition against the return of Messrs. Gavin and Russell, App. 586.

7. Question of the Ballot:

Concurrence in the opinion that the ballot would be an immense advantage at the Limerick elections, Murphy 5314 et seq.; Ellard 7180 et seq.; Right Rev. G. Butler 11521–11554. 11647–11658.

Grounds for the conclusion that the ballot would not prevent priestly influence and intimidation at Limerick, Spaight 6881–6885. 6906–6912. 6950–6954. 7015–7025. 7076–7089.

8. Other Details generally:

Employment of military and police at the elections, Murphy 5337. 5387, 5388. 5503–5512. 5529——Absence of paid canvassing at Limerick, ib. 5449. 5457.

Return of Major Gavin at the election in 1858, he having been subsequently unseated on petition, and witness having come forward and been elected, Spaight 6828–6834——Defeat of witness at the election in 1859, owing to the intimidation and violence which prevailed; failure, however, of the petition promoted by him on these grounds, ib. 6835–6839. 7026–7030——Further contest of the city by witness in 1865, when he was again defeated, owing to the violence displayed towards the Conservative side; reason for his not petitioning on this occasion, ib. 6840–6842. 7031, 7032.

Circulation by the Liberals of an Orange placard at the election of 1865, in order to create religious hatred, Spaight 6878–6880——As a rule, politics are connected with religion in Limerick, ib. 7007, 7008. 7117——Large proportion of the constituency who are Roman Catholics, ib. 7037–7040——Information relative to the steps taken by the authorities for the prevention of violence, military and police being constantly employed, ib. 7041–7058.

Limerick County. Statement as to there having been no contest for Limerick county on the last occasion; circumstance of one of the Members being brother to a Roman Catholic clergyman, Murphy 5527, 5528. 5548–5552.

not the influence of the priests, which neutralises the action of the landlords, 8593, 8594 —— Statement that in the confessional voters would not declare how they had voted, whilst if the priest obtained such knowledge in the confessional he would be debarred from divulging it, 8595–8602. 8685–8690.

Decided objection to a system of voting papers, as placing the tenant's vote entirely at the mercy of the landlord, 8604–8608 —— Extent to which it may be said that Roman Catholicism in Ireland is identified with Liberalism, 8616–8618. 8651–8653. 8675–8684 —— Belief as to the Government officials in Sligo having had intimidation in view in the employment of military escorts, 8622, 8623. 8640, 8641——Comment upon the partial conduct of one of the stipendiary magistrates at the election, 8624–8627. 8722, 8723.

Failure of the escort system, witness, for one, impressing upon the people that they need not accompany the escorts, 8642–8649 ——Rare instances of landlord intimidation having been followed up by eviction, 8711, 8712. 8719, 8720 —— Doubt as to any tenants intimating to their landlords that there had better be some show of coercion, else they should be constrained to vote on the other side, 8713, 8714.

Effect of the ballot in preventing all intimidation, 8713——Belief that the ballot would not increase the Liberal ranks, ib.——Probability of escorts having been demanded by the landlords through the tenants stating that they were afraid to go to the poll on the Conservative side, 8715–8718——Good landlords in Sligo as a rule, witness complaining of the system of intimidation, and not of individual coercion, 8719–8721.

M'Gowan, James H. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Solicitor at Dumfries; acted as election agent at the November 1868 election for the Dumfries burghs, and also acted for Sir Sydney Waterlow at his second contest for the county, 5965, 5966——Submits sundry details as showing that in the second Dumfries-shire contest there was a very extensive pressure put upon tenants by their landlords to vote for the Conservative candidate, 5967–5988. 6014 et seq. — At the first election Sir S. Waterlow was in a majority of forty-four, and at the second in a minority of thirty-six, 5970——A careful analysis of the votes was made by witness, and a careful personal inquiry conducted, as the result of which he cites several cases in illustration of the intimidation and undue influence by the landlords or their factors, 5970–5988. 6014 et seq.

Explanation as to a petition not having been presented against Major Walker's return for Dumfries-shire, notwithstanding that witness submits there was ample evidence of undue influence; difficulty chiefly as to agency, 5972–5974. 6078–6090. 6196, 6197 ——Particulars relative to two cases in which tenants suffered by loss of their holdings through having voted for Sir Sydney Waterlow; examination as to the outgoing and incoming rent in each case, 5978–5980. 6046–6048. 6101–6110——Active interest taken in the county election by the clergy on both sides; opinion as to the legitimate character of such influence, 5987. 6049–6054. 6121.

Information relative to the elections for the Dumfries burghs, and the prevalence of treating formerly; great improvement in this respect at the last election, 5989–5998—— Suggested prohibition upon committees meeting in public-houses in burghs, 5999—— Great benefit if the public-houses were closed on the days of nomination and poling, 5999, 6000——Absence of bribery either in the burghs or county of Dumfries, 6001 ——Considerable intimidation in one of the burghs at the last election, 6002–6005—— Numerous paid agents on one side at the election, 6006, 6007 ——Great abuse in the burgh of Dumfries in connection with the licensing system, with reference to the election, 6008–6013.

Very general support given in Dumfries-shire, after the county election in 1869, to a petition in favour of the ballot, the signatures including many Conservative voters, 6021–6023. 6034. 6055–6057. 6117–6120. 6187–6193——Notoriety in the county of the undue influence exercised by the landlords, the latter, however, justifying their action in the matter, 6033–6040 ——Strong political feelings of the tenants which induced them to go against their landlords, 6041–6043.

Great value attached to the ballot, though at the same time something should be done to prevent or diminish paid canvassing, 6058–6060. 6072–6074——Objectionable employment of a large number of bank agents and lawyers at the Dumfries-shire election on the Conservative side, 6059. 6154–6164——Absence of paid canvassing on witness's side at the burgh election, witness, as agent, having accompanied the candidate on his canvass, 6060–6070.

System of treating on both sides in Dumfries-shire till the last general election, 6075–6077——Belief that numerous cases of intimidation did not come to witness's knowledge at all, 6097. 6194, 6195——Much larger number of paid agents on the Conservative side than on the Liberal side at the county election; expenses of each side adverted to hereon, 6122–6126. 6154–6164——Conclusion as to the undue influence of the landlords having been the sole cause of the defeat of Sir Sidney Waterlow at the last election, 6127–6131.

Belief, as the result of witness's investigation relative to the county voters, that there were only two tenants who could be evicted as not having leases, 6132–6153——Opinion that on the Liberal side there was no undue influence, though there might have been influence exercised upon tradesmen by their customers, 6168–6177——Probability of the absence of bribery in Scotland being owing to the better education and better religious influence than in England, 6178–6183——General apprehension and intimidation caused by a few cases of eviction, 6184, 6185.

M'Murdo, Major General Montagu, C. B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is commander of the Infantry Brigade in Dublin; is conversant with the system of employment of troops at elections in Ireland, 7507–7509 — Submits that the wholesale employment of troops at the elections, more especially as escorts for rural voters, is extremely objectionable, and prevents all freedom of election, 7510 et seq.——The great majority of the tenant voters go with the escorts against their own inclinations, in order to vote according to the wishes of the landlords; frequent instances of this, 7510–7515. 7575–7596. 7676, 7677. 7758.

Conclusion as to the majority of the tenants being unduly influenced by the landlords, the result being that a counteracting influence is exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy; preference for the latter influence as compared with the former, 7515. 7554, 7555. 7589–7596. 7635. 7650–7652. 7688–7699. 7779, 7780——Statement to the effect that the military officers regard the voters under escort in the light of prisoners; instructions issued by witness adverted to hereon, 7516–7522. 7653–7668.

Proposition that two-thirds of the troops employed at Irish elections should be armed with sticks or truncheons, instead of with deadly weapons which they dare not use; one-third of each contingent should be fully armed and kept in reserve, 7521. 7524–7528. 7541, 7542. 7562–7564. 7623–7625. 7670. 7709–7726 ——Strong disapproval of the present system of employing the military fully armed for the suppression of election riots; memorandum prepared by witness on this question, consequently upon the Drogheda riots, 7524–7529. 7537. 7539–7568——State of military occupation of the country at the last elections, involving great expense, 7530–7533. 7556–7558 ——Directions received by witness from Lord Strathnairn, as to military escorts at the Dublin county election; consultation also of Sir Thomas Larcom on the subject, 7534, 7535.

Evidence strongly in favour of the ballot in Ireland as the most effectual means of preventing undue influence, and as tending to obviate the necessity for escorts, 7537, 7538. 7553. 7565–7571. 7576–7579. 7621, 7622——Importance attached to an increase in the number of polling places for the counties; great evil at present through the long distances which many voters have to travel, 7538. 7553. 7559–7561. 7636–7648. 7679–7686.

Explanation of the practice in regard to requisitions for escorts; action in this respect of the landlords as resident or local magistrates, 7543–7547. 7572–7575. 7599. 7618. 7733–7757. 7788–7791——Inordinate force of military and police sent to Balbriggan at the last election for the county of Dublin, no occasion having arisen for the use of so large a force, 7545–7550——Effect of the presence of the military in inducing riots, 7550. 7649. 7724. 7727–7730——Very long period for which it has been the practice of successive Governments to employ the military at the elections, 7551, 7552.

Question considered whether, under the ballot, military escorts would not still be required; objection, in any case, to such escorts, save as citizens or special constables, not armed with deadly weapons, 7565–7571. 7576 et seq.——Very large constabulary force available for use at the elections, 7566. 7626, 7627——General feeling of army officers in disapproval of the present system of military escorts in Ireland, 7584. 7759–7761. 7782–7787.

Probability of many voters not polling at all, if not escorted by military convoys, 7589–7617——Belief as to the military being usually asked for by the Conservative landlords, 7618——Doubt as to the priests ever interfering to prevent mob influence, 7625–7635—— Question considered whether, notwithstanding the alleged landlord influence, Liberal representatives have not been very generally returned, 7688–7699—— Statement to the effect that where employed in large bodies at elections, the constabulary should not be armed with deadly weapons, 7762–7772——Less political interference of the priests if the ballot were in force, 7781.

MANCHESTER (TEST BALLOT):

Use of a polling card similar to that in France, at the test ballot in Manchester, Sir C. W. Dilke 10146 —Practice as to the signing of the voting paper by the voter, ib. 10148——Exceedingly few bad or lost votes at the Manchester ballot, from one-half to two-thirds of the constituency having voted, ib. 10251–10255.

Object of the test ballot to decide whether Mr. Milner Gibson or Mr. Ernest Jones should be selected as the Liberal candidate in the event of a vacancy, Taylor 12102—— Excitement in the public mind as to the result of the test, whereas the ballot itself was conducted with perfect order and regularity, ib. 12103–12106. 12186–12192——Adoption at Manchester of the plan of ballot in use in Victoria, ib. 12107——Use of a die for for stamping each voting card, as a check upon forged cards; other means available for preventing fraud in this respect, Taylor 12108. 12115. 12137, 12138. 12235–12240. 12266–12279.

Transmission of a voting paper, with a circular to each voter; description of such paper, Taylor 12109. 12141—— Presentation by the voter, when about to poll, of the circular and voting paper to the returning officer, from whom he received a voting card, ib. 12110–12112. 12136. 12141——Deposit of the voting card by the voter in an envelope, and then in the ballot box, after he had first marked off the name of the candidate for whom he did not vote, ib. 12113–12115——Object of the envelope to prevent the use of two cards in voting; opinion as to the use of perforated cards being preferable to this plan, ib. 12115. 12135. 12146. 12185. 12278——Prohibition upon any voter taking a voting card away from the polling-booth, ib. 12116.

Total of 32½ per cent. of the Liberal electors who abstained from voting; larger proportion of the lower class than of the more respectable class in this number, Taylor 12117–12122. 12156, 12157 — Very satisfactory result in accounting for the cards issued by the returning officer; rare instances of irregularity, ib. 12123——Great ease and rapidity of the polling as compared with the ordinary system; particulars on this point, ib. 12124–12129. 12205–12218——Deviation at Manchester from the Victoria plan as regards the numbering of the ballot papers; statement hereon as to there being no necessity for a scrutiny, ib. 12141–12143. 12251–12261.

Belief that the Manchester system would give universal satisfaction, Taylor 12144. 12179——Entire absence of objection to the working of the system on the part of the Conservatives, 12144. 12179——Error of Sir Charles Dilke in supposing that the voting papers, as distinguished from the voting cards, were signed by the electors; objections to this being done as a check upon personation, ib. 12145, 12146. 12219–12229.

Absence of difficulty at Manchester through some of the voters not being able to read or write, this difficulty having been obviated by printing the candidates' names in different colours, Taylor 12147–12155. 12180–12184. 12193–12199——Inference as to the exercise of undue influence at Manchester elections in the absence of the ballot, ib. 12232–12234——Large majority for Mr. Ernest Jones, whereas it was very generally expected that the majority would be the other way, ib. 12233.

Form of voting paper and of voting card used at the test ballot, App. 601, 602.

Martin, Sir Samuel, Knight. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has tried thirteen election petitions under the Corrupt Practices Act, 10512, 10513——Belief that in only two of these cases did bribery exist to any considerable extent, 10514, 10515. 10612. 10670, 10671 —— Success of the petitions in five cases out of the thirteen, 10516, 10517——Great amount of treating and public-house expenditure in several cases, 10518–10522. 10617——Statement that witness had no means of ascertaining the candidates' expenditure, beyond the amount officially returned, 10523, 10524.

Several grounds upon which an election may be voided; instance, at Beverley, of a void election in accordance with the principles of the common law, 10524. 10548, 10549. 10640—— Extensive bribery at Beverley, both for the municipal and Parliamentary elections, 10524. 10544–10547. 10639, 10640——Explanation as to there being certain illegal acts which involve penalties, but cannot be held as vitiating the election, 10524–10526. 10621–10628—— Instances of bribery at the Westminster election by a supporter of Mr. Smith; failure, however, of the attempt to prove that this person was an agent. 10527–10529——Excessive expenditure of Mr. Smith at this election; belief, however, that no illegal expenditure was intended by him, 10530–10534. 10542——Suggestion made by Mr Justice Willes whether there should not be an enactment that extravagant general expenditure should void the seat, 10535–10538. 10615.

Very few cases of undue influence charged before witness, all of them having failed, 10539–10541. 10602–10604—— Failure of an attempt to prove treating by Mr. Smith at the Westminster election, 10542——Belief as to the general desire of the candidates, in the cases that came before witness, not to incur corrupt expenditure, 10543——Explanatory statement as to the interpretation given by the judges to the law relative to agency; concurrence between them on this subject, 10550–10560.

Very general opinion expressed before witness in favour of the abolition of nominations; concurrence of witness in this recommendation, 10561–10565. 10642, 10643—— Great improvement if public-houses were closed on the polling day in boroughs, 10566–10570—— Information relative to a question in the case of the West Riding election, whether certain expenditure in refreshments for voters was corrupt expenditure; doubt whether this amounted to treating within the meaning of the Act, 10571–10586—— Opinion favourable to prohibiting the holding of committees at public-houses, 10587, 10588. 10616–10620. 10641——Suggestion also that paid canvassing might with advantage be forbidden, 10589–10591.

Facility experienced by witness in obtaining all required information from witnesses on the petitions, 10592—— Uselessness of attempting to enforce penalties through juries for breaches of the election law, 10593-10597——Question whether, as regards corrupt practices at municipal elections, the returned candidate should not be removable by a proceeding in the Court of Queen's Bench, 10598–10601——State of the law on the subject of undue influence or intimidation; doubt whether spiritual intimidation comes within the definition in the Act, 10605–10611.

Belief as to the salutary effect of the Corrupt Practices Act in deterring from bribery, 10612–10614——Doubt as to the expediency of enacting that certain illegal acts shall void the election, 10621-10625——Illegality of payment for the conveyance of voters to the poll; question of vitiating the election on this ground, 10625–10628——Conclusion that a voter found guilty of bribery, upon inquiry by petition, is not thereby disqualified by the franchise; approval of an alteration of the law in this respect, 10629-10632.

Opinion adverse to any greater immunity of candidates in respect of the acts of agents, 10635–10638——Objection to an abolition of the declaration of the poll, 10645, 10646 —— Doubt as to any insufficiency of polling places at borough elections in England, 10647, 10648——Statement to the effect that the judges do not consider themselves public prosecutors, 10649. 10652——Instance of bribery on a large scale at Norwich which witness was very desirous should be followed up, 10649-10651. 10687-10689 ——Particulars as to some votes at the Warrington election having been tendered to another person than the check clerk; precaution suggested on this point, 10653-10658.

Expected failure of criminal prosecutions for election offences, if the trials were to take place in London, 10659–10662—— Objection to any extensive exercise by the judge of his power to imprison for certain offences, 10663, 10664——Suggestion whether the seat should not be voided for a wilful keeping back of the accounts, 10665, 10666—— Undue payments made to agents at the Brecon election, 10672, 10673. 10676—— Inability of paid agents to vote; question considered as to the expediency of an increased check in this respect, 10673. 10703-10709——Excessive payment frequently made for committee rooms at public-houses; instance of this at Salford, though witness did not decide that such payment was bribery within the meaning of the Act, 10674, 10675. 10690-10699——Direct bribe proved in the case of Brecon, so that the seat was at once abandoned, 10676, 10677. 10697.

Doubt as to the expediency of prohibiting payments to attornies as agents, 10678–10680——Belief as to there being no abuse in connection with the withdrawal of petitions; necessary consent of the judge before withdrawal, 10681–10685——Opinion as to the entire inaccuracy of the view that the judges had by their decisions rendered the success of petitions unduly difficult, 10700-10702——Power of the electors to institute inquiry on the subject of corrupt practices, irrespectively of the question of unseating the sitting Member, 10712, 10713.

Maryport. Circumstances of the ballot having been in operation for several years in the town of Maryport for the election of the local board, and having given universal satisfaction, Taylor 12158–12165——Claim of the Maryport people that their plan is the original of the Australian plan, ib. 12160.

Merionethshire. Information relative to the Merionethshire elections of 1859 and 1865, showing that great intimidation was exercised by the Conservative landlords, and that in several instances tenants were evicted or had their rents raised as a consequence of not voting on the Tory side, Rev. M. D. Jones, 6549-6585. 6678–6685——Reduction of the rents of some tenants for voting on the Tory side in 1865, ib. 6576, 6577—— General rule of landlords in requiring their tenants to vote with them ib. 6586——Retirement of the Tory candidate at the election in 1868, the Liberal constituency having increased in number, and a strong feeling having arisen on the subject of the Irish Church, ib. 6587, 6588. 6600-6607. 6613–6618. 6660–6677.

Dread with which the farmers in Merionethshire regard an election; meeting about a year ago, at which they resolved to petition Parliament either to relieve them of the franchise or to give them the ballot, Rev. M. D. Jones 6589-6594. 6608-6612—— Instance of the sale of a chapel, because of the part taken by the clergyman in the elections, ib. 6595. 6770. 6775–6778.

Particulars relative to the quarrymen in Merionethshire, these being of a very independent character and being chiefly Liberals, Rev. M. D. Jones 6603, 6604. 6620–6626. 6663–6677. 6696. 6703–6707——Statement as to the landlords in the county being generally against the Liberal side; there are however several exceptions to this rule, ib. 6630–6632. 6686. 6729–6737——Desire among the voters for the ballot, ib. 6635, 6636.

Inaccuracy of the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Jones implying that intimidation was practised towards Sir Watkin Wynn's tenants in Merionethshire, and that evictions followed followed in the case of several who voted on the Liberal side in 1865, W. Jones 8460-8472——Denial that rents have been reduced by Sir Watkin Wynn as a result of support at the election, ib. 8470, 8471——Statement, as regards the sale of a certain chapel in Merionethshire, that this took place long before the election of 1859 and had nothing to do with it, ib. 8489-8491——Inability of witness to speak to the question of evictions by Sir Watkin Wynn after the election of 1859, ib. 8492–8494.

Mid Cheshire. Large majority of the farmers in Mid-Cheshire who are Dissenters, whilst the land is nearly all in the hands of Conservative landlords, Latham, 6414, 6415. 6526–6531——Numerous signatures of tenant farmers to a requisition to Mr. Warren, and numerous promises to vote for him, whereas nearly 400 of those who were pledged to support him afterwards voted on the Conservative side, ib. 6416–6418. 6439–6445. 6494–6498. 6532——Conclusion as to the tenantry having largely voted for the Conservative candidates, in order to please their landlords, and under coercion by them or their agents, ib. 6419 et seq.

Excess of Liberal votes polled in the towns beyond the pledges, Latham 6418. 6469–6472——Belief that there was no case of eviction of any tenant for his vote; instances however of threatened eviction, ib. 6419. 6429, 6430. 6515, 6516——Free permission given to the tenants on Mr. Lloyd's estate at Minshull to vote as they pleased, ib. 6420——Constraint in the case of the tenants on the Wheelock estate of Mr. Ackers, so that they broke their promise to vote for Mr. Warren, ib. 6421, 6422.

Explanation that the landed influence in the county is exercised at elections alike by Liberal landlords and by Conservative landlords, Latham 6432, 6433. 6454——Instance of Liberal tenants having voted on the Conservative side though assured that they should not suffer for voting according to their conscience, ib. 6435-6438——Majority for the Liberal candidates if the promises received had been fulfilled, ib. 6446–6450——Little interest taken by Cheshire farmers in politics, they being as a rule an uneducated class, ib. 6451-6453——Undue influence in respect of tradesmen's votes; instances of loss of custom through not voting on the Conservative side, ib. 6455. 6457-6460——Strong influence exercised by the clergy of the Established Church, ib. 6455-6458.

Reference to the action of Lord Egerton of Tatton and other landlords, in not facilitating the free voting of their tenants; different course pursued by the father of the Liberal candidate, Latham 6473-6480——Doubt as to the necessity of any further increase in the number of polling places in Mid-Cheshire, ib. 6485–6487——Expenditure of about 3,500*l.* on the Liberal side at the Mid-Cheshire election in respect of one candidate, the expense on the other side having been about double, ib. 6489-6491——Exception in the case of Congleton of voters having expected a bribe, ib. 6492, 6493——Statement relative to the tumult at some of the meetings in the towns; riotous mob at Sandbach on the Conservative side, ib. 6502–6514——Occurrence of treating on both sides, ib. 6517, 6518.

Mobs. Expediency of mobs being prevented by force from intimidating and molesting the electors, Hill 4686——Advantage if those who foster riotous proceedings by mobs could in some way be made responsible; suggestion whether the candidate in whose behalf such acts are committed should not be liable to lose his seat, Colborne 4747-4754. 4776-4794.

Monaghan County. Exceedingly active part taken by the Roman Catholic clergy in the Monaghan county election of 1865, Norwood 8105–8110. 8187–8196——Very excited liberal mob at the above election, armed with guns, scythes, &c., there being also a large united body on the opposite side; beneficial influence exercised by the priests in seconding witness's efforts to prevent a collision on this occasion, ib. 8111–8114. 8148–8151. 8164–8186——Statement as to there having been only three polling places at the Monaghan election in 1865, ib. 8125. 8252–8258.

Monmouth Boroughs. Denial that at the election for the Monmouth boroughs the riots originated through any electors having been "bottled," Colborne 4763–4766.

Monmouthshire. Particulars relative to the riotous proceedings at Tredegar, Pontypool, Abersychan, and Blaenavon, on the occasion of the last election for Monmouthshire; great damage done to several houses, Colborne 4725–4746——Statement of the actual amounts claimed for damages, and of the amounts allowed against the hundred or district, ib. 4730–4737——Advantage if the polling places in Monmouthshire were not close to the large works, ib. 4749——Doubt as to any coercion of tenants by Conservative landlords, though a charge was made to that effect, ib. 4760–4762. 4795, 4796. 4802.

Belief that the riots in the county were due chiefly to political religious rancour: statement hereon as to the part taken in the election by dissenting ministers and the clergy generally, Colborne 4762. 4837–4850 —— Very large number of attorneys employed on the Conservative side at the election for the county, ib. 4797–4801——Heavy expenses of the Conservative candidates; explanation upon some of the items, ib. 4803–4809 ——Considerable expense for polling places at the Monmouthshire election, ib. 4811.

Montgomeryshire. Instance of a dissenting congregation in Montgomeryshire having been deprived of their chapel after the election in 1862; examination whether this might not have been owing to the use of their chapel for political meetings, Rev. M. D. Jones 6595. 6637–6659. 6761–6788.

Explanation as regards the notice to quit given in the case of a dissenting chapel in Montgomeryshire that this had nothing to do with the election, W. Jones 8474–8479.

Muir, William Paterson. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had considerable experience, as returning officer, of the working of the ballot in Victoria, 9852–9855. 9896–9898—— Conclusion as to the great success of the ballot in the Colony, it having prevented the treating, bribery, and intimidation which formerly prevailed, 9856. 9903–9909. 9921–9923——Explanation of the process of voting by ballot, showing that secrecy is effectually secured, and that the presence of scrutineers tends to prevent any abuse on the part of the returning officer, 9857–9862 —— Occasional attempts at personation; provisions for detecting and punishing this fraud, 9863–9866. 9893–9895.

Knowledge generally of the scrutiners as to the voters' opinions, 9867——Properly qualified persons chosen as deputy returning officers, 9862–9872——Obstacles to the votes being tampered with by the returning officer or his deputy after the poll is closed, 9873–9879 —— Limited amount of the necessary expenditure under the ballot on the part of the candidates or of Government, 9880–9883. 9937–9940.

Opinion as to the impracticability of any systematic personation and fraud on the plan alleged to have been adopted in Tasmania, 9884–9886. 9889–9892——Objection to the voting paper being handed to the returning officer before it is deposited in the ballot box, 9887, 9888——Means of absent voters for ascertaining whether they had been personated, 9893–9895——Power of the returning officer as to making a false statement of the voting, when the papers opened, 9899–9901——Instances of scrutiny, the expense never falling on the Government, 9910–9914.

Possibility under the ballot of the payment of voters for staying at home, 9915–9920 Transmission of the voting papers to Government after the poll is declared; they are subsequently destroyed, 9924–9933——Improbability of the payment of money corruptly after the time for petitioning has expired, 9934–9936——General feeling in the Colony in approval of the ballot, 9941——Very peaceful conduct of the elections, 9943–9945——Practice as to the declaration of the poll; absence of tumult on such occasions, 9946–9954.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS:

1. Want of better Facilities for the Prevention and Punishment of Corrupt Practices; Suggestions on the Subject.
2. Other Details and Suggestions generally.

1. Want of better Facilities for the Prevention and Punishment of Corrupt Practices; Suggestions on the Subject:

Statement as to the Act of 1859 for enforcing penalties for bribery at municipal elections having never been enforced at Nottingham; sundry obstacles to putting the Act in force, Barber 44–49 ——Suggestion for some simple and speedy mode of proceeding in cases of bribery, the expense to be borne by the town, except the proceedings are vexatious, ib.

Recommendation that the same law be applied to corrupt practices at municipal elections as at Parliamentary elections, Barber 50; Hampson 2594. 2604; Storey 2825. 2832. 2844; Forwood 3406–3411——Doubt as to the expediency of the borough justices prosecuting for bribery at the municipal elections, Barber 233–243——Advantage if there were a public prosecutor for initiating proceedings in cases of bribery at municipal elections, the expense to fall upon the town, ib. 251–257. 269–271. 301–304.

Explanation as to the penalty for bribery at municipal elections being inoperative at Windsor, Darvil 502–506. 519——Increased facilities required for the disqualification of of town councillors returned by means of bribery committed by themselves or by agents, Darvill 519-528——Proposed trial of petitions before a county court judge duly empowered for the purpose, ib. 519. 549-552——Statement on the subject of the respectable townspeople at Windsor not taking legal proceedings for the punishment and prevention of bribery at the municipal elections; inference as to the expediency of its being some one's business to initiate proceedings, ib. 546-560. 583-591. 710-722. 762-768. 810-825——Importance of a public inquiry further adverted to, ib. 726.

Belief that the improved state of things in municipal elections at Warrington is due mainly to the moderate penalties under the Act of 1859, and to the probable enforcement of such penalties in cases of bribery &c., Bleckly 1040, 1041. 1049-1052. 1060-1066. 1083-1093——Severe character of the penalties under the Municipal Act, 5 and 6 Will 4, c. 76, as compared with the moderate and easily enforced penalties under the Act 22 Vict ib. 1080-1085——Importance attached to a public prosecutor in cases of corruption at municipal elections, ib. 1094-1098.

Belief as to the impracticability of an effectual application of the present law for the prevention of bribery and treating, Addyman 1407, 1408——Approval of a power of proceeding before two justices in the case of any town councillor charged with bribery, ib. 1493-1498. 1523-1526. 1528-1530——Improvement if there were an easier mode of prosecution for municipal bribery, Trippier 1656; West 3008—Impression at Staleybridge as to the law being much more strict for the prevention of abuse in the case of the Parliamentary election than of the municipal election, Stanley 2202. 2239-2245.

Suggestion that the same laws and penalties be applied to municipal and as to Parliamentary elections, and that the candidate be unseated in the event of bribery being proved, Forwood 3406-3411.

Want of some independent authority at Ashton for putting the law in force, when personation and treating are practised at the municipal elections; great improvement if there were a stipendiary magistrate for dealing with such matters, Darnton 3552. 3553. 3576-3602. 3611-3619——Approval of the defeated municipal candidate being empowered to hold the seat, if by a scrutiny he can prove corrupt practices on the part of the successful candidate, ib. 3554-3557. 3567-3571——Failure of the present system at Ashton as regards the action of the magistrates or the town council for the suppression of corrupt practices, the appointment of an independent authority being very desirable, ib. 3582-3602. 3611-3619——Necessity of a public prosecutor as well as a stipendiary magistrate for dealing with corrupt practices at municipal elections, ib. 3618——Want of a public prosecutor for dealing with personation at municipal elections, Davies 3682, 3683.

Inoperative character of the provisions in the Irish Municipal Act relative to corrupt practices, Murphy 5269-5274. 5277——Facilities suggested in reference to petitions when municipal candidates are unfairly defeated, ib. 5275, 5276.

Question whether, as regards corrupt practices at municipal elections, the returned candidate should not be removable by a proceeding in the Court of Queen's Bench, Sir S. Martin 10598-10601——Want of further facilities for dealing with corrupt practices at municipal elections, there not being sufficient motive to put the law in force, Sir C. Blackburn 11965-11969.

Resolution submitted by Mr. Bright in favour of a simple and speedy mode of trial of petitions, Rep. xiv.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee favourable to certain facilities for the voidance of corrupt elections, Rep. xvi.——Conclusion adverse to the appointment of a public prosecutor with reference to municipal elections, ib.

2. Other Details and Suggestions generally.

Sundry suggestions for simplifying the conduct of municipal elections, and for lessening the expense, Butler 482——Belief that not only at Windsor, but in most other boroughs, a practice prevails of paying men for their day's work for voting at municipal contests, Darvill 486-493——Suggestion that councillors and their agents be required to make a return, on oath, relative to the expenses and liabilities, ib. 530. 532. 661-664——Probability of those voters, at Windsor, &c., now open to bribes, polling according to their conscience if they could not get money, ib. 876-878.

Amendments suggested in the system of election of auditors and assessors for municipal purposes, West 2896-2900——Non-objection to the legal or necessary expenses of municipal elections being borne by the borough, ib. 2934-2937.——Expediency of the same system of voting at municipal as at Parliamentary elections, Johnston 3235, 3236——Belief that the mode of voting at the municipal elections in Ireland by means of papers is similar to that at the English municipal elections, Murphy 5281-5283.

Murphy, Joseph. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Solicitor at Limerick; has had considerable experience of elections, 5252, 5253——Satisfactory conduct of the Limerick municipal elections previously to the general election in November 1865; 5254, 5255. 5385, 5386——Excitement and intimidation at the election of 1865; belief that bribery also was practised, whilst there were plenty of drunken mobs, 5256–5268——Inoperative character of the provisions in the Irish Municipal Act relative to corrupt practices, 5269–5274. 5277.

Facilities suggested in reference to petitions where municipal candidates are unfairly defeated, 5275, 5276——Higher qualification for the municipal franchise in Limerick than for the Parliamentary franchise; much larger number of Parliamentary electors, 5278–5280. 5382, 5383—— Belief that the mode of voting at the municipal elections by means of papers is similar to that at the English municpal elections, 5281–5283.

Very little bribery at the Parliamentary elections for Limerick, 5285——General practice of treating non-electors; influence produced thereby upon publicans, 5286. 5288, 5289—— Universal practice of employing hired mobs on each side, chiefly on the nomination day; frequent riots and disturbances in consequence, 5287. 5290–5307. 5327–5348. 5393, 5394. 5413–5430. 5457–5471——Combination between the Conservatives and the Fenians at the last election for Limerick; employment of a paid mob on this side, as well as of an unpaid Fenian mob, 5292–5300. 5349–5355. 5368, 5369. 5488–5490. 5514, 5515. 5532–5539.

Statement that on the polling day in Limerick the mobs are quiet, and that voters may go to the poll without obstruction; this was so at the last election, 5300, 5301. 5387–5392. 5400–5402. 5424–5430. 5502——Effect of mob intimidation as regards Roman Catholic shopkeepers and voters who are suspected of intending to vote on the Conservative side, 5302. 5306, 5307——Influence exercised in the rural districts by the landlords, and way in which it is shown; counteracting influence exercised by the priests, 5302–5305. 5308–5313. 5356–5367. 5373–5381. 5441, 5442. 5497–5500. 5516–5526—— Belief that the influence of the priests is exercised in the direction in which the people themselves would like to vote if uncontrolled by the landlords, 5308–5313. 5326. 5376, 5377. 5518. 5521. 5540–5542. 5546.

Opinion that the ballot is the only remedy for the evils experienced at the Limerick elections; expectation that it would prevent not only corrupt influence, but the employment of mobs, and the consequent riots and intimidation, 5314–5326. 5372–5377. 5395–5399. 5404–5410. 5479–5487. 5501 —— Doubt as to Roman Catholic voters not being perfectly able to maintain secrecy under the ballot; they would not feel bound to divulge to their priests how they voted, 5320–5326. 5479–5487——Payment of the Limerick mobs, at the rate of 2 s. 6 d. per man per day, no voters being included, 5327. 5457–5471.

Further statement as to the use of mobs being recognised, and as to disturbances and assaults being the general result; explanation hereon, as to the action of the magistrates in the matter, 5328–5348. 5393——Employment of military and police at the elections, 5337. 3387, 5388. 5503–5512. 5529——Very little interference of the landlords at the last election, 5366, 5367. 5520—— Expediency of something being done to put down the mobs and riots; difficulty of effectually preventing the evil by means of the military and police, 5370, 5371. 5393, 5394. 5502–5512.

Circumstance of many Roman Catholics in Limerick having voted against the wishes of the priests, 5379–5382——Small number polled by Mr. Pigott at the last election, 5403——Very active part taken by the priests in the elections; witness is not aware, however, of any political addresses delivered in the chapels, 5411, 5412——Part taken by the Liberal candidates and by the priests, in addressing the people on Sunday, when that day precedes the polling-day, 5415–5420.

Advantage of abolishing public nominations at Limerick, as only leading to riots and the use of hired mobs, 5421–5423. 5472——Approval of personal canvassing being made illegal, as conducing to the employment of mobs, 5431–5434——Ample facilities at Limerick in regard to polling places, 5435——Punishment of some of the rioters at the last election; difficulty of a more rigid enforcement of the law in this direction, 5436–5440.

Practice of the landlords and their agents to bring the tenants into Limerick the night before before the polling, and to keep them in houses and stores, whence they go to the poll in batches, 5442, 5443——Very little difficulty as to the ballot, through the state of education of the people, most of whom can read and write, 5446-5448——Absence of paid canvassing at Limerick, 5449. 5457——Approval of a prohibition upon the holding of meetings or committees in public-houses, 5450-5456——Suggestions for an amended system of nomination or public address, 5473-5478——Denial that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Limerick was present in the polling booths at the last election, 5492-5494——Part taken by the priests in the municipal elections, 5495, 5496.

Interest taken by the Protestant clergy in the last Parliamentary election for Limerick city, though they were not active in the matter, 5513——Minority of seventy-four between Sir Peter Tait and the lowest Liberal candidate, about 200 Roman Catholics having voted for the former, 5514, 5515——Statement as to there having been no contest for Limerick county on the last occasion; circumstance of one of the Members being brother to a Roman Catholic clergyman, 5527, 5528. 5548-5552——Explanation as to neither Mr. Pigott nor Sir Peter Tait having issued addresses; they acted, however, in combination, 5530. 5532-5539. 5543-5545——Failure of the petition against the return of the Liberal Members, 5531.

New York (Ballot). See United States.

Newport (Monmouth). Very excited and disturbed state of Newport at the last election for the Monmouth boroughs, serious damages having been done to Conservative houses, and much intimidation exercised, Colborne 4711-4723——Numerous claims at Newport for compensation, none of which were allowed, ib. 4721, 4722. 4724.

NOMINATIONS:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections:

Necessity of a contest, the expense of which falls upon the town, in the event of a person being nominated without his consent, Barber 29, 30. 36, 37. 188, 189——Suggestion that a small fee be charged for each nomination paper at municipal elections, and that no person should be nominated without his consent, ib. 34, 35——Check to fictitious nominations if the persons nominating had to contribute to the expense, ib. 272-275.

Proposal that candidates at municipal elections be nominated by nomination papers signed by two electors, and by the candidate accepting the nomination, Butler 482——Frequent instances of vexatious nominations for the town council at Leeds; advantage if the candidate's consent were necessary, Addyman 1424-1428. 1466-1468——Advantage of a fine being imposed upon persons making fictitious nominations, ib. 1475, 1476.

Inconvenience experienced at Bradford through the nomination of candidates for the town council without their consent, Storey 2827, 2828——Suggestion that at the municipal nominations a portion of the expenses be deposited, as a check upon vexatious nominations, West 2888, 2889——Improvement if the nomination papers were not received later than eight or nine o'clock in the evening, ib. 2891, 2892——Proposal that there be an interval of three days between the nomination and the election, both at municipal and Parliamentary elections, ib. 2892-2896. 2990-2993. 3039-3044.

Evils of the present system of nomination of municipal candidates, no previous intimation being necessary; suggestion that a pre-nomination be necessary, as in the case of poor law guardians, Davies 3694——Satisfactory operation of the present system of nomination of town councillors at Staleybridge, Kirk 3952-3955.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Improvement if the present system of nomination of candidates were abolished, and if in lieu thereof the names of candidates were required to be given in and published at the town hall or other public office, Bleckly 1203-1221——Contemplated consent on the part of candidates when nominated, in order that they may be deemed liable for the expenses of going to the poll, ib. 1264-1273.

Concurrence of evidence in favour generally of the abolition of the present system of nomination, Addyman 1535-1545; Bush 4407-4449; Latham 6481; Ellard 7245; Norwood 8132. 8273; Harkness 8397-8401——Evidence in support of the view that nominations at Parliamentary elections should, as well as systematic canvassing, be done away with, Trippier 1753-1780. 1895. 1908-1921——Tranquil character of the nominations at Staleybridge; objection to public nominations being abolished, Stanley 2419–2430.

Illustration in the case of the last nomination at Bradford for the Parliamentary election of the expediency of abolishing nominations altogether, Storey 2841–2843——Witness submits that public nominations for the Parliamentary elections at Bradford have caused great disorder, and have been complete failures, there being a general feeling in the town that such nominations should be abolished, West 2861. 2867–2871. 2879——Great improvement if the Parliamentary nominations were made by paper, certain improvement on the plan of nomination by papers in municipal elections being desirable, ib. 2862–2866——Recommendation that open nominations be abolished for county elections as well as for borough elections, steps being taken to prevent inconvenience through fictitious nomination, ib. 3036, 3037. 3051–3055——Expediency of nomination by papers conjointly with an interval of three days between the nomination and polling, ib. 3038–3040.

Approval of an abolition of nominations, the practice at Blackburn leading to much abuse, Johnston 3215-3227——Petition from the Blackburn town council in favour of abolishing nominations, ib. 3222——Feeling at Liverpool as to the evil and the uselessness of nominations, Forwood 3412-3420——Great increase of expense and of corrupt practices caused by the present system of open nomination; witness would abolish this system altogether, Davies 3698, 3699——Grounds for recommending that it should be necessary for candidates to come forward a fortnight or a month before the election, ib. 3700–3706. 3804–3822——General feeling at Cheltenham in favour of abolishing the practice of nomination at the hustings, ib. 3798.

Proceedings at Staleybridge on the nomination day adverted to as showing the expediency of abolishing public nominations from the hustings, Kirk 3975–3990——Considerable disorder at Gravesend on the nomination day; improvement if the nomination were abolished altogether, Troughton 4075–4081. 4113——Effect of the public nomination of candidates in aggravating disturbances, Colborne 4810——Trouble and expense owing to the sudden nomination of candidates, these frequently not going to the poll; remedies suggested for this evil, ib. 4812–4836.

Advantage of abolishing public nominations at Limerick, as only leading to riots and the use of hired mobs, Murphy 5421-5423. 5472——Suggestions for an amended system of nomination or public address, ib. 5473–5478——Strong feeling at the Bristol town council in favour of abolishing public nominations, Thomas 5754–5758——Suggestion that the nomination for Parliamentary elections should be something similar to that for municipal elections, ib. 5769.

Objections to the abolition of pubic nomination in Scotland; orderly manner in which conducted, Russel 5843–5855.

Frightful scenes at the nominations at Limerick, it being very desirable to abolish nominations altogether, Spaight 6994, 6995. 7089–7092——Proposal that the nomination be made by letter or notification to the sheriff a certain number of days before the election, Norwood 8123. 8267–8273——Recommendation as to security for costs in connection with nominations sent to the sheriff, ib. 8124——Avoidance of much tumult and riot at the Dumfries elections if there were no public nomination and no declaration of the poll, Harkness 8397–8404——Abuse consequent upon the present facilities of nomination, Arnold 10421–10424.

Very general opinion expressed before witness in favour of the abolition of nominations; concurrence of witness in this recommendation, Sir S. Martin 10561–10565. 10642, 10643.

Resolutions submitted by Mr. Bright in favour of the abolition of public nominations, Rep. xiii, xiv.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee favourable to the abolition of public nominations, Rep. xviii.

See South Australia, 2. Victoria, 6.

Non-resident Voters. Explanation that the scheme of local or parish voting proposed by witness does not include any facilities for the polling of non-resident voters, though some arrangement might be made for taking their votes away from their parishes, Right Hon. G. W. Hunt 9497. 9510, 9511.

North Derbyshire. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Willes, in the matter of the North Derbyshire election petition, App. 569.

North Norfolk. Failure of the attempt to prove coercion by landlords in the case of the North Norfolk petition, Sir C. Blackburn 12019. 12024, 12025——Very little paid agency at the election for North Norfolk, ib. 12028, 12029.

Northallerton. Particulars relative to a case of alleged undue influence at the Northallerton election as investigated by witness, Sir J. S. Willes 10742.

Norwich. Great amount of public-house expenditure at Norwich on the polling-day at the last election, Sir S. Martin 10518——Commencement of the bribery and treating about twelve o'clock on the polling-day, ib. 10522——Instance of bribery on a large scale at Norwich, which witness was very desirous should be followed up, ib. 10649–10651. 10687–10689——Explanation as to witness not having followed up the suspected bribery which came to light in the Norwich investigation, ib. 10793–10796.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin in the matter of the Norwich election petition, App. 572; 573.

Norwood, John (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a doctor of civil law, and a magistrate in Ireland; has had considerable experience in connection with Parliamentary, municipal, and poor law elections, 8098–8104. 8274–8276——Great and undue influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at Irish elections; particular instances of this, 8105–8118. 8187–8210. 8228–8244——Exceedingly active part taken by the Roman Catholic clergy in the Monaghan county election of 1865; 8105–8110. 8187–8196——Very excited Liberal mob at the above election, armed with guns, scythes, &c., there having been also a large united body on the opposite side; beneficial influence exercised by the priests in seconding witness's efforts to prevent a collision on this occasion, 8111–8114. 8148–8151. 8164–8186.

Powerful influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy at the election for the Dublin mayoralty in 1868; examination hereon whether this influence was not properly exercised as bearing upon the question of the Irish church, 8116. 8197–8210——Very satisfactory working of the system of voting papers at poor law elections in Ireland, 8119–8122. 8295. 8298——Suggested abolition of the nomination day, 8123. 8273——Proposal that the nomination be made by letter or notification to the sheriff a certain number of days before the election, 8123. 8267–8273——Recommendation as to security for costs in connection with nominations sent to the sheriff, 8124.

Great evils arising from the insufficiency of polling places in Ireland, a large increase in the number being urgently required, 8125–8129. 8259, 8260. 8278. 8307, 8308—Statement as to there having been only three polling places at the Monaghan election in 1865; 8125. 8252–8258——Necessity of military escorts so long as the polling places are so far apart, 8125–8127.

Proposition that the system of voting papers, as in the case of the Dublin University elections, be adopted for Parliamentary elections generally, as a supplementary mode of voting, where the voters prefer to adopt such mode; question hereon whether undue influence might not arise in the signing of the papers before a magistrate, 8130. 8261–8266. 8281–8306. 8309–8326——Suggested enactment that the clergy of all persuasions be prohibited from interfering in elections as agents, 8130–8132——Absence of undue interference by the Presbyterian clergy in Ireland, 8133. 8159–8162.

Evidence in support of the conclusion that in Ireland the ballot would not prevent priestly influence, and would not secure secrecy of voting, 8134–8147. 8218–8251——Failure of the ballot to secure secrecy or purity of election in America, 8145——Want of public confidence in the ballot in America, 8145, 8146——Opinion that the ballot would lead to political hypocrisy, 8145——Instances of Roman Catholics in Ireland opposed to the ballot, whilst it is disapproved by Protestants generally, 8147. 8248–8251.

Opinion that the military should still be available at Irish elections, but should be kept out of the way until really required, 8152, 8153——Obstacle to dispensing with the military, even if the ballot be introduced, 8154–8158——Probability of the military being still required in some cases, even though the polling places be increased in number, 8211–8217.

1. As to the Prevalence of Bribery at the Municipal Elections:

Notoriety of the practice of bribery at the municipal elections in the borough, money being given with little, if any, attempt at concealment, Barber 6. 22, 23. 64–68——Careful inquiry made by witness, the conclusion being that about one-third of the municipal electors require money, and that the payments vary from 2*s.* 6*d.* upwards, accordingly as the contests are more severe, ib. 7–19. 71–74——Statement relative to the very large expenditure at the municipal elections in 1844, ib. 14, 15. 181–186. 204–212——Expenditure of upwards of 2,000*l.* in one ward in 1844; particulars relative to this election, ib. 14, 15. 181–186. 204–212.

Corrupt character of many small shopkeepers, as well as of the lower class of voters, Barber 28. 173, 174——Long period for which bribery has been practised at the elections, ib. 25–27——Doubt as to the bribery at the municipal elections having any reference to the Parliamentary elections, ib. 33. 196–203. 213–220——Inoperativeness at Nottingham of the provisions of the Act of 1859 for preventing bribery at municipal elections, ib. 45–49—— Gradual spread of the system of taking money for votes, ib. 88, 89.

Indifference of a large number of municipal voters, as regards the elections, if it were not for the payments made, Barber 153–165——Understanding between the persons termed managers in the different wards and the municipal voters as to the money to be paid; question hereon whether there might not be a similar understanding, even though the ballot were adopted, ib. 258–268——Small sums for which many of the smaller tradesmen sell their votes at the municipal contests, ib. 305–309——Refusal of many of the working classes to receive bribes, ib. 309. 339.

Witness considers that the proportion of the municipal voters of the town open to bribery is much larger than one-third, Bradshaw 348–352. 431, 432——Statement relative to the very extensive and heavy bribing at the elections of 1844, from 7,000*l.* to 8,000 l. having probably been spent, ib. 353–356——In 1844 as much as 20*l.* was paid for a single vote, ib. 353–355——Continuance of bribery in every ward in which since 1844 there has been a contest, some of the contests being between candidates of the same political party, ib. 357–360. 377–379.

Very few respectable persons who vote, the receipt of money being the only motive which induces the great majority to vote, Bradshaw 360, 361. 380, 381. 429–432—— Belief that the municipal bribery arose out of the Parliamentary bribery, ib. 366. 433–436——Origin of the municipal bribery previously to 1844, the object being to obtain political preponderance in the council, ib. 367–370. 446–453——Belief that fully one-half the municipal electors are open to bribery, ib. 431, 432.

Particulars relative to the extent of bribery at the municipal elections, and the sums paid, there being no contest without bribery, Butler 459–479——Money has not passed through witness's hands in bribery, but he knows it to have been paid, ib. 466–470.

2. Local Feeling on the Subject of Bribery:

Strong desire for a suppression of bribery, some attempts to stop it having, however, been futile, Barber 64–76——Absence of public dissatisfaction on account of the expense of the municipal contests, ib. 276–282——Desire of the respectable people of both political parties to see bribery suppressed, though individuals do not take active proceedings in the matter, on account of the unpopularity to be experienced, Bradshaw 362–365. 394. 398, 399. 437——Want of proper public reprobation of the existing practice, ib. 420–428.

3. Constitution of the Town Council:

Effect of the existing corruption in deterring respectable persons from standing for the municipal council, Barber 24, 77–179——Large ratepayers selected for the town council, the affairs of the town being excellently managed by the council, ib. 77–85. 310, 311 ——Selection of the most fitting persons for the council if the elections were conducted purely, ib. 85–87.

Statement as to the candidates for the council being elected with direct reference to their political principles, and yet without reference to the Parliamentary elections, Barber 137–143. 177–186. 204–220——Efficient discharge of their duty by those elected, their politics not leading to abuse, ib. 166–171——Local objects by which candidates are induced to stand, and to give their services in the town council, ib. 167. 172.

Better constitution of the town council, but that many respectable persons are deterred from becoming candidates through the corruption which prevails, Bradshaw 438.

4. Other Details relative to the Municipal Elections:

Statement of the number of municipal electors in each of the seven wards in the borough of Nottingham, the total number being 14,168; Barber 2–4——Similar limits of the Parliamentary and of the municipal borough, ib. 5——Considerable prevalence of treating as well as bribery at the Nottingham municipal elections, ib. 20, 21. 109—— Frequent instances of persons being nominated without their consent; great abuse arising from this practice, ib. 29–32. 34–37. 40, 41. 187–189.

Statement showing that personation frequently takes place at the municipal elections, Barber 53–59. 114–122——Very little intimidation at the elections, ib. 60–63—— Increased interest taken in the elections by the non-corrupt voters but for the system of bribery, ib. 111–113. 153–165——Instances of the same voters having polled for candidates on different lists, ib. 248, 249——Witness is not aware of any instance of Parliamentary Members for Nottingham subscribing towards the expense of municipal contests, tests, Barber 250——Witness has been elected six times in twenty-one years, and the total of his expenditure has been under 50 l., ib. 278–280.

NOTTINGHAM—continued.

Statement that the municipal elections have no effect upon the Parliamentary elections, Bradshaw 442——Form of voting paper filled up by the electors, Butler 463.

5. Parliamentary Elections :

Respects in which the expense is greater in the case of a Parliamentary election at Nottingham than of a municipal election, Barber 283–288——Long period for which money has been spent in the Parliamentary elections, Bradshaw 395–397——Conclusion as to there having been great corruption at the last Parliamentary election as well as at the municipal election just previously, ib. 439–445.

Otto, William Ellison. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is factor of the Marquis of Lothian in Roxburghshire and Mid-Lothian, 7276——Submits explanations in detail relative to the refusal of Lord Lothian, through witness, to renew the lease of Timpendean farm to Mr. Scott, 7277 et seq.——Denies that the cause assigned by Lord Lothian to witness, or by witness to Mr. Scott for such refusal was that Mr. Scott had voted against his Lordship's brother at the Roxburghshire election, 7278 et seq.——The farm was surveyed by witness, and a report prepared in draft, but there had been no negociations as to a renewal of the lease, nor was any rent mentioned, 7285–7294. 7302–7308. 7431–7437.

Instructions given by Lord Lothian to the effect that he did not intend to renew Mr. Scott's; no reason was assigned, but witness inferred that private reasons were the cause, irrespectively of Mr. Scott's vote, 7294, 7295. 7317–7325. 7373. 7396–7401. 7426–7430. 7488–7490——Character of the conversation between witness and Mr. Scott when the latter was informed that his lease would not be renewed; reference made by the latter to the part taken by him at the elections, 7296, 7297——Letter from Mr. Scott to witness dated 11th December 1868 on the subject of his vote, 7298–7301.

Statement that witness never intimated to Mr. Scott or any other tenant of Lord Lothian that they must vote as his Lordship wished, nor did Lord Lothian ever give instructions to that effect, 7309, 7310——Denial that before the election witness held out any inducement to Mr. Scott to vote for Lord Lothian's brother, 7311–7316——Circumstance of Mr. Scott having spoken disrespectively of Lord Lothian's family at a farmers' meeting at Harwick; probability of this having caused the non-renewal of his lease, 7321–7325. 7362–7373. 7389–7393. 7410. 7424, 7425. 7491–7496. 7503–7505.

Expiration in 1869 of the leases of four farms of Lord Lothian; renewal of these to the sitting tenants, two of whom had voted for the Liberal candidate, 7326–7331. 7455–7564. 7501, 7502——Examination relative to a letter from Mr. Scott to Lord Lothian with reference to the non-renewal of the lease; explanation as to this letter not having been answered, 7332–7337. 7355–7359. 7407–7409. 7481–7487——Desire expressed by Lord Lothian that witness should attend the Committee and explain that the refusal to renew the lease was not through the voting of Mr. Scott, 7338–7340. 7402–7406.

Very few tenants of Lord Lothian canvassed by witness before the Roxburghshire election; no pressure was exercised, 7341–7343. 7376–7381. 7386–7388. 7413–7416. 7470–7472——Belief that there was no pressure by any of the landlords in the county, 7344——Considerable mob intimidation on the Liberal side, 7345–7347——Coercion in the villages by the Liberals, 7348–7351. 7382–7385——Active part taken in the election by the Dissenting ministers, 7352–7354.

Further details on various points connected with Mr. Scott's case, witness further denying that the decision not to renew his lease was a direct result of the part taken by him in the county election, 7360 et seq.

[Second Examination.]—Further statement that witness never told Mr. Scott that his lease would not be renewed because he had voted against Lord Schomberg Kerr; inference to this effect made by Mr. Scott himself, 8043–8045. 8051, 8052. 8080–8083——Denial that witness told Mr. Scott's brother that Lord Lothian regretted his decision not to renew, 8048–8050——Conditions and improvements spoken of when witness surveyed Mr. Scott's farm; denial, however, that certain work was subsequently done by Mr. Scott in positive expectation of a continuance of his lease, 8053–8056. 8091–8093.

Conversation of witness with Lord Lothian further adverted to; the latter assigned no reason for his decision not to renew the lease, and had not before him witness's report on the farm, 8057–8071. 8078, 8079. 8086–8090. 8097——Denial that witness's report was directly favourable to a renewal, or that he told Mr. Scott everything was ready for renewal, 8061–8068. 8072–8077——Further reference to the existence of private reasons as sufficient to account for Lord Lothian's decision; circumstance of this cause not having been mentioned to Mr. Scott, 8083. 8094–8097——With regard to the two farms re-let to Liberal voters, the agreements for these were made long before the election, 8084, 8085.

Parish Voting (County Elections). Advantage if the voters could poll parochially instead of travelling a distance for the purpose, Cheese 5089–5101.

Proposition that county voters be enabled to vote in their own parishes, the voters to be taken by the overseer and forwarded to the returning officer, Right Hon. G. W. Hunt, 9490 et seq.——Suggestion for making the registry answer the purpose of a poll-book, as part of witness's scheme, ib. 9490——Necessity of a delay of a day or two in the declaration of the poll under witness's plan, ib.——Proposal that every voter should receive from the overseer a duplicate of the entry of his vote, it being also contemplated that the poll-sheets for each parish be published; check thereby upon falsification, ib. 9490. 9521–9523.

Consideration of objections to the scheme on the ground that the overseers are not fit to be trusted with the duty of taking the votes, and would moreover require assistance; belief that there is no good ground for these objections, Right Hon. G. W. Hunt 9491–9496. 9503–9505. 9519, 9520. 9525–9530——Great saving of expense under witness's scheme, even if the overseer required assistance, and if check clerks were employed, ib. 9502, 9503. 9508. 9512–9515——Increased necessity of a polling-place in each parish since the extension of the franchise, ib. 9503——Equal necessity for a polling-place in each parish if the ballot be adopted, ib.——Doubt as to facilities for undue influence by landlords and others under the plan of local or parish voting, ib. 9527–9530.

Patten, The Right Honourable Colonel J. Wilson (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Statement as to the inaccuracy of General McMurdo's evidence on the subject of voters under military escort in Ireland being considered as prisoners, or under control, 11829–11835——Comment upon a statement by General McMurdo to the effec that too many troops were employed at the elections; conclusion that the precautions taken by the late Government in this respect were in no instance excessive, 11836–11840——Peculiarly disturbed state of the county of Sligo at the time of the election; necessity of protection for the Conservative voters, 11841–11862——Explanation relative to the employment of the constabulary in Sligo in escorting voters from the country som days before the polling, 11842–11850.

Testimony to the conduct of the constabulary generally during the elections; great care taken to prevent their influencing the elections, 11842. 11851, 11852——Impossibility of a magistrate accompanying every constabulary escort, 11847. 11884——Comment upon the course taken by Liberal candidates, or their friends, in spreading the impression that the military and police were used by Government for purposes of coercion, 11852–11855. 11859, 11860. 11926, 11927——Impartial way in which escorts were provided, 11856–11858——Denial of a statement by the Rev. Mr. McDermot as to an escort having gone a roundabout way for the sake of display, 11863–11865——Belief that in the present state of Ireland it is essential to employ troops at the elections, 11866.

Grounds for the conclusion that the adoption of the ballot in Ireland would not tend to promote tranquillity at the elections, the opposing parties being clearly defined, and well known to each other, 11867–11881. 11950–11952——Want of better education before the ballot is introduced, 11881. 11948, 11949——Concurrence in the view that if possible the use of troops, at the elections, should be dispensed with, 11882——Necessity of the orders of a magistrate before the troops can act; this does not apply to the constabulary, 11883–11886——Great importance of a large increase in the number of polling-places at Irish elections, 11887.

Examination with further reference to the disturbed state of Sligo county, at the time of the election, and in defence of the course pursued as regards the use of escorts for the protection of Conservative voters, 11888–11931——Distinctive features of elections in Ireland as compared with English elections, so that the employment of troops in the former case is indispensable, 11932–11940——Impartial employment of resident magistrates at the elections, without any reference to their political views, 11942–11947.

Payment of Members. Decided objection to the payment of Members, Kirk 4029.

Penalties. Approval of the law being made more stringent, and being readily enforced, Saville 2476——Conclusion as to the sufficient strictness of the present law for preventing bribery, &c., at Parliamentary elections, Storey 2845–2851——It would be no use whatever to render the penalties more strict, Sir S. Martin 10594——Inoperativeness of the provisions as to indicting for a misdemeanour or sueing for penalties, Sir C. Blackburn 11963. 11969.

Recommendation by Mr. James for the imposition of severer penalties for corrupt practices, Rep. xiv.

Percy, Major John William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a resident magistrate in the counties of Galway and Tipperary; was acting in Sligo at the election in November 1868; 11056–11060——Very severe character of the contest in Sligo, there having been two Conservative candidates and one Liberal candidate, 11061, 11062——Reference to an application to witness by Mr. Ffolliott for an escort for some voters, such escort not having been subsequently required, 11065–11067——Evidence in detail relative to an escort granted by witness at Ballymote several days before the election, for the protection of an agent named Lang in going to "warn" some voters of Colonel Cooper; explanation that witness never intended that this escort should bring back voters, 11068–11129.

Disturbed state of the district about Ballymote, when witness arrived there a fortnight before the election, 11100——Circumstances connected with the escort by witness, of some voters from Tobercurry to Ballymote two days before the election; previous protection of these men at the former place, 11130–11141. 11441–11445——Numerous car loads of voters escorted by witness on one occasion, these having been brought to him by an agent, 11142–11144. 11193–11200.——Action of agents in collecting the voters, 11194–11199. 11315–11317——Statement as to witness having granted an escort for some voters from the railway station at Ballymote, without any sworn information, 11145–11150——Explanation relative to the escort granted in the case of some Protestant voters from Mr. O'Hara's place at Coolaney, 11151–11162. 11174–11178. 11389–11402.

Ordinary character of the instructions received by witness from Government, when ordered to Ballymote, his general duty was to do all in his power to preserve peace within the district, 11163–11172. 11261–11270. 11308, 11309—Considerable force of military and police in the Ballymote polling district, 11173——Practice of witness and of stipendiary magistrates generally, as to the granting of escorts upon application by agents and others, without sworn informations, 11179–11185.

Inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. McDermot, that an escort went a circuitous route for the sake of display or intimidation, 11186. 11278, 11279——Care taken by witness to show that the voters being escorted were not under restraint, 11187, 11188. 11192–11219——Impression as to some voters being under the notion that they cannot leave the escort, 11189–11191——Belief that the voters in Sligo did not conceive the escorts were meant by Government for intimidation; injustice of any such impression or insinuation, 11201. 11260. 11347–11351.

Statement as to some voters having told witness they were afraid either of eviction on the one hand, or of the priest on the other, 11202–11205. 11352–11354. 11431–11434——Evidence showing that several outrages were committed against the property of voters on the Conservative side, some voters also having been personally injured, 11202, 11203. 11206–11236. 11407–11462——Great advantage if military escorts could be dispensed with; conclusion that the voters generally might reach the poll safely, if really anxious to vote, 11237–11253.

Further statement as to witness having granted escorts on the representations of agents and others, and without sworn informations, 11271, 11272. 11403–11406. 11446–11456. 11460–11480——Employment of escorts in Tipperary adverted to; much less excitement than in Sligo, 11272. 11327, 11328. 11438–11440——Opinion as to the necessity of military escorts being accompanied by a magistrate, whilst the constabulary can act on their own responsibility, 11273–11277. 11375–11385——Further evidence to the effect that the voters under escort are free to leave the escort, and that certain statements on this subject by General McMurdo are not well founded, 11280–11295. 11366–11374——Very few escorts granted by witness; necessity of these, 11296–11298. 11386–11388——Fearful excitement at the election; this was owing partially to the harangues of the Roman Catholic clergy, 11299–11302.

Belief as to escorts being applied for by the Roman Catholic party at elections in the north of Ireland, 11303–11306——Statement relative to the large force provided by Government at the Sligo election, and the applications made to them on the subject by the magistrates, 11307–11314. 11355–11360——Strong objection to General McMurdo's suggestion that the military at elections should be armed only with sticks, 11319–11322——Importance of an increased number of polling places at county elections, as in Sligo and Tipperary, 11323–11328.

Steps taken at the Sligo election to keep clear the passage to the poll, 11329–11333——Opinion as to the greater facility in polling if the ballot were adopted, 11334, 11335——Impression as to there being priestly intimidation in Ireland rather than landlord intimidation, 11336, 11337. 11413–11434——Statement that no complaints were made of witness's conduct at the Sligo election, 11338. 11345, 11346——Denial that it was any part of witness's duty to bring voters to the poll against their will, 11347. 11366–11374.

Action of the mob and of the priests on the Liberal side, 11361–11365——Opinion as to the sufficiency of a constable for accompanying a military escort when a magistrate is not available, 11435–11437——Particulars relative to a meeting of magistrates and of agents on the Conservative side, at which the question of escorts was considered, 11452, 11453. 11460–11480——Reports made by witness to Government on the subject of the election, he being directly responsible for his action in the matter, 11481–11489.

Personation. Equal check upon personation under the ballot as under open voting, Darvill 743–746. 838–840; Dutton 9138, 9139——Improvement if persons charged with personation, &c., were brought before a stipendiary magistrate instead of before the present class of magistrates in boroughs, Storey 2836–2840——Difficulty experienced in following up prosecutions for personation at Liverpool, a public prosecutor being desirable, Forwood 3396–3401——Difficulty under the ballot in checking personation, ib. 3402, 3403.

Conclusion as to the necessity of a public prosecutor for dealing with cases of personation at municipal elections, Davies 3682, 3683——Advantage if non-resident owners were not qualified to vote for municipal election, as obviating one of the chief causes of personation, ib. 3692——Further check to personation by a subdivision of polling districts, ib. 3693——Obstacles to carrying out prosecutions for personation at Cheltenham, ib. 3726–3728——Limited amount of personation at the Staleybridge municipal elections, Kirk 3957, 3958.

Efficiency of the check upon personation if there were parish voting, Right Hon. G. W. Hunt 9490. 9497. 9520.

Petitions:

Statement as to the unfair position in which Members are placed who are petitioned against under the Corrupt Practices Act; checks suggested in order that petitions may not be lightly presented, Torrens 8760–8766.

Success of the petitions in five cases out of thirteen tried by witness, Sir S. Martin 10516, 10517——Facility experienced by witness in obtaining all required information from witnesses on the petitions, ib. 10592——Statement to the effect that the judges do not consider themselves public prosecutors, ib. 10649. 10652——Belief as to there being no abuse in connection with the withdrawal of petitions; necessary consent of the judge before the withdrawal, ib. 10681–10685——Opinion as to the entire inaccuracy of the view that the judges had, by their decisions, rendered the success of petitions unduly difficult, ib. 10700–10702——Power of the electors to institute inquiry on the subject of corrupt practices, irrespectively of the question of unseating the sitting Member, ib. 10712, 10713.

Witness has tried ten election petitions, the seat having been voided in two instances on the ground of undue influence, Sir J. S. Willes 10714–10717——Opportunities of the judges for arriving at conclusions as to the general character of the boroughs where corrupt practices are alleged, ib. 10784, 10785——Explanation relative to the power of the judge, under section 32 of the Act, to require the attendance of any witness; difficulties as to the exercise of this power, ib. 10786–10792——Conclusion as to the injurious effect likely to result from the interference of the judge in calling witnesses, Sir S. Martin 10791——Suggestion that, if the judge is to act as a censor and to call witnesses, he should be furnished with a solicitor, Sir J. S. Willes 10797.

Check, through the taxation of costs, upon the expense of inquiries before a judge; impression as to the expense being less than inquiry before a Select Committee, Sir J. S. Willes 10805–10810——Great relief to the judge if he were assisted by two assessors in deciding upon questions of fact, Sir J. S. Willes 10811–10817; Sir C. Blackburn 12087–12089——Importance of the inquiry being local, Sir J. S. Willes 10818, 10819; Sir C. Blackburn 12098.

Examination upon the question of there being power under the Act to present a second petition when corrupt payments for treating or bribery are subsequently made; suggested amendments in this respect, Sir J. S. Willes 10826–10833——Explanation of the state of the law on the subject of a petition against a candidate or member on account of corrupt practices at a previous election at which he was a candidate, Sir J. S. Willes and Sir S. Martin 10834–10842——Statement showing that in the majority of the cases tried the costs followed the result, ib. 10843–10848.

Suggestion that in the case of Parliamentary elections the period for petitioning should be extended till after the returns of the expenses have been made and published, Sir C. Blackburn 11970. 11975. 11989–11996. 12073–12075——Incomplete evidence of corrupt practices which is brought out before the judge; consequent difficulty in reporting upon the character of the place, ib. 12008–12011——Consideration of the practice in regard to the furnishing of particulars as to alleged acts of bribery, &c., when a seat is claimed; objections to which open as affecting the sitting Member, ib. 12044–12052——Decided objection to a jury, ib, 12084.

Probability of corrupt practices having been somewhat checked through fear of the new tribunal for trying petitions, Sir C. Blackburn 12091——Ordinary legal course followed by witness in deciding as to the incidence of the expense of each petition; that is, that the cost should await the event. ib. 12093——Danger of lavish expenditure if the public were to be at the expense of petitioning, ib. 12094——Necessity of the management and expense of the petition resting with the public if the matter be treated as a public inquiry, ib. 12095.

Difficulty as to a public officer taking up the inquiry upon condition that a primâ facie case was first made out by one of the parties, Sir C. Blackburn 12096——Considerable amount of perjury in the cases that came before witness, ib. 12097——Concurrence in the view of Mr. Justice Willes that in the event of a corrupt payment after a petition had been tried, there might be a second petition; difficulty, however, involved in the question, ib. 12099.

Copies of the certificates and reports to the Speaker of the House of Commons from the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, App. 559–588.

Recommendation by Mr. James for extending the time for presenting petitions Rep. xiv.

Polling Places. Great inconvenience and expense in county elections through the voters having frequently to go many miles to the polling places, the expense of providing conveyance falling upon the candidates, Right Hon. G. W. Hunt 9490. 9534, 9535——Means of checking the expense of conveyance to the poll by increasing the number of polling places; increased expense, however, in the latter case, ib. 9501, 9502. 9516–9518——Doubt as to any insufficiency of polling places at borough elections in England, Sir S. Martin 10647, 10648.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee as to the advantage of a multiplication of polling places, if in combination with the ballot, and with the prohibition of the conveyance of voters to the poll, Rep. xx——Disapproval of an increase of polling places in combination with a system of open voting, ib.

Probyn, John W. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Sundry details in connection with the ballot system in Italy, showing that the elections are conducted without undue influence or bribery, with little expense to the candidates, and with very beneficial results generally, 12283 et seq.——Strictly secret character of the Italian ballot, 12291——Way in which the voting papers are procured by the electors, and character of the precautions against fraud, 12292–12303. 12316–12324——Arrangement as to the voter writing on the voting paper the name of the candidate for whom he polls, the candidates being well known through public meetings, &c., and there being no nomination, 12292–12298. 12352–12354. 12357–12364.

Conservative majority in the Italian Chamber under the ballot system of election, 12300. 12349, 12350——Considerable interest taken by the voters in the elections; statement hereon as to the proportion who poll as compared with the proportion in this country, 12306–12309. 12335–12338. 12365–12369——Effect of the ballot in Italy in neutralising all unfair influence on the part of the priests, 12312–12314. 12325–12331——Very orderly conduct of the elections, the military never being employed, 12333, 12334.

PUBLIC-HOUSES:

Important benefits anticipated from closing public-houses on election days, though it would be an unpopular measure, Darvill 891–893——Disorderly conduct at the Leeds elections in consequence of the treating, so that the closing of the public-houses on the day of the election would be a great improvement, Addyman 1418–1421. 1517–1522 —— Advantage in election meetings not being held at public-houses in Liverpool; approval of this plan being compulsory, Trippier 1903, 1904. 1928–1930——Great benefit if the public-houses were closed from the evening before the election day till the evening of that day, ib. 1906, 1907.

Approval of the proposal for closing the public-houses on the day of the election, and for prohibiting the use of public-houses for committee-rooms, Johnson 2004–2008. 2090–2092. 2110–2113——Approval of the public-houses being closed on the day of election, and of declaration of the poll, West 3029–3031 —— Great improvement if public-houses were closed at election time, Briggs 3295, 3296; Bush 4403, 4404—— Obstacle at Liverpool to dispensing with public-houses as the places of meeting of committees; approval of prohibiting the use of public-houses for public meetings held by the candidates, Forwood 3394, 3395. 3445–3465.

Suggestion whether on the eve of the polling day public-houses should not be closed at an early hour, Davies 3699——Prevention of much treating at Parliamentary elections if committees were not allowed at public-houses, Kirk 3917–3920——Advantage if public meetings for hearing the views of the candidate were not allowed to be held at public-houses, ib. 3939, 3940. 3998–4003—— Approval of a prohibition upon the holding of meetings or committees in public-houses, Murphy 5450–5456; M'Gowan 5999.

Advantage if public-houses were closed on the day of election and the day before, Thomas 5769; Ellard 7246——Great benefit if the public-houses were closed on the days of nomination and polling, M'Gowan 5999, 6000—— Proposal that all meetings be held at places not public-houses, such as schoolrooms, Latham 6481–6483. 6521.——Decided approval of the closing of public-houses on the day of election, Latham 6481. 6520; Spaight 7093; Sir S. Martin 10566–10570.

Opinion favourable to prohibiting the holding of committees at public-houses, Sir S. Martin 10587, 10588. 10616–10620. 10641——Excessive payment frequently made for committee-rooms at public-houses; instances of this at Salford, though witness did not decide that such payment was bribery within the meaning of the Act, ib. 10674, 10675. 10690–10699.——Advantage if committee-rooms were not held at public-houses, it being very difficult, however, in some instances, to provide them elsewhere, Sir J. S. Willes 10760–10765——Great improvement if public-houses were not used for committee-rooms, Sir C. Blackburn 12079, 12080.

Resolution proposed by Mr. Bright for the prohibition of committee-rooms in public-houses, Rep. xiv.

Conclusion, in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee as to the tranquillity and purity of election likely to result from closing the public-houses on the days of nomination and polling, Rep. xviii, xix.

ROXBURGHSHIRE:

1. Charge against Lord Lothian in respect of the Non-renewal of a Tenant's Lease, through his having voted at the County Election against his Lordship's Brother.
2. Explanatory Statement by Lord Lothian's Agent.
3. Counter-Statement by the Tenant in Question.
4. Letter on the Subject from Lord Lothian.
5. Influence otherwise exercised at the Election by Lord Lothian.
6. Generally as to the Influence exercised on both Sides.

1. Charge against Lord Lothian in respect of the Non-renewal of a Tenant's Lease through his having voted at the County Election against his Lordship's Brother:

Particulars of a case in Roxburghshire, in which a tenant who was about to get a renewal of his lease, was refused a lease altogether, because he had not voted a certain way at the general election, Russel 5813, 5814——Submissive letter sent by this tenant to his landlord, but without receiving any answer, ib. 5814——Eminence of the farmer in question as an agriculturist, ib.

Further statement as regards the Roxburgshire case, that the question of rent, and the conditions of the lease, were all settled when the landlord refused to renew, Russel 5936–5938.

2. Explanatory Statement by Lord Lothian's Agent:

Details relative to the refusal of Lord Lothian, through witness, to renew the lease of Timpendean farm to Mr. Scott, Otto 7277 et seq.——Denial that the cause assigned by Lord Lothian to witness, or by witness to Mr. Scott, for such refusal was that Mr. Scott had voted against his Lordship's brother at the Roxburgshire election, ib. 7278——The farm was surveyed by witness, and a report prepared in draft, but there had been no negotiations as to a renewal of the lease, nor was any rent mentioned, ib. 7285–7294. 7302–7308. 7431–7437——Instructions given by Lord Lothian to the effect that he did not intend to renew Mr. Scott's lease; no reason was assigned, but witness inferred that private reasons were the cause irrespectively of Mr. Scott's vote, ib. 7294, 7295. 7317–7325. 7373. 7396–7401. 7426–7430. 7488–7490.

Character of the conversation between witness and Mr. Scott, when the latter was informed that this lease would not be renewed; reference made by the latter to the part taken by him at the elections, Otto 7296, 7297——Letter from Mr. Scott to witness, dated 11th December 1868, on the subject of his vote, ib. 7298–7301——Denial that before the election witness held out any inducement to Mr. Scott to vote for Lord Lothian's brother, ib. 7311. 7316.

Circumstance of Mr. Scott having spoken disrespectfully of Lord Lothian's family at a farmer's dinner at Harwich; probability of this having caused the non-renewal of his lease, Otto 7321–7325. 7362–7373. 7389–7393. 7410. 7424, 7425. 7491–7496. 7503–7505 —— Examination relative to a letter from Mr. Scott to Lord Lothian with reference to the non-renewal of the lease; explanation as to this letter not having been answered, ib. 7332–7337. 7355–7359. 7407–7409. 7481–7487——Desire expressed by Lord Lothian that witness should attend the Committee, and explain that the refusal to renew the lease was not through the voting of Mr. Scott, ib. 7338–7340. 7402–7406.

Further details on various points connected with Mr. Scott's case, witness further denying that the decision not to renew his lease was a direct result of the part taken by him in the county election, Otto 7360 et seq.——Statement to the effect that Mr. Scott is not a first-class farmer, ib. 7417–7419. 7458. 7596.

Further statement that witness never told Mr. Scott that his lease would not be renewed because he had voted against Lord Schomberg Kerr; inference to this effect made by Mr. Scott himself, Otto 8043–8045. 8051, 8052. 8080–8083——Denial that witness told Mr. Scott's brother that Lord Lothian regretted his decision not to renew, ib. 8048–8050 —— Conditions and improvements spoken of when witness surveyed Mr. Scott's farm; denial, however, that certain work was subsequently done by Mr. Scott in posittve expectation of a continuance of his lease, ib. 8053–8056. 8091–8093.

Conversation of witness with Lord Lothian further adverted to; the latter assigned no reason for his decision not to renew the lease, and had not before him witness's report on the farm, Otto 8057–8071. 8078, 8079. 8086–8090——Denial that witness's report was directly favourable to a renewal, or that he told Mr. Scott everything was ready for renewal, ib. 8061–8068. 8072–8077——Further reference to the existence of private reasons as sufficient to account for Lord Lothian's decision; circumstance of this cause not having been mentioned to Mr. Scott, ib. 8083. 8094–8097.

3. Counter-

ROXBURGHSHIRE—continued.

3. Counter-Statement by the Tenant in Question:

Denial of the accuracy of Mr. Otto's statement that, at a meeting at Harwich, before the last election for Roxburghshire, witness spoke disrespectfully of the Marquis of Lothian or his family, Scott 7911–7915. 7964–7973. 8033–8042——Denial also of Mr. Otto's evidence that no reason was assigned when witness received notice to quit his farm; distinct statement by Mr. Otto that the lease would not be renewed because witness had voted against Lord Lothian's brother, ib. 7916–7923. 7934–7946. 8004–8006——Statement by Mr. Otto that his report was all ready for Lord Lothian's approval, ib. 7619.

Further statement by Mr. Otto to witness's brother as to the cause of non-renewal, Scott 7921–7923——Copy of letter from witness to Lord Lothian, dated 16th December 1868; this letter was directly in consequence of Mr. Otto's statement that the lease would not be renewed, ib. 7927–7933. 7974–7981——Witness made the foregoing copy at the time the letter was sent, ib. 7927, 7928.

Survey of the farm by Mr. Otto previously to the election; conditions as to renewal were then proposed, but nothing was said about rent, Scott 7947–7952——Circumstances under which witness induced another Liberal voter not to poll against Lord Lothian's brother in order to neutralise his own vote, ib. 7953–7963——Surprise of witness on hearing that his lease would not be renewed because of his vote; good terms existing at the time between himself and his landlord and agent, ib. 7982–7996——Statement as to witness having performed certain work on the farm in 1868 at the suggestion of Mr. Otto in prospect of renewal of lease, ib. 7999–8003. 8015–8032——Mention of several persons to whom witness at once repeated Mr. Otto's statement as to the cause of the lease not being renewed, ib. 8007–8014.

Explanatory statements on the subject of certain omissions in the copy of witness's letter to Lord Lothian; witness repeats that the copy was made when the letter was sent, and asserts that the omissions are purely accidental, Scott 8327 et seq.——Statement on the subject of the circulation in witness's neighbourhood of incorrect copies of his letter to Lord Lothian; these copies were taken without his knowledge, ib. 8339–8373.

Reference to a letter from Otto to witness, in October 1868, as indicating that he was about to survey the farm with reference to a renewal of the lease, Scott 8384, 8385——Belief as to Mr. Otto being the only person consulted by Lord Lothian relative to the letting of his farms, ib. 8386, 8387.

4. Letter on the Subject from Lord Lothian:

Letter from Mr. Russell to the Chairman of the Committee, enclosing letter from the Marquis of Lothian to the editor of the "Scotsman," in which it is admitted that the vote of Mr. Scott at the election was one of the reasons why he did not get a renewal of his lease, App. 591, 592.

5. Influence otherwise exercised at the Election by Lord Lothian:

Statement by the factor to the tenant in the foregoing case, that the landlord had decided not to give another lease o any tenant on his property who would vote against his (the landlord's) party, Russel 5814.

Denial that witness ever intimated to Mr. Scott, or any other tenant of Lord Lothian, that they must vote as his Lordship wished, nor did Lord Lothian ever give instructions to that effect, Otto 7309, 7310——Expiration in 1869 of the leases of four farms of Lord Lothian; renewal of these to the sitting tenants, two of whom had voted for the Liberal candidate, ib. 7326–7331. 7455–7464. 7501, 7502——Very few tenants of Lord Lothian canvassed by witness before the Roxburgshire election; no pressure was exercised, ib. 7341–7343. 7376–7381. 7386–7388. 7413–7416. 7470–7472.

Explanation that as regards two farms of Lord Lothian which were re-let to Liberal voters, that the agreements for renewal were made long before the election, Scott, 7924–7926——Exceptional instance in witness's case of non-renewel of lease by Lord Lothian on political grounds, ib. 7997, 7998.

With regard to the two farms re-let to Liberal voters, the agreements for these were made long before the election, Otto 8084, 8085.

6. Generally as to the Influence exercised on both Sides:

Belief that there was no pressure by any of the landlords in the county, Otto 7344——Considerable mob intimidation on the Liberal side, ib. 7345–7347——Coercion in the villages by the Liberals, ib. 7348–7351. 7382–7385——Active part taken in the election by the Dissenting ministers, ib. 7352–7354.

Russel, Alexander. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides at Edinburgh; is editor and part proprietor of the "Scotsman" newspaper, 5770-5772——Statement that corruption in a pecuniary form is almost entirely unknown at municipal and Parliamentary elections in Scotland, 5773-5787. 5798——Very pure character for several years past of the municipal and Parliamentary elections in Edinburgh, 5778. 5785-5787——Several causes to which the comparative purity of Scotch elections is attributable, 5788, 5789. 5884-5891——Importance of the constituencies, as created by the Reform Act of 1832, having been entirely new, and having no tradition of bribery, 5788, 5789——Very little intimidation or undue influence brought to bear in the boroughs, 5790-5796.

Similar absence of bribery at both county and borough elections, 5797, 5798—— Considerable amount of intimidation and undue influence on the part of landlords as regard the county elections; particular instances of this, 5798-5817——Social discontent of farmers in Scotland, whilst the questions of hypothec and game have also largely operated in separating them from the landlords, and in influencing their votes, 5800. 5803. 5896. 5905-5913. 5943-5948.

General system of nineteen years' leases in Scotland, the farmers however being liable to pressure from their landlords in respect of repairs, and as the leases approach termination, 5801, 5802——Several counties in which the tenants largely voted in direct opposition to the wishes of their landlords, 5803——Opportunities of witness for becoming conversant with cases of pressure by landlords in the counties of Dumfries and Roxburgh, at the last election; publicity of these cases, 5804-5813. 5892, 5893.

Particulars of a case in Roxburghshire in which a tenant who was about to get a renewal of his lease was refused a lease altogether because he had voted a certain way at the general election, 5813, 5814—— Statement by the factor to the tenant in the foregoing case, that the landlord had decided not to give another lease to any tenant on his property that would vote against his (the landlord's) party, 5814——Submissive letter sent by this tenant to his landlord, but without receiving any answer, ib.——Eminence of the farmer in question as an agriculturist, ib.

Numerous class of new county voters created in Scotland by the late Reform Act; less independent character of these in some counties than of the old voters, 5818, 5819—— Grounds for recommending the adoption of the ballot in Scotland, one important advantage being that it would prevent or diminish the importunate canvassing which now prevails, 5820, 5821. 5924. 5828-5832. 5940-5942. 5949. 5953. 5958-5964—— Objectionable canvassing by ladies at the county elections; frequent instances of loss of custom by Liberal tradesmen through their votes, 5821-5827. 5831. 5939——Pressure upon Conservative tradesmen in some districts, 5826. 5870.

Doubt as to the ballot having any effect in altering the relative proportion of Liberal and Conservative representatives in Scotland, 5831. 5864-5867——Very serious riots in some counties in former years; the mobs were then and are now all on the Liberal side, 5833-5839. 5856-5862. 5868——Particulars relative to the practice of creating fictitious votes, as carried out in certain counties; evils of the practice, which is however on the decline, 5834. 5840-5842. 5925-5928. 5930-5932.

Objections to the abolition of public nominations in Scotland; orderly manner in which conducted, 5843-5855——Vile habit of the Scotch mobs in regard to spitting upon adverse voters, 5857-5863. 5868, 5869——Active interest taken in the elections by the ministers of religion, other than those of the Established Church; there was not however any such exercise of undue influence as on the part of the landlords, 5871-5883. 5914-5916.

Revival of demand in Scotland for the ballot, 5897. 5964——Cessation, almost entirely, of Conservative contests for the boroughs, 5897. 5899-5904——Considerable expense of some of the Scotch elections, 5917-5924—— Great evil of canvassing further adverted to, 5920, 5921. 5924. 5959-5962——Very little expenditure at the elections in drink or treating, 5922, 5923——Increasing practice of putting up farms to the highest bidder, thus being one cause of the change of relations between landlord and tenant, 5933-5935.

Further statement, as regards the Roxburghshire case, that the question of rent and the conditions of the lease were all settled when the landlord refused to renew, 5936-5938——Expected secrecy as to the tenant's vote under the operation of the ballot, 5949-5952——Loose system of licensing public-houses in Scotland; abuse on this score in respect of the publicans' votes, 5954-5957.

Salford. Considerable amount of public-house expenditure at the Salford election of 1868 on the polling day, Sir S. Martin 10521.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin, in the matter of the Salford election petition, App. 574.

Saville, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was secretary of the Anti-screw Association formed at Staleybridge before the last election for preventing intimidation of voters, 2441, 2442. 2477; 2478——Subscription of about 160 l. to the funds of the association, 143 l. having been paid to thirty-eight men discharged by their employers for having voted on the Conservative side, 2443, 2444——Inquiry made, or conditions required, by the association before making any payment, 2445–2453.

Adoption of some legal proceedings at Staleybridge for intimidation; regret that these were eventually abandoned, though they had some beneficial effect, 2454–2465. 2479–2481——Grounds for objecting to the ballot at the municipal elections, though some remedy against intimidation is very essential, 2469-2476. 2482, 2483——Approval of the law being made more stringent, and being readily enforced, 2476——Particulars in connection with the subscriptions to the funds of the Anti-screw Association, 2484–2500.

SCOTLAND:

1. Almost Total Absence of Bribery and Treating at Scotch Elections.
2. Undue Influence at County Elections, on the part of Landlords and Others.
3. Very little Undue Influence in Boroughs.
4. Influence of Mobs on the Liberal Side.
5. Clerical Influence.
6. Expences of Elections.
7. Fictitious Votes.
8. Licensing System.
9. Demand for the Ballot.

1. Almost Total Absence of Bribery and Treating at Scotch Elections:

Statement that corruption in a pecuniary form is almost entirely unknown at municipal and Parliamentary elections in Scotland, Russel 5773–5787. 5798——Several causes to which the comparative purity of Scotch elections is attributable, ib. 5788, 5789. 5884–5891——Importance of the constituencies, as created by the Reform Act of 1832, having been entirely new, and having no tradition of bribery, ib. 5788, 5789——Effect of improved education, and of the interest taken in political matters, in preventing corrupt practices, ib. 5788. 5884–5891——Similar absence of bribery at both county and borough elections, ib. 5797, 5798——Very little expenditure at the elections in drink or treating, ib. 5922, 5923.

Probability of the absence of bribery in Scotland, being owing to the better education and better religious influence than in England, M'Gowan 6178–6183.

Reference in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee to the almost total absence of bribery at Scotch elections, Rep. xvii.

2. Undue Influence at County Elections, on the part of Landlords and Others:

Considerable amount of intimidation and undue influence on the part of landlords as regards the county elections; particular instances of this, Russel 5798–5817——Social discontent of farmers in Scotland, whilst the questions of hypothec and game have also largely operated in separating them from the landlords, and in influencing their votes, ib. 5800. 5803. 5896. 5905–5913. 5943–5948——General system of nineteen years' leases in Scotland, the farmers however being liable to pressure from their landlords in respect of repairs, and as the leases approach termination, ib. 5801, 5802——Several counties in which the tenants largely voted in direct opposition to the wishes of their landlords, ib. 5803.

Numerous class of new county voters created in Scotland by the late Reform Act; less independent character of these in semi-counties than of the old voters, Russel 5818, 5819——Objectionable canvassing by ladies at the county elections; frequent instances of loss of custom by Liberal tradesmen, ib. 5821–5827. 5831–5939. 5920, 5921. 5924. 5959–5962——Pressure upon Conservative tradesmen in some districts, ib. 5826. 5870——Increasing practice of putting up farms to the highest bidder, this being one cause of the change of relations between landlord and tenant, ib. 5933–5935.

3. Very little Undue Influence in Boroughs:

Slight extent to which intimidation or undue influence is brought to bear in the boroughs, Russel 5790–5796——Cessation almost entirely of Conservative contests for the boroughs, ib. 5897. 5899–5904.

4. Influence of Mobs on the Liberal Side:

Very serious riots in some counties in former years; the mobs were then and are now all on the Liberal side, Russel 5833-5839. 5856-5862. 5868——Vile habit of the Scotch mobs in regard to spitting upon adverse voters, ib. 5857-5863. 5868, 5869.

5. Clerical Influence:

Active interest taken in the elections by the ministers of religion, other than those of the Established Church; there was not however any such exercise of undue influence as on the part of the landlords, Russel 5871-5883. 5914-5916.

6. Expenses of Elections:

Considerable expense of some of the Scotch elections, the cost of conveyance to the poll being a heavy item of expense, Russel 5917-5924.

7. Fictitious Votes:

Particulars relative to the practice of creating fictitious votes, as carried out in certain counties; evils of the practice, which is however on the decline, Russel 5834. 5840-5842. 5925-5928. 5930-5932.

8. Licensing System:

Loose system of licensing public houses in Scotland; abuse on this score in respect of the publicans' votes, Russel 5954-5957.

9. Demand for the Ballot:

Grounds for recommending the adoption of the ballot in Scotland, one important advantage being that it would prevent or diminish the importunate canvassing which now prevails, Russel 5820, 5821. 5924. 5828-5832. 5940-5942. 5949-5953. 5958-5964——Doubt as to the ballot having any effect in altering the relative proportion of Liberal and Conservative representatives in Scotland, ib. 5831. 5864-5867——Revival of demand in Scotland for the ballot, ib 5897. 5964.

Scott, William. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a tenant of the Marquis of Lothian, and also occupies very largely under other landlords, 7905-7910——Denial of the accuracy of Mr. Otto's statement, that at a meeting at Harwick, before the last election for Roxburghshire, witness spoke disrespectfully of the Marquis of Lothian or his family, 7911-7915. 7964-7973. 8033-8042——Denial also of Mr. Otto's evidence, that no reason was assigned when witness received notice to quit his farm; distinct statement by Mr. Otto that the lease would not be renewed, because witness had voted against Lord Lothian's brother, 7916-7923. 7934-7946. 8004-8006.

Statement by Mr. Otto that his report was all ready for Lord Lothian's approval, 7919——Further statement by Mr. Otto to witness's brother as to the cause of non-renewal, 7921-7923——Explanation as regards two farms of Lord Lothian which were re-let to Liberal voters, that the agreements for renewal were made long before the election, 7924-7926.

Copy of letter from witness to Lord Lothian, dated 16th December 1868; this letter was directly in consequence of Mr. Otto's statement, that the lease would not be renewed, 7927-7933. 7974-7981——Witness made the foregoing copy at the time the letter was sent, 7928, 7929——Survey of the farm by Mr. Otto previously to the election; conditions as to renewal were then proposed, but nothing was said about rent, 7947-7952——Circumstances under which witness induced another Liberal voter not to poll against Lord Lothian's brother, in order to neutralise his own vote, 7953-7963.

Surprise of witness on hearing that his lease would not be renewed because of his vote; good terms existing at the time between himself and his landlord and agent, 7982-7996——Exceptional instance in witness's case of non-renewal of lease by Lord Lothian on political grounds, 7997, 7998——Statement as to witness having performed certain work on the farm in 1868, at the suggestion of Mr. Otto, in prospect of renewal of lease, 7999-8003. 8015-8032——Mention of several persons to whom witness at once repeated Mr. Otto's statement as to the cause of the lease not being renewed, 8007-8014.

[Second Examination.]—Explanatory statement on the subject of certain omissions in the copy of witness's letter to Lord Lothian; witness repeats that the copy was made when the letter was sent, and asserts that the omissions are purely accidental, 8327 et seq. ——Statement on the subject of the circulation in witness's neighbourhood of incorrect copies of his letter to Lord Lothian; these copies were taken without his knowledge, 8339-8373.

Reference to a letter from Mr. Otto to witness, in October 1868, as indicating that he was about to survey the farm, with reference to a renewal of the lease, 8384, 8385——Belief as to Mr. Otto being the only person consulted by Lord Lothian relative to the letting of his farms, 8386, 8387.

Scrutiny. Advantage of open voting as facilitating the amendment of a fraudulent return by means of a scrutiny, Fitzgerald 10890.

Sligo County:

1. As to the Employment of Troops and Escorts at the Election in 1868.
2. Action of the Landlords.
3. Action of the Roman Catholic Clergy, and of the Mobs.
4. Action of the Magistrates.
5. Withdrawal of the Petitions against the Return of the Sitting Members.

1. As to the Employment of Troops and Escorts at the Election in 1868:

Very bad effect produced by the extensive employment of the military and police in escorting unwilling voters to the poll; belief of the people that Government intimidation as well as landlord coercion was intended, McDermot 8522 et seq.; 8640, 8641. 8716, 8717——Statement as to escorts having been asked for and granted several days before the election, ib. 8523–8531. 8547. 8654. 8658——Particulars relative to an escort which went to Ballymote six days before the election, without succeeding in getting a single voter to accompany them, ib. 8530-8546. 8633–8641——Reference to an escort three days before the election, which took the voters a circuitous route for the purpose of display, ib. 8547–8551.

Total of twenty-four escorts sent out during the election; very few voters who submitted to be escorted, McDermot 8555–8592——Instances of five escorts sent out without sworn informations; application or requisition necessary in these cases as in others, ib. 8557. 8631, 8632——Objectionable character of the informations on which some escorts were provided, ib. 8563-8573.

Belief as to the Government officials in Sligo having had intimidation in view in the employment of military escorts, McDermot 8622, 8623. 8640. 8641——Failure of the escort system, witness for one impressing upon the people that they need not accompany the escorts, ib. 8642–8649——Probability of escorts having been demanded by the landlords, through the tenants stating that they were afraid to go to the poll on the Conservative side, ib. 8715-8718.

Very severe character of the contest in Sligo, there having been two Conservative candidates and one Liberal candidate, Percy 11061, 11062——Reference to an application to witness by Mr. Ffolliott for an escort for some voters, such escort not having been subsequently required, ib. 11065–11067——Evidence in detail relative to an escort granted by witness at Ballymote several days before the election, for the protection of an agent named Lang, in going to "warn" some voters of Colonel Cooper; explanation that witness never intended that this escort should bring back voters, ib. 11068–11129.

Disturbed state of the district about Ballymote when witness arrived there a fortnight before the election, Percy 11100—— Circumstances connected with the escort by witness of some voters from Tobercurry to Ballymote two days before the election; previous protection of these men at the former place, ib. 11130–11141. 11441–11445——Numerous car loads of voters escorted by witness on one occasion, these having been brought by an agent, ib. 11142–11144. 11193–11120——Statement as to witness having granted an escort for some voters from the railway station at Ballymote without any sworn information, ib. 11145–11150.

Explanation relative to the escort granted in the case of some Protestant voters from Mr. O'Hara's place at Coolaney, Percy 11151–11162. 11174–11178. 11389–11402—— Considerable force of military and police in the Ballymote polling district, ib. 11173—— Inaccuracy of a statement by Mr. McDermot, that an escort went a circuitous route for the sake of display or intimidation, ib. 11186. 11278, 11279——Care taken by witness to show that the voters being escorted were not under restraint, ib. 11187, 11188. 11192–11219.

Belief that the voters in Sligo did not conceive the escorts were meant by Government for intimidation; injustice of any such impression or insinuation, Percy 11201. 11260. 11348–11351——Further statement as to witness having granted escorts on the representations of agents and others, and without sworn informations, ib. 11271, 11272. 11403–11406. 11446–11456. 11460–11480——Very few escorts granted by witness; necessity of these, ib. 11296–11298. 11386–11388——Statement relative to the large force provided by Government at the election, and the applications made to them on the subject by the magistrates, ib. 11307–11314. 11355–11368——Steps taken at the election to keep clear the passage to the poll, ib. 11329–11333.

1. As to the Employment of Troops and Escorts, &c.—continued.

Peculiarly disturbed state of the county of Sligo at the time of the election; necessity of protection for the Conservative voters, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11841–11862—— Explanation relative to the employment of the constabulary in Sligo in escorting voters from the country some days before the polling, ib. 11842–11850——Denial of a statement by the Rev. Mr. McDermot as to an escort having gone a roundabout way for the sake of display. ib. 11863–11865.

Examination with further reference to the disturbed state of Sligo county at the time of the election, and in defence of the course pursued as regards the use of escorts for the protection of Conservative voters, Right Hon. J. W. Patten 11888–11931.

2. Action of the Landlords:

Great intimidation practised by Conservative landlords at the election for Sligo county in 1868; several instances cited, McDermot 8500-8511 —— Circumstance of Mr. O'Conor (the Liberal candidate) and witness having advised several tenants to vote on the Conservative side in order to escape subsequent punishment by their landlords, ib. 8504. 8510, 8511——Instances of tenants having privately asked for threats in order to justify them to their landlords for voting against their wishes, ib. 8515–8511.

Rare instances of landlord intimidation having been followed up by eviction, McDermot 8711, 8712. 8719, 8720——Doubt as to any tenants intimating to their landlords that there had better be some show of coercion, else they should be constrained to vote on the other side, ib. 8713, 8714—— Good landlords in Sligo as a rule, witness complaining of the system of intimidation, and not of individual coercion, ib. 8719-8721.

Action of agents in collecting the voters, Percy 11194–11199. 11315-11317—— Statement as to some voters having told witness they were afraid either of eviction on the one hand or of the priest on the other, ib. 11202–11205. 11352-11354. 11413–11434——Reference to a certain confidential report by witness as containing an explanation on the subject of an undue interference by landlords with some voters at the Sligo election, Lord Strathnairn 11747. 11750.

3. Action of the Roman Catholic Clergy, and of the Mobs:

Popular intimidation of voters at the Sligo election with a view to their not yielding to landlord coercion, M'Dermot 8512-8514. 8650——Evidence in explanation and justification of the active part taken by witness and the Roman Catholic clergy on the Liberal side, ib. 8576–8590. 8611–8615. 8659–8674. 8691–8710——Offer made by witness to the landlords that both priests and landlords should abstain from influencing the election, ib. 8582. 8716.

Denial that the priests, in addressing the people in chapel, have used words of denunciation, McDermot 8691-8699—— Statement as to the priests having sometimes addressed the people in the churchyards on the Sunday before the polling as to their duty at the election, ib. 8697–8708.

Evidence showing that several outrages were committed against the property of voters on the Conservative side, some voters also having been personally injured, Percy 11202, 11203. 11206–11236. 11407–11412—— Fearful excitement at the election; this was owing partially to the harangues of the Roman Catholic clergy, ib. 11299-11302—— Action of the mob and of the priests on the Liberal side, ib. 11361–11365.

4. Action of the Magistrates:

Comment upon the partial conduct of one of the stipendiary magistrates at the last election, M'Dermot 8624–8627. 8722, 8723.

Statement that no complaints were made of witness's conduct at the election, Percy 11338. 11345, 11346—— Ordinary character of the instructions received by witness from the Government when ordered to Ballymote: his general duty was to do all in his power to preserve peace within the district, ib. 11163-11172. 11261–11270. 11308, 11309—— Denial that it was any part of witness's duty to bring voters to the poll against their will, ib. 11347. 11366–11374.

Particulars relative to a meeting of magistrates and of agents on the Conservative side at which the question of escorts was considered, Percy 11452, 11453. 11460–11480—— Reports made by witness to Government on the subject of the election, he being directly responsible for his action in the matter, ib. 11481–11489.

5. Withdrawal of the Petitions against the Return of the Sitting Members:

Report by Chief Justice Monahan relative to the withdrawal of the petitions in the case of the county election, App. 588.

12. Practice as to the Declaration of the Poll.
13. Petitions.
14. General Satisfaction given by the Ballot in the Colony.
15. Municipal Elections.
16. Other Details generally.

1. As to the Introduction of the Ballot in the Colony:

Witness was strongly opposed to the introduction of the ballot in South Australia, and as member of the Government did all in his power to prevent its adoption, Torrens 8726. 8845. 8853——The ballot was adopted in 1856, having been called for by public opinion as a remedy for the bribery, treating, intimidation, and rioting, which prevailed under the system of open voting, ib. 8726-8733. 8767-8769. 8845-8855——Separate Acts for the ballot and the suffrage, ib. 8926.

Credit taken by witness for being the father of the ballot in Australia; no act of his political life has given him so much satisfaction, Dutton 9167, 9168——Statement as to the circumstances attending the adoption of the ballot in the colony; how the details were settled, ib. 9302-9312.

2. Nomination of Candidates:

Satisfactory arrangements with reference to the nomination of candidates, no public speeches being allowed, and their being no rioting or disturbance, Torrens 8742, 8743. 8780-8783. 8903-8905. 8939-8942——Nomination of the candidates on the day of election, ib. 8743.

3. Public Addresses by Candidates, and practice as to Canvassing:

Prohibition upon public addresses by candidates for two days before the election, so as to prevent disturbance, Torrens 8742. 8780-8782. 8906——Practice as to public meetings before the elections, there being also some personal canvassing, but not nearly to the same extent as in this country, ib. 8774-8777. 8830-8832. 8856-8858. 8898-8902. 8922-8925.

Opportunities of the candidates for addressing the electors within twenty-four hours of the election, there being, however, a prohibition upon canvassing by candidates, Dutton 9039. 9068, 9069. 9179-9209. 9245. 9291-9296——System of canvassing in the colony by the candidates' friends or agents; there has been less of this since the ballot, ib. 9203-9208. 9241-9244. 9294-9298. 9316.

4. Detailed Arrangements for working the Ballot:

Delivery of a voting card to each voter, who retires into a sort of sentry box and puts a mark opposite the name of the candidate whom he supports, Torrens 8743, 8744——The card is then folded by the voter, and dropped into the ballot box, which is locked, ib. 8744——Collection of the ballot boxes after the election, when the voting cards are examined, and the votes counted by the returning officer and scrutineers, after which there is a public declaration of the result, ib. 8744-8747. 8787-8789——Small proportion of lost votes; how these occur, ib. 8930-8932. 9001-9004——Destruction of the voting papers immediately after the declaration of the poll; question hereon whether proof of bribery is not thereby rendered very difficult, ib. 9005. 9007-9015.

Clause of the Electoral Act of 1858, explanatory of the arrangements laid down for the working of the ballot, Dutton 9028——Destruction of the voting cards immediately after the scrutiny, ib. 9046——Form of voting paper in use, ib.——Simplicity and efficiency of the machinery under the ballot, ib. 9135——Description of the process of ballot voting in the colony; belief as to their being no fraud in respect of voting papers, ib. 9186-9196——Rejection of many votes as being informal, ib. 9254-9256. 9353-9355.

Description of the points of difference between the ballot in Tasmania, New South Wales, and Victoria, on the one hand, and in South Australia on the other, Sir C. W. Dilke 10250, 10251. 10256.

5. Effect as regards Bribery:

Conclusion as to bribery, which was formrley very prevalent, having almost entirely disappeared under the ballot; exceptional instance to the contrary, Torrens 8736, 8737.

5. Effect as regards Bribery—continued.

8967. 8968. 8984. 9013——Absence of any imputations of bribery conditional upon the return of the candidate, Torrens 8927-8929.

6. Effect as regards Intimidation.

Way in which the ballot operates in Australia as a Conservative measure; that is in obviating coercion by mobs or trades unions, Torrens 8847, 8848. 8935, 8936. 8974-8978——Doubt as to any coercion of voters under the ballot, Dutton 9047, 9048.

7. Checks upon Personation:

Presence of scrutineers in the poling booth on behalf each candidate, so as to check personation; efficiency of this precaution, Torrens 8743. 8790-8794. 8797-8800, 8946-8948——Sufficiency of the checks and penalties in regard to personation, Dutton 9049-9052——Circumstance of an election not being voided by personation, the check upon personation being, however, very efficient, ib. 9252, 9253. 9257-9265.

8. Effect as regards Rioting:

Exceedingly beneficial effect of the ballot in the prevention of rioting at the elections in the colony; illustration of this at Adelaide, Torrens 8736. 8855. 8907. 8915, 8916——Absence not only of election riots, but of any attempt at forcible interference with the ballot boxes before the declaration of the poll, ib. 8859-8861. 8865-8869——Great disturbances formerly through the publication of the state of the poll, ib. 8871, 8872——Circumstance of witness having supported dual voting in Australia as a Conservative measure; excitement at the elections on this question, but without rioting or coercion, ib. 8907-8911. 8989-8992.

Very orderly conduct of the elections, though there is a good deal of political excitement, Dutton 9067. 9070-9072. 9127. 9132-9134. 9148, 9149——Very riotous character of the elections when the voting was open; disappearance of this under the ballot, ib. 9127. 9132-9134. 9183-9185. 9210-9221. 9251——The disappearance of rioting is not attributable to the extinction of one of the opposing political parties, but simply to the ballot, ib. 9183-9185.

9. Effect as regards Treating:

Great expenditure formerly in treating, whereas now there is no inducement to incur this expense, which is moreover illegal, Dutton 9127-9132. 9218-9221.

10. Effect as regards Expense:

Great diminution of candidates' expenses since the ballot has been in force; instance of this in witness's election for Adelaide, Torrens 8738, 8739. 8756, 8757. 8801-8803. 8969, 8970——Much less expense to candidates since the ballot, there being in fact no corrupt expenditure now, Dutton 9314, 9315. 9330-9339——Statement as to all the legal expenses of elections in South Australia being paid by the State, ib. 9340. 9345-9350. 9356-9358.

Return showing the total expenses of the general election of the present Parliament of South Australia, under various heads, App. 593.

11. Question as to Secrecy being Secured:

Statement that it is generally known how the electors vote, though there are exceptions to this rule; secrecy in fact is not now necessary as a prevention against bribery or coercion, as the notion of practising these evils has quite passed out of mind, Torrens 8754, 8755. 8778, 8779. 8833-8844. 8982-8985——Belief as to the voting in some districts being sometimes known before the general result is declared, ib. 8862-8864.

Correction of an inference drawn from Colonel Torrens's evidence that the ballot was not secret, Dutton 9030-9033——Inaccuracy also of an inference that the state of the poll became known before the declaration, ib. 9033-9036——Advantage of the state of the poll not being known, ib. 9133.

12. Practice as to the Declaration of the Poll:

Delay of a day or two before the declaration of the poll, Torrens 8744. 8759-8961——Public declaration of the state of the poll without the Members being present, and without any speeches being made, ib. 8784-8786. 8906. 8943-8945. 8963.

13. Petitions:

Exceptional instance of a petition in South Australia in witness's experience of the ballot there; doubt as to the means of proving the voting in such cases, the voting cards being destroyed immediately after the election, Torrens 8770, 8771. 8795, 8796. 9005. 9007-9015——Very rare instances of petitions, Dutton 9040, 9041——Explanation relative to a petition which was successful on the score of bribery, in the shape of travelling expenses of voters, ib. 9042-9045. 9085-9089——Information relative to the constitution and working of the court for the trial of petitions in South Australia; satisfactory result in the few cases hitherto tried, ib. 9111-9121.

14. General Satisfaction given by the Ballot in the Colony:

Perfect ease, smoothness, and facility, with which the ballot has worked in South Australia, whilst under it there is no bribery or undue influence, Torrens 8751. 8753——Universality of the feeling in the colony in favour of the ballot as at present conducted, it having been found to work admirably, ib. 8845, 8846. 8949-8952. 8979-8981——Opposition made to the ballot by witness as the leader of the Conservative party in the colony, whereas the feeling is now general in favour of the measure, ib. 8853. 8979-8981.

There was much opposition to the adoption of the measure, but now all parties approve of it, Dutton 9023, 9024——Conclusion as to the very beneficial operation of the system of secret voting in the colony, ib, 9077, 9078. 9127 et seq.——Continued unanimity of the colonial feeling in favour of the ballot, ib. 9145-9147.

15. Municipal Elections:

Use of the ballot at municipal elections in the colony as well as at the Parliamentary elections, Torrens 8953-8955.

16. Other Details generally:

Explanation of the mode in which the electoral roll is made up in South Australia, the practice being very similar to that in this country, Torrens 8740, 8741——Belief that a man who cannot read is prevented from voting; very few such men in South Australia, ib. 8748-8750. 8880. 8917-8921——There are thirty-six members in the Lower House, and twelve in the Upper, ib. 8772, 8773——Abolition of the former distinction between Liberals and Conservatives, since the adoption of the new constitution and of manhood suffrage and triennial Parliaments; there is in fact no longer a Conservative party, but the ballot has had nothing to do with this, ib. 8804-8808. 8986-8992. 8935.

Constant change of political opinion, and of the ministry, since universal suffrage, Torrens 8804-8810. 8814——Leading questions by which the two parties in the State are now distinguished; little popular excitement upon these subjects, ib. 8804-8810. 8988. 8935-8938——Very similar class of representatives elected under the ballot and universal suffrage, as under the previous system, ib. 8810-8813——General emulation among the candidates or members to obtain office, ib. 8810.

Large proportion of the electors who do not take the trouble of going to the poll; there has been little if any difference in this respect since the ballot, Torrens 8815-8823——Claims and solicitations by constituents in respect of patronage; means of the member for knowing that he had received the support of such claimants, ib. 8824-8830——There is a property qualification for the Upper House, the elections for both houses being conducted by the ballot, ib. 8873, 8874——Further explanation relative to the elective franchise in the colony, and the system of registration, ib. 8875-8877——Denial that the ballot has had the effect of inducing candidates to promise any greater expenditure of the public money, in order to gain votes, ib. 8882-8885.

Doubt as to any more frequent change of members by the constituencies in South Australia than in England, Torrens 8894, 8895——Division of Adelaide into three districts, each returning one member, ib. 8962. 8997, 8998——Varying class of men in the Colonial Legislature, the wealthier class alone not taken an active interest in politics, ib. 8971-8973——Similarity between some of the electoral districts in the colony and constituencies in England, several of the former constituencies being very small, ib. 8995 8996.

Very similar plan of registration of electors in South Australia and in England, Dutton 9026. 9055, 9056——Appointment by Government of the returning officer, the latter appointing the deputy returning officers, ib. 9026, 9027——Statement of the number of electors for the House of Assembly and for the Upper House respectively, and of the composition of each House; use of the ballot, ib. 9053-9066——Total of eighteen electoral districts returning two members each, there being two districts in Adelaide, ib. 9053, 9054. 9317-9319——Frequent re-election of the same men, ib. 9073-9076.

Disadvantage of those voters in the colony who live at a distance from the polling places, it being illegal to convey voters to the poll; this is unavoidable, Dutton 9103-9110. 9140-9145. 9150-9156——Average of from sixty to seventy per cent. of the electors who voted; similar proportion before the adoption of the ballot, ib. 9110. 9299-9301——Total of about nine per cent. of the electors who cannot read; decided objection to these having any assistance in order to enable them to vote, ib. 9121-9126. 9351, 9352.

Absence of similar political parties in the colony as in England; there are, however, opposing parties in the Legislative Assembly, Dutton 9164-9166. 9181, 9182. 9226-9228——Dissent from the view that the ballot has caused any deterioration in the constitution of the Legislative Assembly, or in the efficiency of the Government, ib. 9169-9189. 9246-9250. 9341, 9342——Denial that candidates generally promise to support a large expenditure of public money, ib. 9178-9180——Frequent changes of

Administration, Dutton 9222——Local character of most of the questions at elections, ib. 9223, 9224.

Explanation of the legal provisions for dealing with corrupt practices, the Act of 1851 having been superseded by the Act of 1858, Dutton 9229–9240——Satisfactory operation of the ballot as regards the Irish population in the colony; absence of religious animosity or of undue pressure on the part of Roman Catholic clergy, ib. 9267-9290. 9343, 9344.

South Carolina (Ballot). See United States.

South-West Lancashire. Statement as to the want of facilities for increasing the number of polling places at the South-West Lancashire elections, Forwood 3301–3306. 3597, 3498.

Spaight, James. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a magistrate and merchant at Limerick, and has had more than thirty years' experience of the elections for the city, 6817–6821 — Great violence at the election in 1837, when Mr. Monsell was the Conservative candidate, 6820–6824——Dreadful violence also at the election in 1852, the supporters of Mr. Russell having been in great danger, and the houses of many of them having been wrecked by the mob, 6825–6827——Return of Major Gavin at the election in 1858, he having been subsequently unseated on petition, and witness having come forward and been elected, 6828–6834.

Defeat of witness at the election in 1859, owing to the intimidation and violence which prevailed; failure, however, of the petition promoted by him on these grounds, 6835–6839. 7026–7030——Further contest of the city by witness in 1865, when he was again defeated owing to the violence displayed towards the Conservative side; reason for his not petitioning on this occasion, 6840–6842. 7031, 7032.

Evidence in detail relative to the extremely active part taken in the Limerick elections by the Roman Catholic secular clergy or parish priests; great intimidation exercised by them, 6843–6846. 6876, 6877. 6885–6896. 6985 et seq.——Practice of the priests as to addressing the people outside the chapels, 6846——Influence used by the priests in order that Sunday shall intervene between the day of nomination and of polling, 6847–6849 ——Circumstance of Mr. Murphy having been conducting agent for Mr. Ball, when Major Gavin was unseated for bribery, 6850.

Examination to the effect that at the last election there was no coalition between Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott, and that the Conservative party did not support the latter, 6851-6862. 6924-6940. 7133-7138——Statement that Sir Peter Tait was not put forward by the Conservative party, and did not issue an address, 6860-6862. 6924-6929. 7136, 7137——Great intimidation of Sir Peter Tait's supporters on the election day; the town was, however, quiet up to about one o'clock, 6863-6868. 7120–7125——Practice of the landlords and their agents to accompany the tenants, escorts being necessary to protect them from the mobs, 6869–6872——Attacks made upon well-known Conservatives, as well as upon Roman Catholic voters who do not support the Liberal side, 6873-6876——Practice of wrecking Conservatives' houses as a means of intimidation, 6874. 7059, 7060——Necessary precautions taken by witness at election times, in order to prevent his house being wrecked; statement as to its having been wrecked in 1865, in the presence of the military, 6874. 7055–7062——Circulation by the Liberals of an Orange placard at the election of 1865, in order to create religious hatred, 6878–6880.

Evidence in support of the conclusion, that as regards the Limerick elections, the ballot would be no effectual check upon priestly influence and intimidation, though it might protect the voter against the landlord, 6881–6885. 6906-6912. 6950–6984. 7006. 7015–7025. 7076–7089. 7126–7132.

Great advantage if the clergy of all persuasions at Limerick could be debarred from taking any part in the elections, 6885——Grounds for the statement that the priests have been active, not only in the organization of mobs, but in the distribution of whisky to them, 6886-6895. 6985-6992——Very active part taken by the Roman Catholic bishop of Limerick in the last election, on the polling day, 6896——Further statement as to the inaccuracy of Mr. Murphy's evidence, that intimidation by mobs does not prevail on the polling day, 6897-6905. 7120-7125——Practice of bringing in the country voters the night before the polling, in order to avoid intimidation, 6898-6905.

Employment of mobs on both sides for canvassing; practice in this respect at the last election, 6913-6923. 6941-6949——Advantage of the ballot as tending to modify the intimidation by mobs, 6950–6955. 6993, 6994. 7075——Frightful scenes at the nominations at Limerick, it being very desirable to abolish nominations altogether, 6994, 6995. 7089-7092——Active part taken by the priests in the polling booths as agents, landlords or their agents not exercising any similar influence, 6999–7002. 7063–7074. 7096–7105. 7111, 7112—— Conclusion as to the poorer class of voters in the city voting generally as the priests wish, 7003–7014. 7040——Failure of the petition against the return for Limerick at the last election, 7033–7036—Large proportion of the constituency who are Roman Catholics, 7037–7040——Information relative to the steps taken by the authorities for the prevention of violence, military and police being constantly employed, 7041–7058.

Question as to the side on which those voters would poll, who are now brought in from the country districts by their landlords, if they were entirely uncontrolled; belief that very many of them would not vote at all, 7080–7088. 7113–7117——Decided approval of the closing of public-houses on the day of election, 7093——Advantage if the wholesale distribution of drink, as at Limerick, could invalidate an election, 7094, 7095——Instances of intimidation in connection with the petition against the last election for Limerick, 7108–7110.

Spiritual Intimidation. Impression that spiritual intimidation comes within the definition in the Corrupt Practices Act, Sir S. Martin 10609–10611——Concurrence of witness with Mr. Justice Keogh in the view that spiritual intimidation comes within the fifth section of the Corrupt Practices Act, Sir J. S. Willes 10804.

STALEYBRIDGE:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections.

Prevalence of intimidation and treating at the Staleybridge municipal elections; doubt as to bribery being resorted to, Stanley 2178–2181——Large expenditure at the elections, chiefly by one party, ib. 2182–2184——Conduct recently of the municipal elections with reference to the subsequent Parliamentary election, treating and undue influence having been largely practised at the former, ib. 2185, 2186. 2197–2204. 2239–2241——Particulars relative to the intimidation, as practised chiefly by the millowners and overlookers of the Radical party, ib. 2187–2196. 2231 et seq.

Information in connection with the Anti-Screw Association formed at Staleybridge, for the protection of Conservative voters in the mills, &c., Stanley 2209–2213. 2264–2267. 2297. 2392–2399. 2409–2412——Majority of the town councillors of Staleybridge on the Liberal side, intimidation being practised only by the Liberal millowners, ib. 2231–2249——Statement as to the Conservatives having been at one period in a majority in the town council, ib. 2280–2282——Further evidence on the subject of intimidation as practised by millowners on the Liberal side, ib. 2290–2305. 2409–2411——Beneficial effect of the legal steps taken for preventing intimidation, ib. 2298–2305——Varying wages of the mill hands, ib. 2321–2329.

Prevalence of treating at the municipal elections further adverted to, Stanley 2402–2406——Practice as to the holding of meetings by the candidates, and as to the canvass of the electors, ib. 2431–2438——Increased introduction of political feeling into the municipal elections on the probability of the borough having the Parliamentary franchise, ib. 2439, 2440.

Witness was secretary of the Anti-Screw Association formed at Staleybridge before the last election for preventing intimidation of voters, Saville 2441, 2442. 2477, 2478——Subscription of about 160 l. to the funds of the association, 143 l. having been paid to thirty-eight men discharged by their employers for having voted on the Conservative side, ib. 2443, 2444——Inquiry made, or conditions required by the association before making any payment, ib. 2445–2453——Adoption of some legal preceedings for intimidation; regret that these were eventually abandoned, though they had some beneficial effect, ib. 2454–2465. 2479–2481——Particulars in connection with the subscriptions to the funds of the Anti-Screw Association, ib. 2484–2500.

Dissent from Mr. Stanley's statement, that intimidation and treating prevailed extensively at the Staleybridge municipal elections, Kirk 3831, 3832. 3835 et seq.——Inaccuracy of a statement, that the town clerk or borough surveyor had taken part in canvassing servants of the corporation for the Liberal candidate, ib. 3832——Denial also of a statement, that some servants of the corporation were discharged for not voting for the Liberal candidate, ib. 3832, 3833.

Conclusion as to intimidation not having been practised on the part of Liberal employers; examination on this point generally, and on the reported discharge of certain men by witness's firm, Kirk 3834. 3849–3868. 3877 et seq.——Explanation relative to the expenditure at municipal contests, and the practice of the committees on each side in regard to treating, ib. 3835–3849. 3869–3876.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Undue influence used towards some railway servants with reference to the Parliamentary election in 1868, Stanley 2196——Adoption of some legal proceedings relative to intimidation at the Parliamentary election, no such steps having ever been taken in reference to the municipal elections, ib. 2205–2208. 2246——Inquiry after the Parliamentary election, the result being that the Member retained his seat, ib. 2247–2249. 2287–2289.

Refutation of a statement by Mr. Stanley that some railway workmen at Staleybridge were discharged from employment for voting for the Liberal candidate at the last Parliamentary election, Kirk 3832——Intimidation at the Parliamentary election on the part of the Murphyite section, ib. 3849–3853. 3908–3916. 3967–3970——Belief that on neither side was intimidation practised at the mills, ib. 3971–3974.

Particulars relative to the expenses at the last Parliamentary election for Staleybridge which came under witness's cognizance, as returning officer; statement hereon as to witness not having examined the vouchers, Kirk 3921–3938. 4004–4006. 4022–4026——Excitement on the day of Parliamentary nomination and of election, though persons were hardly deterred from voting, ib. 3959–3964.

Illustration in the Staleybridge case of the difficulty of deciding what constitutes agency, Sir C. Blackburn 12027.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the matter of the Staleybridge Election Petition, App. 574.

Stanley, Robert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had many years' experience of the working of the municipal elections at Staleybridge, 2171–2177——Submits details relative to the intimidation and treating practised on the Liberal side at the Staleybridge municipal elections, 2178 et seq.——Large expenditure at the elections, chiefly by one party, 2182–2184——Impression at Staleybridge as to the law being much more strict for the prevention of abuse in the case of the Parliamentary election than of the municipal election, 2202. 2239–2245——Adoption of some legal proceedings relative to intimidation at the Parliamentary election, no such steps having ever been taken in reference to the municipal elections, 2205–2208. 2246.

Information in connection with the Anti-Screw Association formed at Staleybridge for the protection of Conservative voters in the mills, &c., 2209–2213. 2264–2267. 2297. 2392–2399. 2409–2412——Approval of the ballot as a protection to the voter at municipal elections, though it is not expedient in the case of Parliamentary elections; examination as to the grounds for this distinction, 2214 et seq.——Advantage if there were a public prosecutor, as a check upon corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections, 2214. 2264–2267. 2306–2308. 2317–2320. 2390, 2391.

Majority of the town councillors of Staleybridge on the Liberal side, intimidation being practised only by the Liberal millowners, 2231–2249. 2269–2284——Inquiry after the Parliamentary election, the result being that the Member returned retained his seat, 2247–2249. 2287–2289——Statement as to the Conservatives having been at one period in a majority on the town council, 2280–2282.

Beneficial effect of the legal steps taken for preventing intimidation, 2298–2305——Importance of the influence of public opinion, backed by stringent laws, as a check to corrupt practices at Parliamentary elections, 2306–2312. 2378–2386. 2407, 2408——Advantage of the ballot at the municipal elections as a means of doing away with corrupt practices at the Parliamentary elections, 2313–2316——Varying wages of the mill hands at Staleybridge, 2321–2329——Approval of an extension of the ballot to Parliamentary elections if found successful at municipal elections, 2400——Prevalence of treating at the municipal elections further adverted to, 2402–2406.

Tranquil character of the nomination at Staleybridge; objection to public nominations being abolished, 2419–2430——Practice as to the holding of meetings by the candidates, and as to the canvass of the electors, 2431–2438——Increased introduction of political feeling into the municipal elections on the probability of the borough having the Parliamentary franchise, 2439, 2440.

State of the Poll. Less tendency to bribery at the municipal elections if the state of the poll were not published till the close, Barber 244–247——Objection to the publication of the state of the poll till the final close of the poll, Butler 482, 483——Less probability of bribery if the poll were not published till the contest is over, Gaunt 1598, 1599——Slight importance attached to the proposal for not publishing the state of the poll, Storey 2834, 2835——Advantage if the state of the poll were not declared till sometime after the election, Ellard 7232, 7233.

Impossibility of preventing the scrutineers divulging the state of the poll, if the voting were not secret, Verdon 9683, 9684——Important advantage of the state of the poll not being known, ib. 9815——Statement showing that it is perfectly possible without the ballot to prevent the state of the poll being known, and thus to prevent afternoon bribery on the polling day, Sir C. W. Dilke 10310–10316. 10326–10333——Conclusion as to the impracticability of preventing the state of the poll being known, whilst the voting is open, there being no means of preventing afternoon bribery on the polling day, Arnold 10501–10503.

Belief that it is impossible under open voting to prevent the state of the poll becoming known, and thus to prevent excitement, Fitzgerald 10993, 10994——Avoidance of much of the evil of the present system of elections if the poll were conducted without the public knowing how it was going on, Edge 12967–12970.

Resolutions proposed by Mr. Hunt, Mr. Howes, and Sir F. Heygate, for discontinuing the publication of the state of the poll at the time of the election, Rep. xiv, xv.

Stockport. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the matter of the Stockport Election Petition, App. 575.

Stokes, Frederick. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is a magistrate of the county of Dublin, and has for many years taken an active interest in the Parliamentary and municipal elections, 4437–4440——Regulation of the municipal elections in Kingston and Rathmines by local Acts; qualification in each case, 4441–4447——Statement showing that in the Kingstown elections the Conservative voters are greatly obstructed in polling, there being, in fact, no freedom of election; steps being taken to remedy this, 4448–4457. 4508–4513. 4521–4528.

Very general exercise of priestly influence at elections in Ireland, 4457——Particulars relative to the Dublin municipal elections, the qualification of electors, and the part taken by the Roman Catholic priests; instances of bribery of Liberal electors in one of the wards, 4458–4474. 4529–4542——Much more peaceable character of the Dublin Parliamentary election of 1852 than of the election in 1847, owing to the increase in the number of polling places, 4480–4482——Prevalence of bribery on both sides at the Parliamentary elections for Dublin; this applies probably more to Roman Catholics than to Protestants, 4483–4486. 4628–4635.

Evidence as to the very general exercise of priestly influence and spiritual intimidation at the elections for Dublin, and for Dublin county, 4487–4507. 4514–4520. 4523 et seq. ——Approval of a proper system of voting papers as a check upon intimidation and bribery, 4491–4494——Advantage of a minute subdivision of polling places, 4491——Grounds for the conclusion that the ballot in Ireland would be no protection against priestly influence, and would operate very adversely towards the Conservatives, 4495–4507. 4598–4623.

Statement relative to the steps taken by the Conservative party at the election before the last for the county of Dublin in bringing a large number of country voters into the city, and keeping them away from the priests; denial that these men were under undue custody, 4504–4509. 4514–4520. 4560–4597. 4624–4627.

Storey, Samuel. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was for several years a member of the corporation of Bradford; was defeated at the municipal contests in 1867 and in 1868, on account of the part taken by him at the Parliamentary elections, 2785–2790. 2801–2803. 2813–2821——Total of about 20,000 municipal voters and 21,000 Parliamentary voters in Bradford, the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries being co-terminous, 2792–2794——Absence of political feeling at the municipal elections till November 1867; 2795. 2826——Statement as to the occurrence of treating and other corrupt practices at the municipal elections in 1867 and 1868; belief as to there having been some cases of bribery at the latter election, 2796–2824. 2836.

Frequency of personation at the municipal contests; inadequate means for its prevention, 2809, 2811, 2812. 2836–2840——Recommendation that the same law be applied to corrupt practices at municipal elections as at Parliamentary elections, 2825–2832. 2844——Inconvenience experienced at Bradford through the nomination of candidates for the town council without their consent, 2827, 2828——Exercise of much intimidation at the Parliamentary elections; this is confined to one side, 2829, 2830.

Decided objection to the ballot, as necessitating continual falsehood on the part of voters, 2833. 2857, 2858——Slight importance attached to the proposal for not publishing the state of the poll, 2834, 2835——Improvement if persons charged with personation, &c., were brought before a stipendiary magistrate instead of before the present class of magistrates in boroughs, 2836–2840.

Illustration in the case of the last nomination at Bradford for the Parliamentary election of the expediency of abolishing nominations altogether, 2841–2843——Conclusion as to the sufficient strictness of the present law for preventing bribery, &c. at Parliamentary elections, 2845–2851——Very general feeling at Bradford in favour of the ballot, a large number of Conservatives being amongst its advocates, 2852–2859.

Strathnairn, The Right Honourable Lord. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Commander of the Forces in Ireland, 11712——Explains the general character of the instructions in force relative to the employment of troops at the last general election in Ireland, 11713–11723.

11825——Refers to a written report by General M'Murdo as contradicting his evidence relative to the inordinate employment of troops at Balbriggan at the last election for the county of Dublin, 11724–11726. 11801–11808——Shows that there is no ground whatever for any impression that military officers consider voters under escort in the light of prisoners, 11727–11731. 11809, 11810. 11826–11828.

Conclusion as to many voters going under escort and voting with their landlords very much against their own convictions, 11732, 11733. 11811——Statement of the practice in regard to requisitions and orders upon which escorts are granted; the utmost impartiality is observed in the matter by Government, 11734–11741——Amendment made by witness in the instructions prepared by General M'Murdo for the guidance of the troops in Tipperary, 11742, 11743——Instruction by witness for the employment of cavalry if available; illustration at Drogheda of the prudence of this instruction, 11744, 11745.

Letter from witness to General M'Murdo objecting to the arming of the troops with sticks, 11746——Reference to a certain confidential report by witness as containing an explanation on the subject of an undue interference by landlords with some voters at the Sligo election, 11747. 11750——Further reference to this report as showing the immense influence exercised at the elections by the priests, 11748–11750——Entire inaccuracy of the impression that the troops are ever used for political purposes, 11753. 11758, 11759.

Obligation in regard to the troops or escorts being accompanied by a magistrate, or, when that is not possible, by a sub-constable, 11754–11758. 11812–11817. 11826——Impossibility of dispensing with troops at the elections, 11760, 11761. 11792——Numerous instances of violence at the last elections owing to the harangues of the priests; reference to the charge of Judge Keogh at Drogheda in illustration of this, 11764–11782——Particular instance of excessively violent language of a priest; testimony given by a policeman in this case, 11765–11770. 11776–11791——Improper and unconstitutional position assumed by the priests as regards the elections, 11782.

Unfairness of the ballot as admitting of undue influence on the part of the priests 11793. 11796——Great importance of an increased number of polling places at Irish elections, 11793–11795. 11800——Improbability of the ballot enabling the military to be dispensed with, though there might not be same amount of rioting, 11797–11800.

Further statement that the officer in command of an escort would be guilty of a great dereliction of duty if he did not allow each voter freely to have the escort, 11809–11821. 11826–11828——Large expense of the movement of troops at the elections, 11822——Inadequacy of the constabulary for preserving peace at the elections, 11823, 11824.

Taunton. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Mr. Barclay, App. 575, 576—— Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the matter of the petition against the return of Mr. Serjeant Cox, he being declared not duly elected, ib. 576.

Taylor, Francis. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has had a very extensive experience in elections at Manchester; took an active part in the arrangements for the test ballot, 12100, 12101——Object of the test ballot to decide whether Mr. Milner Gibson or Mr. Ernest Jones should be elected as the Liberal candidate in the event of a vacancy, 12102——Excitement in the public mind as to the result of the test, whereas the ballot itself was conducted with perfect order and regularity, 12103–12106. 12186–12192.

Adoption at Manchester of the plan of ballot in use in Victoria, 12107——Use of a die for stamping each voting card, as a check upon forged cards; other means available for preventing fraud in this respect, 12108. 12115. 12137, 12138. 12235–12240. 22266–12279——Transmission of a voting paper, with a circular, to each voter; description of such paper, 12109. 12141——Presentation by the voter, when about to poll, of the circular and voting paper to the returning officer, from whom he received a voting card, 12110–12112. 12136. 12141.

Deposit of the voting card by the voter in an envelope, and then in the ballot-box, after he had first marked off the name of the candidate for whom he did not vote, 12113–12115——Object of the envelope to prevent the use of two cards in voting; opinion as to the use of perforated cards being preferable to this plan, 12115. 12135. 12146. 12185.

12278——Prohibition upon any voter taking a voting card away from the polling booth, 12116——Total of 32½ per cent. of the Liberal electors who abstained from voting; larger proportion of the lower class than of the more respectable class in this number, 12117–12122. 12156, 12157.

Very satisfactory result in accounting for the cards issued by the returning officer; rare instances of irregularity, 12123——Great ease and rapidity of the polling, as compared with the ordinary system; particulars on this point, 12124–12129. 12205–12218 —— Efficiency of the checks upon personation under the system as tried at Manchester; statement hereon as to the facilities for detecting the Tasmanian dodge, 12130–12134. 12230, 12231. 12246–12250——Adequacy of the checks upon the voter, when in the polling booth, changing the voting card for a spurious one in his pocket, 12134. 12266–12272.

Grounds for the conclusion that the returning officer's expenses would be greatly diminished under the ballot, 12139, 12140. 12200–12204. 12262–12265—— Deviation at Manchester from the Victorian plan as regards the numbering of the ballot papers; statement hereon as to there being no necessity for a scrutiny, 12141–12143. 12251–12261—— Belief that the Manchester system would give universal satisfaction, 12144. 12179——Entire absence of objection to the working of the system on the part of the Conservatives, 12144.

Error of Sir Charles Dilke in supposing that the voting papers, as distinguished from the voting cards, were signed by the electors; objections to this being done as a check upon personation, 12145, 12146. 12219–12229——Absence of difficulty at Manchester through some of the voters not beng able to read or write, this difficulty having been obviated by printing the candidates' names in different colours, 12147–12155. 12180–12184. 12193–12197——Non-objection to the Australian plan of allowing a sworn returning officer to assist a voter who could not read or write, 12154, 12155. 12195–12197. 12241–12245.

Circumstance of the ballot having been in operation for several years in the town of Maryport for the election of the local board, and having given universal satisfaction. 12158–12165——Claim of the Maryport people that their plan is the original of the Australian plan, 12160——Evidence opposed to the ball ballot, on the ground that the voter could give more votes than he was entitled to, 12166–12178—— Doubt as to any confusion in respect of different colours on the voting card when there are several candidates, 12180–12184. 12193–12198.

Conclusion as to the effect of the ballot in preventing mob excitement or intimidation, 12186–12192. 12205–12211——Objection to the ballot as in the United States, due secresy not being involved, 12212, 12213——Inference as to the exercise of undue influence at Manchester elections in the absence of the ballot, 12232–12234—— Precaution necessary in giving a second card to a voter on the plea that he had damaged or spoiled the original card; there was no case of this kind at Manchester, 12280–12282.

Thirsk. Permission given for the withdrawal of the petition against the return of Sir William Gallwey, App. 576.

Thomas, Herbert. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has taken an active part in political matters at Bristol on the Liberal side, 5658, 5659. 5690–5692——Strictly pure and legal principles upon which the Liberal party have conducted the elections, 5660, 5661—— Refusal of the Conservative party to unite with their opponents in conducting the election in April 1868 on pure principles, 5661–5665——Entirely pure conduct of the April 1868 election by the Liberals, 5666, 5667. 5672. 5682——Statement as to the inaccuracy of Major Bush's evidence relative to the employment of hired and organised mobs by the Liberals at the November 1868 election, 5668–5671. 5673–5678.

Inaccuracy, also, of Major Bush's statement that at the election in November Conservative voters were intimidated and prevented from polling by the Liberal mob, 5673. 5723–5738. 5752—— Circumstance of the sheriff (a Conservative) having decided that there was nothing to prevent the polling, 5673. 5747——Explanation as to some Liberal tea meetings that the expense was paid by the working men, 5673. 5708, 5709—— Large number of roughs hired by the Conservatives at the last two elections; great abuse in this respect at the April 1868 election, 5679, 5680. 5687–5689. 5693, 5694——Very extensive treating and bribery on the Conservative side at the election in April 1868; 5681–5688. 5748. 5749. 5753.

Examination upon the question whether an enormous expense was not incurred in respect of Sir Morton Peto's election, 5695–5705——Refusal of Sir Morton Peto's committee mittees to pay certain bills for breakfasts, 5705–5707——Further denial that at the November 1868 election any mob was paid by the Liberal committees; examination hereon as to certain demands made for payment, and as to such payment having been made through agents from London, 5710–5722. 5742–5746.

Excessive timidity, owing to which a Conservative voter, named Kearsey, did not poll, 5730–5737——Belief that the total expenses of the Liberal candidates at the last election were about 4,000 l. or 5,000 l.; 5739–5746——Illustration of the more riotous character of the Conservative mob than of the Liberal mob at the November 1868 election, 5750, 5751.

Strong feeling at the Bristol town council in favour of abolishing public nominations, 5754–5758——Approval of the ballot as a means of securing peaceable elections and freedom of voting, 5759 —— Numerous instances of workmen voting according to the opinions of their employers, 5760——Belief as to tradesmen being frequently influenced as to their votes by their customers, 5760. 5762–5767——Very general disapproval of the ballot by the Conservatives, 5761——Suggestion that the nomination for Parliamentary elections should be something similar to that for municipal elections, 5769——Advantage if public-houses were closed on the day of election and the day before, ib.

Three-cornered Constituencies. Facility of applying the ballot to three-cornered constituencies in England, Torrens 8958.

Tipperary County. Employment of escorts at the election in Tipperary adverted to; much less excitement than in Sligo, Percy 11272. 11327, 11328. 11438–11440——Amendment made by witness in the instructions prepared by General M'Murdo for the guidance of the troops in Tipperary, Lord Strathnairn, 11742, 11743.

Torrens, Lieutenant Colonel Robert Richard (Member of the House). (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Was a nominee member of the Legislative Assembly in South Australia previously to the introduction of the new constitution in January 1856; held the office of treasurer in the Government, 8725——Was strongly opposed to the introduction of the ballot in the colony, and as member of the Government did all in his power to prevent its adoption, 8726. 8845–8853——The ballot was adopted in 1856, having been called for by public opinion as a remedy for the bribery, treating, intimidation and rioting, which prevailed under the system of open voting, 8726–8735. 8767–8769. 8845–8855.

Exceedingly beneficial effect of the ballot in the prevention of rioting at the elections in the colony; illustration of this at Adelaide, 8736. 8855. 8907. 8915, 8916—— Conclusion as to bribery, which was formerly very prevalent, having almost entirely disappeared under the ballot; exceptional instance to the contrary, 8736, 8737. 8967, 8968. 8984. 9013——Great diminution of candidates' expenses since the ballot has been in force; instance of this in witness's election for Adelaide, 8738, 8739. 8756, 8757. 8801–8803. 8969, 8970.

Explanation of the mode in which the electoral roll is made up in South Australia, the practice being very similar to that in this country, 8740, 8741——Satisfactory arrangements with reference to the nomination of candidates, no public speeches being allowed, and there being no rioting or disturbance, 8742, 8743. 8780–8783. 8870. 8903–8905. 8939–8942——Prohibition upon public addresses by candidates for two days before the election, so as to prevent disturbance, 8742. 8780–8782. 8906——Nomination of the candidates on the day of election, 8743.

Presence of scrutineers in the polling booth, on behalf of each candidate, so as to check personation; efficiency of this precaution, 8743. 8790–8794. 8797–8800. 8946–8948——Delivery of a voting card to each voter, who retires into a sort of sentry-box, and puts a mark opposite the name of the candidate whom he supports, 8743, 8744—— The card is then folded by the voter and dropped into the ballot-box, which is locked, 8744——Collection of the ballot-boxes after the election, where the voting cards are examined and the votes counted by the returning officer and scrutineers, after which there is a public declaration of the result, 8744-8747. 8787-8789——Delay of a day or two before the declaration of the poll, 8744. 8959-8961——Belief that a man who cannot read is prevented from voting; very few such men in South Australia, 8748–8750. 8880, 8881. 8917–8921.

Perfect ease, smoothness, and facility with which the ballot has worked in South Australia, whilst under it there is no bribery or undue influence, 8751–8753——Ingenious device adopted in Tasmania for a substitution of the voting cards, involving the bribery of successive voters; facility of decection of this trick, 8751, 8752——Statement that it is generally known how the electors vote, though there are exceptions to this rule; secrecy in fact is not now necessary as a prevention against bribery or coercion as the notion of practising these evils has quite passed out of mind, 8754, 8755. 8778, 8779. 8833–8844. 8982–8985.

Effect

Effect of the system of open voting at Cambridge in deterring many Liberal voters from polling; removal of this fear if the ballot were adopted, 8758. 8886-8890—— Belief that in the smaller boroughs in England secresy would be easily maintained under the ballot, 8759 —— Statement as to the unfair position in which members are placed who are petitioned against under the Corrupt Practices Act; checks suggested in order that petitions may not be lightly presented, 8760-8766.

Exceptional instance of a petition in South Australia in witness's experience of the ballot there; doubt as to the means of proving the voting in such cases, the voting cards being destroyed immediately after the election, 8770, 8771. 8795, 8796. 9005. 9007-9015—— Practice as to the public meetings before the elections in South Australia, there being also some personal canvassing, but not nearly to the same extent as in this country, 8774-8777. 8830-8832. 8856-8858. 8898-8902. 8922-8925——Public declaration of the state of the poll, without the members being present, and without any speeches being made, 8784-8786. 8906. 8943-8945. 8963.

Abolition of the former distinction between Liberals and Conservatives since the adoption of the new constitution and of manhood suffrage and triennial parliaments; there is in fact no longer a Conservative party but the ballot has had nothing to do with this, 8804-8808. 8986-8992. 8935——Constant change of political opinion and of the Ministry since universal suffrage, 8804-8810. 8814——Leading questions by which the two parties in the State are now distinguished; little popular excitement upon these subjects, 8804-8810. 8988. 8935-8938——Very similar class of representatives elected under the ballot and universal suffrage as under the previous system, 8810-8813—— General emulation among the candidates or members to obtain office, 8810.

Large proportion of the electors who do not take the trouble of going to the poll; there has been little if any difference in this respect since the ballot, 8815-8823—— Claims and solicitations by constituents in respect of patronage; means of the Member for knowing that he had received the support of such claimants, 8824-8830—— Universality of the feeling in the Colony in favour of the ballot as at present conducted, it having been found to work admirably, 8845, 8846. 8949-8952. 8979-8981.

Way in which the ballot operates in Australia as a Conservative measure; that is, in obviating coercion by mobs or trades unions, 8847, 8848. 8935, 8936. 8974-8978—— Opposition made to the ballot by witness as the leader of the Conservative party in the Colony, whereas the feeling is now general in favour of the measure, 8853. 8979-8981 ——Absence not only of election riots, but of any attempt at forcible interference with the ballot-boxes before the declaration of the poll, 8859-8861. 8865-8869——Belief as to the voting in some districts being sometimes known before the general result is declared, 8862-8864 —— Great disturbances formerly through the publication of the state of the poll, 8871, 8872.

Further explanation relative to the elective franchise in the Colony, and the system of registration, 8875-8877——Denial that the ballot has had the effect of inducing candidates to promise any greater expenditure of the public money, in order to gain votes, 8882-8885——Universal feeling of the Liberal party at Cambridge, that the ballot would stop bribery there, 8891-8893——Doubt as to any more frequent change of Members by the constituencies in South Australia than in England, 8894, 8895——Circumstance of witness having supported dual voting in Australia as a Conservative measure; excitement at the elections on this question, but without rioting or coercion, 8907-8911. 8989-8992.

Separate Acts for the ballot and the suffrage, 8926——Absence of any imputations of bribery conditional upon the return of the candidate, 8927-8929——Small proportion of lost votes; how these occur, 8930-8932. 9001-9004——Decided approval of the ballot in this country, judging from its working in Australia, 8933, 8934. 9006——Use of the ballot at municipal elections in the Colony as well as at the Parliamentary elections, 8953-8955——Facility of applying the ballot to three-cornered constituencies in England, 8958——Division of Adelaide into three districts, each returning one Member, 8962. 8997, 8998——Decided objection to a publication of lists of the voters, 8963-8966.

Little inducement for bribery under the ballot, there being no security how the vote would be given, 8967, 8968——Varying class of men in the Colonial Legislature, the wealthier class alone not taking an active interest in politics, 8971-8973——Similarity between some of the electoral districts in the Colony and constituencies in England, several of the former constituencies being very small, 8995, 8996——Destruction of the voting papers immediately after the declaration of the poll; question hereon whether proof of bribery is not thereby rendered very difficult, 9005. 9007-9015.

Trades' Unions. Grounds for apprehending that the ballot would operate injuriously as regards the action of trades' unions, Stanley 2332-2348.

Conclusion as to the advantage of the ballot as neutralising coercion by trades' unions, Torrens 8935, 8936. 8974-8978.

TREATING:

Doubt as to treating being much resorted to if there were secret voting, Barber 108, 109——Expediency of increased facilities for the prevention of treating, Darvill 529 —— Obstacle to an enforcement of the law against treating, as the punishment is considered too severe, West 2881, 2882——Advantage if the wholesale distribution of drink, as at Limerick, could invalidate an election, Spaight 7094, 7095.

Great amount of treating and public-house expenditure in several cases tried by witness, Sir S. Martin 10518–10522. 10617——Witness had not, practically, any difficulty in deciding what was corrupt treating; particulars hereon as to the question of treating in the West Riding, ib. 10571–10586.

Information on the subject of treating, or rather of eating and drinking, under various forms, there being several forms of treating which do not by law vitiate the election, Sir J. S. Willes 10734–10739——Amendments suggested in the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, as to treating, with a view to making the law more stringent and comprehensive, ib. 10752–10759——Recommendation that no refreshments or treating be allowed in the case of committees or canvassers, ib. 10853. 10856, 10857.

Prevalence of drinking at most of the places inquired into by witness, though, save at Bewdley and Hereford, treating was not made out to his satisfaction, Sir C. Blackburn 11958, 11959——Belief as to the judges concurring in the view that unless treating is practised with intention to influence, the election is not voided thereby, ib. 12001–12005 ——Approval of the necessity of proof of corrupt intention in the matter of treating, ib. 12022, 12023——Harshness in making the loss of the seat a necessary result of any act of treating by the candidate, without leaving the question to the judge whether corrupt intention was involved, ib. 12040–12043. 12070–12072.

Conclusions in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee, as to the prevalence of corrupt treating at borough elections, but not at county elections, Rep. xvi, xvii.—— Important check upon gross or extravagant treating by a more stringent enactment enforcing the publication of the real expenses of each candidate, ib. xix.

Tripper, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is secretary to the Liberal committee of St. Anne's Ward at Liverpool, 1600–1603——Total of 1640 Parliamentary voters, and of 553 municipal voters in the ward, these consisting chiefly of the working classes, 1604, 1605——Particulars relative to the bribery practised at the municipal elections for the ward, the Liberal party having since 1865 abstained from all illegal expenditure, though the practice is still maintained by the Conservatives, 1606–1639. 1673–1679. 1686–1690. 1740–1752. 1787. 1851–1856. 1868–1891.

Conclusion as to the money paid for municipal votes having in several instances secured the Parliamentary vote also, 1640–1646——Very limited extent to which any effort has been made to put a stop to bribery at the municipal elections; fear of expense which prevents legal proceedings being taken, 1647–1655. 1680–1689. 1733–1739. 1788–1803. 1896. 1819–1821——Belief that no penal enactment will prevent corrupt practices at municipal and Parliamentary elections so long as there is open voting, the ballot being the only effectual remedy, 1661–1659. 1691, 1692. 1714–1723. 1781. 1833–1835.

Prevalence of much treating at the municipal elections at Liverpool; tendency of the ballot to correct this practice, 1660, 1661——Conclusion as to the intimidation and undue influence being largely resorted to both at the municipal and Parliamentary elections, 1662–1671. 1700, 1701. 1822–1824——Evidence in favour of a prohibition upon canvassing at municipal elections; that is, systematic canvassing, 1662, 1663. 1724–1732. 1804–1814——Decision of the municipal contests with direct reference to the political views of the candidates, 1693–1697.

Doubt as to there having been any bribery at the last Parliamentary election, though drink was given freely, 1698, 1699. 1816. 1825–1832 —— Growing feeling in the town in favour of the ballot; grounds for this statement, 1702, 1703. 1841–1850. 1857 ——Better class of persons on the municipal register than on the Parliamentary register since the extension of the latter, 1704–1706——Belief that there was no arrangement about the payment of voters' rates in connection with the Parliamentary election, 1707–1713.

Examination upon the question of the ballot being no real check under certain circumstances, 1715–1723. 1836–1840. 1858–1861——Combination of some municipal voters in order to make their votes more valuable; practice as to the payment of these, 1740–1743. 1868–1878. 1884–1891——Evidence in support of the view that nominations at Parliamentary elections should, as well as systematic canvassing, be done away with, 1753–1780. 1895. 1908–1921——Recommended abolition also of the declaration of the poll, 1755——Much more pure state of some of the wards at Liverpool than of St. Anne's ward, 1788, 1789. 1862–1867. 1922–1924.

Open

Open way in which bribery has been practised at the municipal elections, there being a general belief that there is no punishment for it, 1815–1818——Complete failure of all the Acts for the punishment of bribery and corruption, 1834——Statement as to Mr. Massey, though a supporter of the ballot, having been defeated at the last Parliamentary election for Liverpool, 1844–1850. 1857–1859. 1892–1894. 1925–1927.

Tendency of the ballot to diminish systematic canvassing, 1897——Advantage in election meetings not being held at public-houses in Liverpool; approval of this plan being compulsory, 1903, 1904. 1928–1930——Great benefit if the public-houses were closed from the evening before the election day till the evening of that day, 1906, 1907.

Troughton, Thomas. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Resides at Gravesend; was chairman of the committee of the Conservative candidate at the Parliamentary election, 4035, 4036. 4094—— Quiet manner in which the municipal elections of the borough have been conducted, 4037–4042—— Particulars relative to the Parliamentary election and the bribery and intimidation practised on the Liberal side, but for which the Conservative candidate would have been returned, 4043, et seq.——Circumstance of a petition not having been presented; difficulty in proving the bribery, 4055, 4056. 4072–4074.

Violence displayed by an organised mob from Northfleet, 4057–4064. 4082–4093. 4115–4121——Statement of the number of the constituency and the number polled on each side; majority of 100 calculated upon by the Conservatives, whereas this was turned into a minority by the practices of the Liberals, 4065–4071. 4094–4111——Considerable disorder on the nomination day; improvement if the nomination were abolished altogether, 4075–4081. 4113.

[Second Examination.] Further information relative to the constituency of Gravesend, and the number who polled on each side, 4122–4129——Statement in further support of the conclusion that but for intimidation and bribery on the part of the Liberals there would have been a Conservative majority, as shown by the previous canvass of the electors, 4130–4155——Non-promotion of a petition further adverted to and explained, 4156, 4157.

UNDUE INFLUENCE (INTIMIDATION, &c.):

Evidence to the effect that witness and the employers generally in the manufacturing towns do not exercise any undue influence in regard to the votes of their workpeople, Bleckly 1147–1151. 1226. 1237–1239——Numerous instances at Bristol of working men voting according to the opinions of their employers, Thomas 5760——Belief as to tradesmen being frequently influenced as to their votes by their customers, ib. 5760. 5762–5767——General apprehension and intimidation caused by a few cases of eviction of tenants, McGowan 6184, 6185——Decrease generally of intimidation by employers, Edge 12781–12783

Very few cases of undue influence charged before witness, all of them having failed, Sir S. Martin 10539–10541. 10602–10604—— State of the law on the subject of undue influence or intimidation; doubt whether spiritual intimidation comes within the definition of the Act, ib. 10605–10611——Several instances of alleged undue influence investigated by witness at other places besides Blackburn and Westbury, but without the seat being voided, Sir J. S. Willes 10741–10743.

Exceptional instance of intimidation having been proved before witness, though it was alleged in each petition, Sir C. Blackburn 11960–11962——Further statement as to the alleged cases which were brought before witness of intimidation by landlords or employers having in almost every instance broken down, ib. 12013. 12019. 12024, 12025——Evidence to the effect that intimidation by a landlord or employer would not vitiate the election unless agency can be proved, ib. 12014–12021. 12025–12027.

Conclusions in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee as to the frequent exercise of intimidation or undue influence at borough elections, Rep. xvii——Conclusions also as to the improper influence exercised by landlords or their agents at county elections, ib. xvii, xviii——Different circumstances of England, Ireland, and Scotland, in the matter of landlord intimidation, ib.

UNITED STATES (BALLOT):

1. Particulars relative to the System of Election and of Ballot in force in different States in the Union.
2. Unsatisfactory Results of the System.

1. Particulars relative to the System of Election and of Ballot in force in different States in the Union:

Regulation by each State of the Union of its own mode of elections, Hankel 9960——Preliminary proceedings at elections in South Carolina; there is no nomination, ib. 9961–9972——Appointment by the Government of the States of managers, who conduct the elections, and act as returning officers, ib. 9965–9967——Necessity of a poll even if there are not more candidates than vacancies, ib. 9973–9979——Steps taken to bring the candidates before the public, and to canvass for them, ib. 9980–9987.

Particulars relative to the form of ballot in use in South Carolina; option of the voter to use any kind of voting paper he pleases, Hankel 9988–9994. 1002——Option of the voter as to folding up the voting paper before placing it in the ballot-box, there being no rule as to the voting being kept secret, ib. 9993, 9994——Information relative to the qualification for the franchise, ib. 9997. 10030–10040. 10084–10088——Circumstance of there having been no registration of voters in South Carolina or in the other States; explanation hereon as to an attempt to register by means of a capitation tax, ib. 9998. 10041–10044. 10050, 10051. 10069–10071. 10080——Practice in South Carolina as to the custody of the ballot-boxes, and the counting of the votes after the ballot, ib. 10002.

Examination upon the question whether the ballot as in South Caroline and other States is not very badly devised and carried out, and therefore is no sound argument against the adoption of an efficient ballot system, Hankel 10041 et seq.——System in some of the States of voting for a number of candidates for different offices at the same election, ib. 10120–10129——Absence of any effort by law to enforce secrecy, though it is very frequently practised by the electors, ib. 10130, 10131.

Details relative to the system of ballot in the States of New York and Massachusetts, and other American States; the system is generally identical with the French system, secrecy not being necessary, but is conducted with less care, and is attended with much abuse, Sir C. W. Dilke 10164–10167. 10174–10180. 10189 et seq.——Belief that the Australian system is not known in America, ib. 10178——System in America of sometimes voting for several offices on the same ticket, ib. 10180. 10194–10196.

Incidence of the expense upon the local authorities, the amount being very limited, Sir C. W. Dilke 10182, 10183——Absence of treating at the candidate's expense, ib. 10236, 10237——Belief as to a system of registration having been adopted in the States since the war, ib. 10248, 10249——Impression that in America there is no scrutiny, though members have been unseated, ib. 10291, 10292.

2. Unsatisfactory Results of the System;

Reference to the American system of ballot as being no better than open voting, Ellard 7182——Failure of the ballot to secure secrecy or purity of election in America, Norwood 8145——Want of public confidence in the ballot in America, ib. 8145, 8146.

Very little check upon personation or disqualification, Hankel 9995–10001. 10041–10044. 10089–10091——Statement that under the ballot intimidation, mob violence, bribery, and personation, have been practised to an excessive degree, the elections in this country being conducted in an infinitely preferable manner, ib. 10003 et seq.——System of voting "early and often" at the elections in the States, ib. 10019. 10044. 10133–10135.

Great obstruction to the voting of respectable persons at elections in New York, Hankel 10063–10065. 10092–10101——Anxious inquiry in America for many years with a view to prevent the corruption at the elections, ib. 10072–10074——Very general feeling in South Carolina in disapproval of the present system of voting, ib. 10102–10113. 10119.

Very extensive frauds and bribery in Boston and New York; how carried out, Sir C. W. Dilke 10166, 10167. 10174, 10175. 10205–10207. 10218–10224——Objection to the ballot as in the United States; due secrecy not being involved, Taylor 12212, 12213.

V.

Verdon, George Frederick, C.B. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has been a Member of the Government of Victoria on several occasions, and also a Member of the Legislature, 9536–9539——Statement of the franchises for the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly, respectively, there being thirty Members in the Council and seventy-eight in the Assembly, 9540–9543——Election of the Members of each House for stated periods, the ballot being adopted in each case, 9544–9547——Reference to the Electoral Act

Act of 1865, as containing full details relative to the process of conducting the elections, 9548.

Abolition under the ballot of public nominations; system of written nomination now in force, 9549–9559——Adoption of the ballot in the Colony about thirteen years ago, 9550——Payment by Government of the ordinary or legal expenses of the elections, 9551——Arrangement of the polling booths in compartments, the voting paper being taken by the voter into one of these where he strikes out with a pencil the names of the candidates for whom he does not vote, 9559. 9561–9563. 9565.

Presence in the polling-room of the returning officer, or his deputy, the poll clerks, and the scrutineers or agents of the candidates, 9559, 9560——Check upon the claim made by each voter to poll, a voting paper being handed to him by the returning officer if the qualification appears correct, 9561——Practice as to the returning officer placing his initials on the paper, and numbering it in accordance with the number in the electoral roll; means of identification thus afforded in the event of subsequent appeal or petition, 9561. 9568-9574.

Deposit of the voting paper in the ballot-box by the voter, he having first folded it up for the purpose, 9561. 9564. 9566, 9567——Practice of opening the papers and counting the votes, without the number on the back of the voting paper being seen; presence of the returning officer, poll clerks, and scrutineers, during this process, 9568–9570. 9577–9580——Duration of the poll from nine till four o'clock, 9575——Conclusion as to the impracticability of a voter bringing with him and using a voting paper previously signed and filled up, with the initials of the returning officer forged upon the back, and taking away the paper received from the returning officer, in order that it may be used by another voter; systematic fraud in this respect practised at an election in Tasmania, 9576. 9650–9673. 9733-9741. 9784–9786.

Public declaration of the poll when the ballot-boxes have all been received by the returning and the scrutiny has been completed; the declaration is usually on the day after the polling, 9580–9585——Instances of objection and of petition against the return of candidates on the ground that voters were not qualified, or that bribery, in the shape of treating, had been practised, 9586–9591. 9604. 9609-9612——Objections sometimes made during the polling by the scrutineers; action taken in such cases by the returning officer, 9587, 9588——Practice of referring petitions to an election committee by whom inquiries are made and scrutinies conducted; particulars hereon, 9589–9593. 9599–9609.

Belief that the polling papers are destroyed when the time has elapsed for the presentation of a petition, 9592, 9593.——Great variation in the size and population of the electoral districts, 9594–9596. 9680. 9716——Much less numerous electors for the Legislative Council than for the Assembly, the electoral districts being much larger in the former case, 9596, 9597——Different practice in the issue of writs for the Council and for the Assembly, 9598.

Conclusion as to the very beneficial effect of the ballot in Victoria, in conducing to peace and order, and in diminishing or abolishing bribery and treating; very little abuse, however, in these respects previously to the system of secret voting, 9613–9625. 9691–9701. 9819–9821—— Great interest and excitement at the elections, the people voting in large numbers, and the seats being as a rule contested, 9625–9634. 9685. 9803, 9804——Advantage of the plan of numbering the voting papers as rendering a subsequent scrutiny feasible, this being provided for without practically effecting the secrecy of the system, 9635. 9644.

Practice of many voters to state openly how they have voted; every voter, however, has it in his own power to preserve secrecy, 9636. 9637. 9640–9644——Belief that the ballot would be just as effectual in England as in Victoria, and that it would secure secrecy in small constituencies, 9638-9644. 9800, 9801——Very little canvassing under the ballot, 9640, 9641. 9729–9732. 9815, 9817——Means by which after the voting paper is signed a further check might be applied so that the number on the back should not lead to publicity, 9644. 9766, 9767.

Information relative to the appointment of the returning officers; belief as to the sufficiency of the present check upon their ascertaining how the votes are given, 9645–9649. 9675–9682. 9797——Objection to the voter handing the paper to the returning officer for deposit in the ballot box, 9669–9672. 9742——Impossibility of preventing the scrutineers from divulging the state of the poll, if the voting were not secret, 9683, 9684——Opposing parties in the Colony, the mode of action in respect of public works and Government lands being one of the main questions before the public, 9686-9690. 9704–9707.

Very general feeling in the Colony in favour of the ballot, though at one time the Conservative party were opposed to it, 9702, 9703. 9708. 9805–9809——Payment by the candidates of the cost of conveyance to the poll; practice as to polling places adverted to hereon, 9709–9717. 9780–9783——Obligation upon the candidate to make a return of his expenses; belief as to these being confined to legitimate objects, 9718-9732——Conclusion as to the efficiency of the checks upon personation, 9733, 9734. 9773-9779. 9802. 9846-9851——Explanation relative to the municipal franchise and Parliamentary franchise respectively, payment of rates and residence being necessary in each case, 9744-6761.

Special provision for enabling those on the ratepayers' roll to vote who cannot read or write; disqualification on this ground of those on the electors' right roll, 9762-9765——Very few votes lost through informality, 9768, 9769——Decreasing proportion of the people who cannot read or write, 9770-9772——Further explanation upon the subject of scrutinies, and the circumstances under which conducted, 9787-9799.

Explanation as to the Roman Catholics having opposed the ballot, 9808. 9833-9838——Greater need of the ballot in this country than in a new country like Victoria, 9810, 9811——Dissent from the view that the ballot has the necessary effect of reducing political feeling, 9812——Possibility of the ballot being sometimes open to objection in cases where there are two or more candidates to be returned out of several, 9814——Important advantage of the state of the poll not being known, 9815.

Very similar character of the constituencies in Victoria before and since the ballot, 9822-9825——Conduct of the municipal elections by ballot, 9826, 9827. 9842-9845——Publicity for the most part of the political opinions of the principal inhabitants in each district, 9828-9832——Large public expenditure sometimes incurred in connection with the elections, 9839-9841——Means of absent electors for ascertaining whether they have been personated, 9846-9850.

1. Detailed Arrangements for Working the Ballot:

Approval of the arrangements for working the ballot in Victoria; superiority of the system to the American system, Ellard 7182. 7238.

Reference to the Electoral Act of 1865 as containing full details relative to the process of conducting the election, Verdon 9548——Arrangement of the polling booths in compartments, the voting paper being taken by the voter into one of these, where he strikes out with a pencil the names of the candidates for whom he does not vote, ib. 9559. 9561-9563. 9565——Presence in the polling room of the returning officer, or his deputy, the poll clerks, and the scrutineers, or agents of the candidates, ib. 9559, 9560.

Check upon the claim of each voter to poll, a voting paper being handed to him by the returning officer if the qualification appears correct, Verdon 9561——Practice as to the returning officer placing his initials on the paper, and numbering it in accordance with the number in the electoral roll; means of identification thus afforded in the event of subsequent appeal or petition, ib. 9561. 9568-9574——Deposit of the voting paper in the ballot-box by the voter, he having first folded it up for the purpose, ib. 9561. 9564. 9566, 9567——Practice of opening the papers and counting the votes, without the number on the back of the voting paper being seen; presence of the returning officers, poll clerks, and scrutineers during this process, ib. 9568-9570. 9577-9580——Duration of the poll from 9 till 4 o'clock, ib. 9575.

Objections sometimes made during the polling by the scrutineers; action taken in such cases by the returning officer, Verdon 9587, 9588——Belief that the polling papers are destroyed when the time has elapsed for the presentation of a petition, ib. 9592, 9593——Advantage of the plan of numbering the voting papers as rendering a subsequent scrutiny feasible, this being provided for without practically effecting the secrecy of the system, ib. 9635. 9644——Means by which, after the voting paper is signed, a further check might be applied, so that the number on the book should not lead to publicity, ib. 9644. 9766, 9767——Very few votes lost through informality, ib. 9768, 9769——Further explanation upon the subject of scrutinies, and the circumstances under which conducted, ib. 9787-9799.

Explanation of the process of voting by ballot, showing that secrecy is effectually secured, and that the presence of scrutineers tends to prevent any abuse on the part of the returning officer, Muir 9857-9862——Obstacles to the votes being tampered with by by the returning officer, or his deputy, after the poll is closed, Muir 9873-9879——Powers of the returning officer as to making a false statement of the voting, when the papers are opened, ib. 9899-9901——Instances of scrutiny, the expense never falling on the Government, ib. 9910-9914——Transmission of the voting papers to Government after the poll is declared; they are subsequently destroyed, ib. 9924-9933.

Particulars relative to the certificates supplied to voters and required to be produced at the poll; abuse in connection with these, Fitzgerald 10926-10947. 11019-11025.

2. Effect as regards Corrupt Practices and Rioting; General Satisfaction given:

Conclusion as to the very beneficial effect of the ballot in Victoria in conducing to peace and order, and in diminishing or abolishing bribery and treating; very little abuse, however, in these respects previously to the system of secret voting, Verdon, 9613-9625. 9691-9701. 9819-9821——Very little bribery at any time in Victoria, ib. 9691, 9692——Very general feeling in the colony in favour of the ballot, though at one time the Conservative party were opposed to it, ib. 9702, 9703. 9708. 9805-9809——Conclusion as to the efficiency of the checks upon personation, ib. 9733, 9734. 9773-9779. 9802. 9846-9851——Means of absent electors for ascertaining whether they have been personated, ib. 9846-9850.

Conclusion as to the great success of the ballot in the colony, it having prevented the treating, bribery, and intimidation which formerly prevailed, Muir 9856. 9903-9909. 9921-9923——Occasional attempts at personation; provisions for detecting and punishing this fraud, ib. 9863-9866. 9893-9895——Means of absent voters for ascertaining whether they have been personated, ib. 9893-9895——General feeling in the colony in approval of the ballot, ib. 9941——Very peaceful conduct of the elections, ib. 9943-9945.

Almost total absence of venality in the election, before the ballot was introduced, Fitzgerald 10865. 10868. 10948, 10949. 11026——Considerable amount of mob intimidation when the voting was open; removal of this since the ballot, ib. 10866. 10884-10886. 10896-10898. 10952-10958——Very exceptional instances of corrupt payments under the ballot, ib. 10867. 10950, 10951. 11027——Peculiar circumstances of the colony which render bribery much less probable than in this country, ib. 10868-10873. 10948. 10951.

General feeling in the colony in approval of the ballot, more especially as preventing intimidation and disorder, Fitzgerald 10896-10898. 10952-10958——Entire absence of any undue influence in the colony, ib. 10963-10966——Important differences between the conditions and circumstances of Victoria and of England, so that it does not follow that the effect of the ballot would be identical in each country, ib. 10974-10983.

3. Diminution of Canvassing since the Ballot:

Very little canvassing under the ballot, Verdon 9640, 9641. 9729-9732. 9816, 9817——There is no personal canvassing by the candidates, ib. 9640, 9641——Much less canvassing than in England, Fitzgerald 10894, 10895.

4. Expenses of Elections:

Payment by Government of the ordinary or legal expenses of the election, Verdon 9551——Payment by the candidates of the cost of conveyance to the poll; practice as to polling places adverted to hereon, ib. 9709-9717. 9780-9783——Obligation upon the candidate to make a return of his expenses; belief as to these being confined to legitimate objects, ib. 9718-9732——Large public expenditure sometimes incurred in connection with the elections, ib. 9839-9841.

Limited amount of necessary expenditure under the ballot on the part of the candidates or of Government, Muir 9880-9883. 9937-9940——The returning officers and poll clerks are paid by Government, ib. 9883. 9898.

Incidence of the legal expenses of Australian elections upon the rates, Sir C. W. Dilke 10303——Objection to the permission to pay for conveyance of voters to the poll, ib.——Statement relative to candidates' expenses in Victoria, these chiefly being for printing and advertising, Fitzgerald 10995-11003.

5. Limited Extent to which Secrecy is preserved by the Voters:

Practice of many voters to state openly how they voted; every voter, however, has it in his own power to preserve secrecy, Verdon 9636, 9637. 9640-9644——Publicity for the most part of the political opinions of the principal inhabitants in each district, ib. 9828-9832——Knowledge generally of the scrutineers, as to the voters' opinions, Muir 9867——Very little secrecy preserved by the voters though the ballot enables them to be secret, Fitzgerald 10890-10893. 11004-11007. 11028-11030. 11055.

6. System of Written Nominations:

Abolition under the ballot of public nominations; system of written nomination now in force, Verdon 9549-9559——Necessary deposit of a sum of money with the nomination paper, as a means of preventing frivolous nominations, Verdon 9550. 9559——Provision that the nomination paper must be signed by not less than ten electors, ib. 9550——Checks and penalties upon fictitious signatures to the nomination papers, ib. 9554–9558——Excellent effect of the abolition of public nomination in the colony, Fitzgerald 11043–11045.

7. Declaration of the Poll:

Public declaration of the poll when the ballot-boxes have all been received by the returning officer, and the scrutiny has been completed; the declaration is usually on the day after the polling, Verdon 9580–9585——Practice as to the declaration of the poll; absence of tumult on such occasions, Muir 9946–9954.

8. Petitions:

Instances of objection and of petition against the return of candidates on the ground that voters were not qualified, or that bribery in the shape of treating had been practised, Verdon 9586–9591. 9604. 9609–9612——Practice of referring petitions to an election committee, by whom inquiries are made and scrutinies conducted; particulars hereon, ib. 9589–9593. 9599–9609.

9. Municipal Elections:

Explanation relative to the municipal franchise and Parliamentary franchise respectively, payment of rates and residence being necessary in each case, Verdon 9744–9761——Conduct of the municipal elections by ballot, ib. 9826, 9827. 9842–9845.

10. Other Details generally:

Statement of the franchise for the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly respectively, there being thirty members in the Council and seventy-eight in the Assembly, Verdon 9540–9543——Election of the Members of each House for stated periods, the ballot being adopted in each case, ib. 9544–9547——Adoption of the ballot in the colony about thirteen years ago, ib. 9550——Great variation in the size and population of the electoral districts, ib. 9594–9596. 9680. 9716——Much less numerous electors for the Legislative Council than for the Assembly, the electoral districts being much larger in the former case, ib. 9596, 9597——Different practice for the issue of writs for the Council and for the Assembly, ib. 9598.

Great interest and excitement at the elections, the people voting in large numbers, and the seats being, as a rule, contested, Verdon 9625–9634. 9685. 9803, 9804——Information relative to the appointment of the returning officers; belief as to the sufficiency of the present check upon their ascertaining how the votes were given, ib. 9645–9649. 9675–9682. 9797——Opposing parties in the colony, the mode of action in respect of public works and Government lands being one of the main questions before the public, ib. 9686–9690. 9704–9707——Special provision for enabling those on the ratepayers' roll to vote who cannot read or write; disqualification on this ground of those on the electors' right roll, ib. 9762–9765——Decreasing portion of the people who cannot read or write, ib. 9770–9772.

Explanation as to the Roman Catholics having opposed the ballot, Verdon 9808. 9833–9838——Very similar character of the constituencies in Victoria before and since the ballot, ib. 9822–9825——Proper influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy in connection with the elections, ib. 9834. 9837——Properly qualified persons chosen as deputy returning officers, Muir 9862–9872.

Impression in the colony as to the exercise of undue influence by the Roman Catholic priesthood, Fitzgerald 10889, 10890. 11017——Explanation relative to the qualification for the franchise, ib. 10926. 10972, 10973. 11008–11013——Disapproval of the ballot only by the Roman Catholics, ib. 10969. 11014–11018——Large number of polling places in Victoria; varying size of the constituencies adverted to hereon, ib. 10984–10992.

Disqualification for the franchise if persons are in receipt of charitable relief, Fitzgerald 11013. 11055——Great deterioration in the constitution of the Legislative Assembly, though witness does not attribute this to the ballot, ib. 11037–11042——System of of public meetings and of committees by which the opinions of the candidates are made known, ib. 11046–11054.

Void Elections. Several grounds on which an election may be avoided; instance at Beverley of a void election in accordance with the principles of the common law, Sir S. Martin 10524. 10548, 10549. 10640——Conclusion that, instead of treating certain practices as a misdemeanour, the loss of the seat would be a much more deterring penalty, Sir C. Blackburn 11963. 11970——Objection to the judge being bound by a hard-and-fast line as to the particular acts which should void a seat, ib. 11977——Approval of a prohibition upon a Member sitting for any other place during that session, if unseated for intimidation or treating done by his personal instigation or consent, ib. 12033–12036.

VOTING PAPERS:

1. Municipal Elections.
2. Parliamentary Elections.

1. Municipal Elections:

Explanation of the present mode of preparing the voting papers for municipal elections, as at Nottingham, and of handing them in at the poll; abuse to which liable, Barber 38–40——Further statement as to the mode of voting by means of voting papers, and as to there being no proper secrecy, ib. 190–194. 221–231——Liability of the voting papers to be tampered with, Darvill 494-496. 517, 518——Improvement if in lieu of the system of voting papers, personal voting were adopted for municipal elections, ib. 513-515. 517, 518——Further objection to the system of voting papers as affording opportunities both for tampering and intimidation, ib. 686–690. 700. 777–780.

Opinion favourable to the system of voting papers, Bleckly 1120–1122——Approval generally of the system of voting papers at municipal elections, though some instances of tampering arise, Addyman 1422,1423. 1442, 1443. 1500.

2. Parliamentary Elections:

Statement relative to the present practice of recording votes at Parliamentary elections, showing the advantage anticipated from the electors polling by means of cards, to be supplied by the candidates, Bleckly 1288–1302——Objection to voting papers being collected at the houses of the voters, Davies 3746–3748——Probable advantage if a system of voting papers were adopted, Bush 4407. 4416-4422——Approval of a proper system of voting papers as a check upon intimidation and bribery, Stokes 4491-4494——Approval of the use of voting papers under proper safeguards, Hill 4686, 4687——Safeguards required in connection with a system of voting papers; doubt as to much abuse arising, Cheese 5179–5187.

Very satisfactory working of the system of voting papers at Poor Law elections in Ireland, Norwood 8119–8122. 8295–8298——Proposition that the system of voting papers, as in the case of the Dublin University elections, be adopted for Parliamentary elections generally, as a supplementary mode of voting, where the voters prefer to adopt such mode; question hereon whether undue influence might not arise in the signing of the papers before a magistrate, ib. 8130. 8261–8266. 8281–8306. 8309–8326.

Decided objection to a system of voting papers at elections in Ireland, as placing the tenant's vote entirely at the mercy of the landlord, M'Dermott 8604-8608——Frequent abuse of the system of voting papers at Poor Law elections, ib. 8606, 8907.

Opinion that voting papers would be the best means of checking, if not preventing, bribery and intimidation, Edge 12804——Explanation in detail relative to the scheme of voting papers proposed by witness, being a modification of the plan in use for the election of Poor Law guardians, ib. 12805 et seq.——Suggestions relative to the issue of the voting papers by the returning officer, and their delivery at the houses of the electors, ib. 12806, 12807. 12813.

Proposal that the papers be delivered three days before the election, and that during this period no canvassing be allowed, Edge 12806, 12807. 12839–12857. 12942–12945——Expectation that witness's system of voting papers would prevent bribery on the polling day, as well as intimidation by mobs, and the "bottling" or kidnapping of voters; grounds for this conclusion considered, ib. 12836 et seq.——Explanation of the arrangements proposed for the collection of the voting papers; doubt as to any abuse arising on this score, or as to an unduly long time being occupied in a house-to-house collection, ib. 12807. 12813–12820. 12891–12893. 12912–12916. 12948–12951. 12971–12980.

Proposed publication of the votes after the election; check thereby upon personation, Edge 12807. 12811, 12812. 12823–12832. 12858–12863——Question considered whether in the signing of the voting papers, the voters might not be subject to undue influence or bribery; grounds for dissenting from this view, ib. 12821. 12987–13001——Difficulty as to the voters signing in the presence of the collecting officer, though this would obviate any chance of intimidation, ib. 12878–12885——Opinion as to the facility of checking frauds or personation in the signing of voting papers, ib. 12918, 12919

Possibility of the loss of many votes through the papers not being signed when called for, or being lost, Edge 12933–12939. 12952, 12953——Limited extent to which witness is aware of falsification of voting papers at elections of guardians or local boards, ib. 12958–12963——Suggested modification of the university system, in applying a system of voting papers to county elections, ib. 12981, 12982——Penalty contemplated as a check upon employers exercising undue influence as to the signing of voting papers, ib. 12987–12994.

Conclusion in Draft Report of Chairman of the Committee, unfavourable to a system of voting papers, Rep. xix.

WALES:

1. Landlord Influence at the Elections.
2. Influence of the Clergy.
3. Extent of Bribery and Treating.
4. Question of the Ballot.

1. Landlord Influence at the Elections:

Evidence to the effect that Conservative landlords do not exercise undue influence over their tenants as to their votes, though they generally express a wish on the subject, Cheese 5077-5081. 5126-5134. 5164-5169——Statement that, though having considerable experience as a land agent, witness knows no instance of tenants having suffered through voting in opposition to their landlords, ib. 5077, 5078. 5168, 5169.

Grounds for the conclusion that the landlords in Wales exercise an undue influence at the elections, Williams 5239-5247——Witness is not aware of any actual instance of coercion of tenants for political views, ib. 5246.

Statement that nearly all the farmers in Wales are tenants-at-will, and have not, as a rule, any means of receiving compensation for improvements, Harris 6282, 6283. 6320-6326——Independent feeling of the tenants in Church matters and in general politics, the protection of the ballot being greatly needed in order to secure freedom of election, ib. 6339 et seq.——Expectation alike of Whig and Tory landlords that their tenants will vote with them, the latter having great repugnance to the constraint put upon them, ib. 6335-6382. 6407-6409——Strong feeling of the tenants as to the want of leases or of tenant right, ib. 6368, 6369.

Belief as to the absence of coercion on the Liberal side at the elections in Wales, Rev. M. D. Jones 6619-6624. 6687-6695. 6802.

Inclination generally of the Welsh tenants to vote with their landlords, W. Jones 8480-8486.

2. Influence of the Clergy:

Great interest taken by the clergy of all denominations in Wales in the last election, Cheese 5053-5057. 5170——Peculiarly active interest taken by the Dissenting clergy in the Liberal cause; sundry instances of this, ib. 5058 et seq.——Instances of two Dissenting ministers having acted as paid agents, ib. 5058. 5065.

Statement as to the influence exercised by the Dissenting clergy at the elections being of a much stronger and more objectionable character than that exercised by the clergy of the Church of England, Cheese 5102 et seq. 5196, 5197——Explanation that the Wesleyans do not interfere in the same way as other Dissenting bodies, ib. 5120——Objection to the influence exercised by the Dissenting clergy as compared with the landlord's influence, ib. 5121-5134. 5137-5143. 5163-5169. 5206, 5207. 5218-5221——Peculiar susceptibility of the Welsh in respect of religious influences, ib. 5178. 5188.

Belief as to the entire inaccuracy of the evidence of Mr. Cheese relative to the exercise of undue influence and spiritual intimidation at the Welsh elections by the Dissenting clergy, Williams 5230-5236. 5248-5251——Explanation that the use of chapels for secular and electioneering purposes is by no means uncommon, ib. 5236——Active influence of the Church of England clergy on the Conservative side, ib. 5237, 5238.

Denial that the Dissenting clergy in Wales exercised any undue spiritual influence at the elections, Rev. M. D. Jones 6596-6599. 6627. 6697-6702. 6743-6748——Considerations as to the influence of the Dissenting clergy in forming the political opinions of the quarrymen and of the voters generally; denial of any undue influence in this respect, ib. 6625-6629. 6696-6728-6789-6797——Examination on the subject of the use of Dissenting chapels in Wales for political meetings; this is frequently done, and witness approves of the practice when other accommodation is unavailable, ib. 6639-6659. 6738-6742. 6793-6801. 6803-6814.

3. Extent of Bribery and Treating:

Exceptional instances of bribery at elections in Wales; few petitions consequent on the last general election, Cheese 5144-5156. 5161, 5162. 5189-5191——Considerable amount of treating or drinking, riots sometimes resulting, ib. 5157-5160.

4. Question of the Ballot:

Absence of any general feeling among farmers in Wales in favour of the ballot, Cheese 5082-5084——Doubt as to the ballot having any effect in Wales in preventing spiritual influence, ib. 5137-5205. 5222. 5226, 5227——Strong feeling in Wales in favour of the ballot, Harris 6331. 6339——Doubt as to any difficulty in the working of the ballot in Wales, notwithstanding the defective education of the people, Rev. M. D. Jones 6749-6760

4. Question of the Ballot—continued.

6760——Belief that the ballot in Wales would give increased influence to the dissenting clergy, their influence being already very great, W. Jones 8482—8488.

Wallingford. Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Blackburn in the matter of the Wallingford Election Petition, App. 577.

Warrington. Very satisfactory manner in which the municipal elections have been conducted at Warrington since the Act 22 Vict., Bleckly 1036 et seq.——Considerable amount of bribery and other undue influence at the elections previously to 1859, ib. 1037. 1083——Less political excitement in connection with the municipal elections in recent years; desire to enter the town council irrespectively of politics, ib. 1053–1058. 1067–1072. 1099-1102——Little, if any, treating at the elections, ib. 1059. 1073–1075——Belief that no occasion has arisen for putting the penal clauses of the Act of 1859 in operation, ib. 1060–1066.

Orderly and respectable conduct of the Parliamentary elections at Warrington; failure of the attempt to unseat the present members, Bleckly 1077–1080——General feeling at Warrington as to the satisfactory conduct of the municipal elections during the last ten years, ib. 1109——Details in connection with some mistakes in the recording of votes at the last Parliamentary election; difficulty of rectification in such case under the ballot, ib. 1121. 1123–1146. 1157–1162. 1169–1175. 1278–1282. 1288 et seq.——Impression that there was no bribery at the last Parliamentary election, ib. 1176. 1370–1374——Belief that there was no authorised treating at the election, though there might have been some treating by partisans, ib. 1177–1184. 1352–1355. 1370–1374——Noisy and disorderly character of the proceedings at the nomination day, ib. 1185–1200.

Nearly equal number of Parliamentary and of municipal voters at Warrington, Bleckly 1312. 1356, 1375——Slight extent to which there has been any personation at the Warrington elections, ib. 1313–1315——Fair wages earned by the operative class, only a very small portion of whom are open to bribes, ib. 1358–1366.

Particulars as to some votes at the Warrington election having been tendered to another person than the check clerk; precautions suggested on this point, Sir S. Martin 10653–10658.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin in the matter of the Warrington Election Petition, App. 577.

West, Edward. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Is Mayor of Bradford, 2860——Submits that public nominations for the Parliamentary elections at Bradford have caused great disorder and have been complete failures, there being a general feeling in the town that such nominations should be abolished, 2861. 2867–2871. 2879——Great improvement if the Parliamentary nominations were made by papers, certain improvements upon the plan of nomination by papers in municipal elections being desirable, 2862–2866.

Large meetings held by the Parliamentary candidates at Bradford, though not necessary as a means of making public their political views, 2872–2878——Prevalence of treating at both municipal and Parliamentary elections, 2880——Obstacle to an enforcement of the law against treating, as the punishment is considered too severe, 2881, 2882——Exercise of intimidation at Bradford on both sides, small tradesmen and shopkeepers being much subjected to undue influence, 2883–2885.

[Second Examination.]—Great danger of a riot at the last declaration of the poll at Bradford, 2886——Conclusion that the public declaration of the poll is both useless and dangerous, 2887——Suggestion that at the municipal nominations a portion of the expenses be deposited, as a check upon vexatious nominations, 2888, 2889——Objection to the expenses of Parliamentary elections being borne by the borough, 2890. 2932, 2933——Improvement if the nomination papers were not received later than eight or nine o'clock in the evening, 2891, 2892.

Proposal that there be an interval of three days between the nomination and the election, both at municipal and Parliamentary elections, 2892–2896. 2990–2993. 3039–3044——Amendments suggested in the system of election of auditors and assessors for municipal purposes, 2896–2900——Limited amount of corrupt practices at the Bradford Parliamentary elections, save in the shape of treating; great corruption on the latter score, 2901–2927——Very pure character of the last Parliamentary election, 2902. 2998——Exercise of undue influence at the Parliamentary elections, the small tradesmen being often put under pressure by the working men, 2903. 2906. 2929–2931.

Decided approval of the ballot as a means of preventing not only intimidation but treating and bribery generally, 2904–2906. 2923–2927. 2946 et seq.——Extensive treating at the Bradford municipal elections as well as at the Parliamentary elections, 2918——State of local feeling on the subject of bribery and treating; absence of prosecutions on the subject, 2919–2922. 2928. 3003–3007——Non-objection to the legal or necessary expenses of municipal elections being borne by the borough, 2934–2937——Considerable amount of treating at low public houses at Bradford used nominally as committee-rooms, 2938–2945.

Great improbability of candidates running the risk of bribing if there were the ballot, even though the lower class of voters might always continue open to bribery, 2955–2963. 2994–3002——Growing public opinion in favour of the pure conduct of elections, improved education tending to increase this feeling; expediency nevertheless of the protection of the ballot, 2964–2976. 2999–3001——Consideration of the machinery for carrying out secret voting; contemplated employment of an officer at each booth who should be sworn to secresy, 2976–2985. 3024–3028.

Frequency of fictitious nominations at the Bradford municipal elections, 2986–2989——Occurrence of treating and bribery in the case chiefly of the uneducated class of voters, 2994–3000——Large number of Irish voters on the municipal and Parliamentary registers, the wages of these being very low, 2996. 3047–3050——Expediency of some improved process of prosecution for corrupt practices at municipal elections, 3008——Importance of increasing the number of polling places at the elections at Bradford, 3009, 3010.

Statement favourable to voiding the seat of the candidate returned at the Parliamentary election, if the agent for election expenses, or the candidate himself makes a fictitious return of the expenses; present regulations on this point considered, 3009-3023. 3032-3035——Approval of the public-houses being closed on the day of election, and of declaration of the poll, 3029–3031——Recommendation that open nominations be abolished for county elections as well as for borough elections, steps being taken to prevent inconvenience through fictitious nomination, 3036, 3037. 3051–3055.

Expediency of nomination by papers conjointly with an interval of three days between the nomination and polling, 3038–3040——Increased demand for the ballot at Bradford by reason of the large extension of the franchise, 3045, 3046.

West Riding. Information relative to a question in the case of the West Riding election whether certain expenditure in refreshments for voters was corrupt expenditure; doubt whether this amounted to treating within the meaning of the Act, Sir S. Martin 10571–10586.

Westbury. Success of the Westbury petition on the ground of undue influence by an agent, Sir J. S. Willes 10732, 10733.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Willes in the matter of the Westbury petition, App. 577, 578.

Westminster. Instances of bribery at the Westminster election by a supporter of Mr. Smith; failure, however, of the attempt to prove that this person was an agent, Sir S. Martin 10527–10529——Excessive expenditure of Mr. Smith at the election; belief, however, that no illegal expenditure was intended by him, ib. 10530–10534. 10542——Failure of an attempt to prove treating on the part of Mr. Smith, ib. 10542.

Wexford. Certificate and report by Chief Justice Monahan in the matter of the Wexford Borough election petition, App. 588.

Wick Burghs. Certificate and report by Lord Jerviswoode in the matter of the Wick Burghs election petition, the same having been withdrawn, App. 580.

Wigan. Singularly pure character of the Wigan election, Sir S. Martin 10521.

Certificate and report by Mr. Justice Martin in the matter of the Wigan petition, App. 578.

Willes, Sir James S., Knight. (Analysis of his Evidence.)—Has tried ten election petitions, the seat having been voided in two instances on the ground of undue influence, 10714–10717——Explanatory statement relative to the undue influence extensively exercised in the Tory mills at Blackburn, chiefly by overlookers and fellow-workmen, the election having been voided on this ground, 10718–10731——Success of the Westbury petition adverted to, 10732, 10733——Information on the subject of treating, or rather of eating and drinking, under various forms, there being several forms of treating which do not by law vitiate the election, 10734–10739.

Almost total absence of bribery in the cases tried by witness, 10740——Several instances of alleged undue influence investigated by witness at other places besides Blackburn and Westbury, but without the seat being voided, 10741–10743——Consideration of the question whether an election should not be vitiated on the general ground that there had been a much larger expenditure than, in the opinion of the judge, was reasonable or necessary, 10744–10751. 10798–10800——Amendments suggested in the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act as to treating, with a view to making the law more stringent and comprehensive, 10752–10759——Advantage if committee-rooms were not
